Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Hillsborough

1. Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): If all material held by South Yorkshire police in respect of the Hillsborough disaster which he ordered to be placed in the Library has now been deposited. [53506]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): As much of the evidence as possible considered by Lord Justice Stuart-Smith in his Hillsborough scrutiny, including that held by South Yorkshire police, has been placed in the Library. That includes copies of the police statements, both in their original and amended form, and copies of other material considered by Lord Justice Stuart-Smith not already in the public domain.

I am aware that the Hillsborough family support group has queried whether there are any further statements outstanding and that is being followed up by South Yorkshire police.

Maria Eagle: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. I shall write to him in due course about the matter, as I believe that there is documentation that he said should be put in the Library, but which is not yet there. I shall give specific examples when I write to my right hon. Friend.

The question that arises in my mind is why that documentation is still held by the South Yorkshire police. It was not formed or prepared by the police force, which was a party that was severely criticised in Lord Chief Justice Taylor's inquiry report. One of the problems the families have had in obtaining that documentation is the fact that South Yorkshire police have been unwilling to give it up. Can my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary tell the House why the police have custody of it?

Mr. Straw: The arrangements for the retention of those documents by the South Yorkshire police are the standard ones that apply in any police area: it is the responsibility of the police force concerned. A huge number of documents have been held and properly archived by the South Yorkshire police. We are transferring all those documents that are relevant to the Library of the House. I am aware of my hon. Friend's concerns and, once she has sent me details, I shall look into the matter.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): We look forward to the Home Secretary finally reaching his conclusions regarding the Hillsborough disaster, having taken into account the new information now coming from survivors and relatives of those who were killed. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there are lessons to be learnt regarding crowd control, not only in football stadiums, but for other large events, such as the funeral of the Princess of Wales? What steps is he taking to ensure that the lessons learnt from the Hillsborough disaster are transmitted to other such events?

Mr. Straw: A great many lessons were drawn from what happened at Hillsborough and, more particularly, from the excellent report of the inquiry conducted by Lord Taylor, later Lord Chief Justice. The police service and many others who have responsibility for crowd control have taken proper cognisance of the lessons to be learnt.

I have to say that I believe that the Metropolitan police service dealt with the policing of the funeral of the Princess of Wales with exemplary intelligence and skill.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Is my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary aware that a large number of people in Merseyside who lost relatives at Hillsborough would like directly to look at the documentary material? Would he consider making that material available in Liverpool library?

Mr. Straw: I agree with my right hon. Friend that the information should be made available. I understand, although I am not absolutely certain, that the information is either currently being transferred to, or already held at, the central library in Liverpool. If that is not so, I shall certainly do my best to make arrangements to ensure that it is.

Police (Early Retirement)

2. Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): What plans he has to reduce the proportion of early retirements from the police. [53508]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): Earlier this year, we published a consultation document on police pension arrangements, which highlighted the need for more efficient management of ill-health retirement. Work is in hand on detailed proposals and we shall support good management practice, with changes to the police pensions regulations where necessary. Any proposals will be published in good time to allow for full consultation with the interested parties.

Judy Mallaber: I am pleased that my hon. Friend is taking the issue seriously because, in Derbyshire constabulary last year, 65 per cent. of officers retiring did so on grounds of ill health. Has he seen the report on the Derbyshire constabulary published this month by Her Majesty's inspectorate? The constabulary is praised for having Investors in People accreditation and a Government charter mark, but attention is drawn to the problem of early retirement on medical and sickness grounds. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the inspectorate has previously expressed concern about underfunding of the Derbyshire police; and can he confirm that the Government will in future give the police adequate resources to enable them to play their part in tackling crime and to limit the stress on police officers?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the problem and to the need to control medical retirements, because the pensions being paid out of police resources mean a reduction in the resources available to that police force. The variations are extremely large: in 1996-97, 16 per cent. of all police retirements in Wiltshire were on medical grounds, whereas the figure in Merseyside was 77 per cent. Merseyside has reduced that figure by 23 per cent. in the intervening period, so it is clear that police forces can manage the problem and increase their own resources by doing so.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Has the Home Secretary received any requests for early retirement on the ground of stress from the police officers involved in arresting Senator Pinochet, as it appears that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office had welcomed the gentleman to Britain through the VIP lounge but officers responsible to the Home Secretary were asked to arrest him?

Mr. Michael: The answer to the substantive question is no.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): Is my hon. Friend aware that, last week, the Greater Manchester police announced substantial reductions in its work force? Would he be prepared to enter into consultation with the force to make sure that my constituents are not affected by reductions in the work of the police?

Mr. Michael: In recent years, the number of officers available for front-line policing has not kept pace with the number of officers available overall. We are encouraging police forces to use their resources—particularly the men and women who serve them—on the front line in the community rather than in support services. Each report of the inspectorate has demonstrated that there are still savings to be made which can improve the quality of the service to the public.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Does the Minister recognise that in the Metropolitan police force the problem is not only that too many officers are retiring early, but that too many are seeking transfer to other police authorities? Will he consider that problem when he reviews Metropolitan police pay and conditions of service?

Mr. Michael: That is a complex issue for the Commissioner. Many people come from outside London to serve in the Metropolitan police and many officers later seek to transfer to other forces, so transfers work in both directions. For example, many serving at the highest levels in the Metropolitan police have spent time, perhaps at chief constable level, in another force. That is a management issue which needs to be treated with care.

Financial Regulation

3. Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): When he expects the inquiry into financial regulation in the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man to report. [53509]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): Mr. Andrew Edwards, who conducted the inquiry, delivered his report last week. It is being prepared for printing and will be published, in its entirety, for the House and the other place next month.

Mr. Mitchell: I welcome that speedy delivery. Will the Home Secretary also opt for speedy implementation of the Edwards report—by consent, if possible, but if necessary, by imposition—to clean up the financial acts in the Crown dependencies, particularly Jersey and Guernsey? The Edwards report found that regulators are promoting the development of financial services and business is being conducted in maximum secrecy with those involved repelling outside inquiries, as in the case of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International. There is no separation of powers on the islands, so those who benefit from financial services also have influence over the Executive, the legislature and the judicial and regulatory structures. Does the Home Secretary agree that such arrangements are totally unsuitable?

Mr. Straw: I understand my hon. Friend's strong views. He will appreciate that, as I read the report only late last night, I am not in a position to discuss its individual recommendations, and it would be wrong to do so before the report is presented to the House. Once the report is published in its entirety, there will be every opportunity for its contents to be discussed by Members of Parliament and responsible individuals in the islands.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): The Home Secretary is aware of my concern about the way in which the inquiry was launched because he and I have corresponded about that. I am grateful to him for stating that his ministerial colleague in another place will meet me and the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) to discuss the fact that, at the time of the inquiry's launch, the legislatures in the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man were considerably upset. Will he confirm that the concerns that I have raised with him in writing will be dealt with and that we will never again present the legislatures in overseas territories such as the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man with emergency announcements that completely bypass the normal structures and lead to their holding emergency debates on the possibility of secession?

Mr. Straw: We endeavour to maintain good relations with the islands, and I pay tribute to my noble and learned friend Lord Williams of Mostyn for the way in which he conducts those relations, day by day and week by week. The constitutional relationship between the islands and the Parliament of the United Kingdom was set out very clearly in the Kilbrandon report in the early 1970s. The action that I took in announcing and establishing the inquiry was fully consistent with the deliberations and conclusions about that relationship set out in Kilbrandon.

Prison Sentences

4. Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): How many offenders were given prison sentences of four months or more but less than eight months in the most recent year for which figures are available. [53510]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): There were 16,132 during 1997.

Mr. Loughton: I am grateful for that short answer. Will the Minister confirm that, under the home detention curfew scheme, a criminal who received a sentence of six months would spend only six weeks in prison? Is that correct?

Mr. Howarth: Home detention curfews will be introduced on 28 January 1999. All prisoners will have to satisfy a risk assessment that will be carried out by the Prison Service, and we expect that about 50 per cent. of those who are eligible will qualify for the scheme.

The length of the curfew—which is the point of the hon. Gentleman's question—will be determined by the length of the sentence. In order to avoid unfair anomalies, section 99 of the relevant Act sets out a sliding scale. [Interruption.] I am answering the question that the hon. Gentleman asked. If Opposition Members do not like my answer, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman asks a different question. The sliding scale ensures two things: first, that as much time is spent in custody as under curfew; and, secondly, that at least 14 days are spent under curfew. If the hon. Gentleman examines the statistics and the facts of the matter, he will discover that he is actually arguing about two weeks.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Specific to the length of prison sentences, will the Minister tell the House what penalties were imposed by the courts in the five cases of serious social security fraud cited in the Government publication of July 1998 entitled "Beating Fraud is Everyone's Business—Securing the Future"? Will the Minister remind the House of the sums involved and will he reassure the public that, in the context of crime prevention, the punishment meted out by the courts must be worthy of the crime?

Mr. Howarth: Obviously, the courts will determine what sentences to impose in any set of circumstances. As I did not receive notice of his question, it would be invidious for me to comment on the cases to which the hon. Gentleman referred. However, I am sure that all hon. Members agree that prison sentences and other punishments must be available to the courts in the case of social security fraud. In some circumstances, they are quite appropriate punishments.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Does my hon. Friend agree that, although short sentences of fewer than eight months might have a deterrent effect, they have very little rehabilitative or training content and leave many people with no alternative means of earning a living on their release from prison? Does my hon. Friend agree that, in most cases, it would be better to concentrate on electronic tagging or community sentences or on what the Home Affairs Select Committee prefers to call "criminal work orders" when dealing with such offenders? That would release resources wherever possible and ensure that those who are imprisoned for short periods receive the rehabilitation and training that will enable them to take up other careers when they leave prison.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend makes a good point in that part of the purpose of a prison sentence is to equip people with skills so that they can lead an honest life when they complete their sentences. That is very important. As to home detention curfews, which have much exercised the minds of Opposition Members, perhaps they should ask the hon. Members for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) and for Woking (Mr. Malins) for their views on the matter. They supported the Home Affairs Select Committee, which backed precisely this scheme, so I am sure that there is unanimity in all corners of the House.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I believe that the answer to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) is that, in many cases, six months will indeed mean six weeks. Of the 16,000 prisoners that the Minister mentioned, how many were burglars? How can anyone have confidence in the Prime Minister's promise of a blitz on burglars when, under the home curfew detention scheme, burglars may be let out on the streets? Or perhaps the Minister will tell us that burglars will not be included. We would love that; we would prefer that the Government implemented section 3 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997.

Mr. Howarth: It would be tempting to assume that, instead of being on the brink of being out of office for the next 20 years, Conservative Members had been out of office for the past 20 years. I believe that it has escaped the hon. Gentleman's attention that the arrangements that the previous Conservative Government had in place led to a doubling of crime and to fewer than one in 50 crimes resulting in a conviction. We shall listen to what the hon. Gentleman and his friends say when they can point to a more convincing record of their own; I do not believe that they can.

We are proposing something that we believe will work. It has the support of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, of which at least three of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends are members. It is about time that the hon. Gentleman started thinking about these things instead of sounding off about them.

Fire and Police Services (Pensions)

5. Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): What plans he has to change fire and police service pension arrangements. [53512]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): We published consultation documents on the police and fire service pension schemes in March 1998 and will take careful account of the responses that we receive. We shall consult fully on any specific changes that we propose to the pension arrangements for new entrants or to medical retirement procedures.

Mr. Davies: What consideration has my hon. Friend given to those cases of premature retirement due to sickness or ill health where the person subsequently—sometimes immediately—takes up an alternative form of employment?

Mr. Howarth: That is obviously a matter for concern. In each case, one would have to inquire into the nature of the subsequent employment—for example, whether it required a different level of physical activity from the job of being a serving police or fire officer. Obviously, concerns such as those to which my hon. Friend just alluded form part of the considerations that have taken place, and such concerns will be taken into account when we consider the results of the consultation.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): The Minister will be aware that, over the past year, Gloucestershire constabulary has suffered an actual cut in its budget of £1.5 million. That has resulted in the loss of front-line policemen. In no small measure is that due to the increased pension contributions that the Gloucestershire constabulary has had to make, directly as a result of the Government's changes in advance corporation tax relief. What will the Government do to fund those pension contributions fully so that rural areas, in particular, do not suffer a cut in their front-line police and fire services?

Mr. Howarth: First, the settlement that the Gloucestershire police authority received was precisely the one that it would have received, had the Conservative party still been in government.

Regarding the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the problem with these schemes is that they are not funded. If they were funded, we would not be in this position. I add that, except for setting up endless reviews into these problems, the previous Government did absolutely nothing about them—indeed, did not even publish the results of their reviews. We have had the courage to publish those reviews, and to consult on them. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman exercises his uncharacteristic patience a little longer, until we find out what is in the reviews and precisely what we propose to do about the matter.

Crime and Disorder

6. Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): If he will make a statement on progress in implementing his Department's measures relating to crime and disorder. [53513]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 received Royal Assent on 31 July this year. Of the 121 sections in the Act, 87 have now been brought into force, some of those on a pilot basis. Sex offender orders will come into force on 1 December and anti-social behaviour orders will come into force on 1 April next year.

Considerable effort is being put into publicity about the Act's provisions. That includes a regional tour which I undertook in September, national conferences, written publications and a site on the internet, which I am told is proving very popular. Going around the country, I am struck by the huge enthusiasm shown by the police, local authorities and the public for the provisions of the Act.

Dr. Turner: I assure my right hon. Friend that there is considerable enthusiasm for making a fast start in North-West Norfolk. In the distribution of pilots, will proper attention be paid to the needs of rural constituencies such as mine? If the pilots are to tackle hot spots, may I remind my right hon. Friend that King's Lynn, the market town in my constituency, has 30 per cent. more crime than the average metropolitan area, and twice the county average? Is that not just the sort of problem that the pilots should be tackling? May I assure my constituents that their needs are being considered in my right hon. Friend's Department?

Mr. Straw: I can certainly give that assurance to my hon. Friend. As he knows, I paid an interesting visit to his constituency, looked at some of the problem areas and also spoke to a meeting in King's Lynn on a wet Friday evening, at which 700 good citizens of King's Lynn turned up to hear me—[Interruption.]—and they stayed to the end.

With regard to piloting in rural areas, we have sought to distribute the pilots around rural areas, as well as urban areas and inner-city areas. Pilots are taking place on various subjects in Devon, Gloucestershire, Northamptonshire and in north Staffordshire.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Does the Home Secretary believe that further measures will be needed to deal with offenders who are deemed to be extremely violent because of mental illness or personality disorder, but whom psychiatrists diagnose as not likely to respond to treatment? Is he aware that this concern has arisen not simply following the conviction of Michael Stone for those two brutal and horrible murders, but because there has been a tendency in recent years for psychiatrists to diagnose a number of violent people as not likely to respond to treatment?

Mr. Straw: Yes, I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there must be changes in law and practice in that area. We are urgently considering the matter with my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Health. Sir Louis Blom-Cooper, who has a distinguished record in this field, said on the radio on Sunday that one of the problems that has arisen is a change in the practice of the psychiatric profession which, 20 years ago, adopted what I would call a common-sense approach to serious and dangerous persistent offenders, but these days goes for a much narrower interpretation of the law. Quite extraordinarily for a medical profession, the psychiatric profession has said that it will take on only patients whom it regards as treatable. If that philosophy applied anywhere else in medicine, no progress would be made in medicine. It is time that the psychiatric profession seriously examined its own practices and tried to modernise them in a way that it has so far failed to do.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): On Saturday, I was out visiting constituents and met a group of my more elderly constituents who are having problems with minor vandalism in their area, which leads to them feeling unable to use some of their front rooms and concerned about general safety in their neighbourhood. Will my right hon. Friend comment on the role of community police officers under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 in tackling such community disorder, which is of great concern to people in Welwyn Hatfield?

Mr. Straw: I have spoken to many community beat officers about their frustrations in dealing with criminal anti-social behaviour such as my hon. Friend describes. One of the reasons that we have created in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 the new injunctive powers for anti-social behaviour orders is to ensure that community beat officers, their commanding officers and superintendents in the operational command units in the police service can seek effective action by the courts to crack down on such behaviour. I believe that, once the order comes into force next April, it will be extremely effective in dealing with such disorder in my hon. Friend's constituency and in every other constituency across the country.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): The Home Secretary will know that one of the main provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, which has already come into place, is for local authorities to make child curfew orders. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that many people find it strange that local child curfews will apply to youngsters under 10 but not to those aged 10 or over, who many of us think are more likely to cause serious trouble on estates and neighbourhoods than the under-10s? Is it a sensible use of police time for the police to have to sort out the under-10s from the over-10s? Will the right hon. Gentleman be as bold as his rhetoric and tell us how many local child curfews he thinks we shall hear about on the internet, in hot spots or anywhere else? Or is the prospect of a wet night in King's Lynn more forbidding?

Mr. Straw: No. Having done one wet night in King's Lynn, I am game for any number of them.

I find it rather odd that, under the Conservative party, which was in power for 18 years, the juvenile justice system was allowed thoroughly to decay. It became worse and worse. When we proposed that there should be trialled area curfews for under-10s, Opposition Front Benchers could come forward only with derision.

Of course I understand that there is a problem, too, with children who are over 10 who are racketing around unsupervised in local areas, but the most serious problem arises in respect of those who are under 10, who are under the age of criminal responsibility. That is why we have introduced a specific power.

As for the over-10s, anti-social behaviour orders will be available for any child. We made it clear when considering the Crime and Disorder Bill in Committee, and I made it clear in Blackpool—another wet evening—only three weeks ago, that if a strong case emerges for raising the age of the curfews we shall, of course, consider it.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that sector policing in my constituency, and especially in the Lye area, has been a great success, and that has been due in no small part to the partnerships evolving within the community, with the police reaching out to leaders and to young people and disaffected groups within the community, and liaising directly with them?

Mr. Straw: I accept what my hon. Friend says. There is no doubt that the very good experience of local authorities and of the West Mercia police in my hon. Friend's area shows to other local authorities and police forces, which might not have been in the vanguard, the importance and value of reducing crime and disorder in their areas. This arises from statutory partnerships, which we have established under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

Prisoners (Television)

7. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): What plans he has to increase the number of televisions available to prisoners. [53514]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): We have made arrangements to extend the pilot in-cell television schemes introduced by the previous Administration in the light of the Woolf report. Televisions will be installed in 80 establishments over the next three months as part of the Prison Service's incentives and earned privileges scheme.

Mr. Gray: I thank the Minister for that answer, although the House and the country will be disturbed to hear it. Does the Minister agree that television in cells should be earned as a privilege as a result of good behaviour and should not be provided as of right? Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House how much the new scheme is costing? Would it be better to use the money not for in-cell television but for out-of-cell activities such as education and training?

Mr. Howarth: I think that the hon. Gentleman does not understand the scheme. The answer to the second part of his question is that the scheme will be broadly self-financing. Prisoners will be expected to pay towards the cost of the televisions.

As for the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the scheme was advocated by Lord Justice Woolf and it was piloted under at least three Home Secretaries under a Conservative Government. Indeed, they did not see any reason to suspend those pilots, and we have taken that process to its logical conclusion.

I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman would agree with the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who sits on the Opposition Front Bench? On 27 March 1997, the hon. Gentleman said:

"What we are saying is that television cells should not be an automatic right but should be something earned by good behaviour."

That is precisely what we are doing, so perhaps the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) thinks that it is a sensible scheme after all.

Police (Communications)

8. Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): What assistance his Department is giving to enable police forces to acquire new communications systems. [53515]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): The Police Information Technology Organisation, a Home Office non-departmental public body, is managing the public safety radio communications project. This is a major public-private partnership project designed to replace the police service's existing radiocommunications infrastructure with a modern one.

PITO is also working with the police service to implement an enhanced police national network to modernise telecommunications.

Mr. Bayley: May I congratulate my hon. Friend on her appointment as a Minister and welcome her to her place on the Front Bench? Is she aware that the police radios currently in use in North Yorkshire do not communicate with many parts of the county—not just isolated valleys in the dales and moors, but stores in the centre of York? Does she realise that North Yorkshire police urgently need new radios? Will she either consider extending to North Yorkshire the trial for the public safety radio communications project in Lancashire, or make some other proposal to speed up the purchase of new radios for North Yorkshire?

Kate Hoey: I thank my hon. Friend for his congratulations. We all recognise the difficulties that North Yorkshire police have with their current radio system, which is why the force is scheduled to be among the first to be provided with the new service.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Are the present communications systems sufficient to enable the Home Office to maintain contact with the Chilean aircraft waiting at RAF Brize Norton?

Kate Hoey: I am sure that, if it wished to, it could.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the police will have the resources necessary to ensure that they have proper communications equipment? Earlier this year, I had cause to write to the Home Secretary about the position in West Yorkshire. Because of the change in the valuation of the band D rating, the West Yorkshire coffers contained £6 million less than had been budgeted for. It is essential that police forces, particularly West Yorkshire, are assured of the resources necessary to purchase equipment to combat crime in the county.

Kate Hoey: My hon. Friend will be aware that the additional funding available to police in England and Wales in the next three years should be sufficient, given efficiency improvements and the reinvestment of savings, to help meet extra spending pressures that may arise.

New Deal

10. Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): What steps his Department is taking (a) to recruit young unemployed people under the new deal and (b) to encourage agencies for which the Department is responsible and suppliers to the Department to do the same. [53517]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): The Home Office formally signed up to the new deal programme on 18 September and, with its agencies, is actively seeking to employ new deal participants. We cannot answer for the employment practices of independent suppliers, but we hope that, like other employers, they will participate in the new deal.

The Secretary of State, ministerial colleagues and I stand ready to take on new deal applicants in our private offices. We hope that that sends out a strong signal to other parts of the Home Office and its agencies.

Mr. Healey: The formal new deal commitment is encouraging, as is the advertising of specific vacancies on the Floor of the House. I look forward to the near future when the Department will take on new deal recruits. Does my hon. Friend agree that the opportunity to work can be crucial in helping youngsters to break out of a life of crime? What steps is the Department taking to ensure that such young people have access to the new deal?

Mr. Howarth: I thank my hon. Friend for the first part of his question, and agree entirely with the point that he makes in the second part. The probation service, the Prison Service and others are well linked into the new deal. If young people are to avoid a life of crime, it is important that they have gainful employment, proper training and access to proper education. That is an integral part of our strategy for dealing with young offenders and those who may become young offenders. It is vital that we all accept the importance of that.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Will the Minister do all that he can to encourage young unemployed people not only to go through the new deal, perhaps into the police force—I should be interested in what he has to say about any applications—but to go into the specials? He will know of the tremendous contribution that the specials make towards our police force throughout the country. Will he encourage young unemployed people to offer the spare time that they obviously have, to give back their commitment and contribution to society through the specials? They might also gain some of the training and sense of civic responsibility which would help them to get into full-time employment elsewhere.

Mr. Howarth: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that constructive question. In respect of the police and the fire service, consideration has been given to whether the special constables and retained firefighters could be a route by which the new deal could travel. Discussions are on-going. The hon. Gentleman's point is well made, and I shall consider it further.

Closed Circuit Television

11. Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): What plans he has to make closed circuit television more widely available. [53518]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): We shall be funding 175 closed circuit television schemes this financial year. By the end of March, more than 580 schemes will have benefited from the successive rounds of the challenge competitions. We will certainly encourage the lessons from those schemes to be applied to problems elsewhere.

Mr. Vaz: May I welcome the Government's commitment to the extension of CCTV and invite the Minister to visit my constituency to compare two estates: Northfields, which was visited by the Home Secretary last year, where there has been a massive reduction in crime because of CCTV; and Thurnby Lodge, where there is tremendous demand from local people for such services? Does my hon. Friend agree that this is one area of policy that can foster, in a most dramatic way, public and private partnerships?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend failed to mention that it was raining when my right hon. Friend visited that estate. We have to be careful in relation to cause and effect: was it the CCTV or the visit of my right hon. Friend that led to the reduction in crime? To come to my hon. Friend's serious point, I should of course be happy to consider the comparison with him. It is important that, where success has been gained, it is learned from in other areas. The police, the local authority and the private sector in the area should look at opportunities to transfer the lessons learned in one place by considering financing schemes in the other estate.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): On his way to Leicester, East, will the Minister please call in at Market Harborough, where he will find that, thanks to the Conservative Government, a good CCTV scheme is in action which has already directly caused a reduction in crime in that town? On his way from Market Harborough to Leicester, East, will he call in on the borough of Oadby and Wigston, which is run by the Liberal Democrats? Despite my encouragements—and, no doubt, encouragements from his right hon. and hon. Friends—the inane Liberal Democrat council refuses to apply to the Home Office for funding for CCTV, which is greatly needed. Will he make a point, even if he does not come to Market Harborough or to Leicester, of going to Oadby and Wigston and shaking that council?

Mr. Michael: If we allow these questions to go on much longer, I shall be making a tour of the whole country.

The hon. and learned Gentleman makes his point; may I make a serious one? CCTV is at its most effective when it is linked in with other measures to cut crime. The partnership approach, which my right hon. Friend has introduced in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, will give the context for the reduction of crime in every area and consideration of whether CCTV is appropriate to fit in with that local partnership approach. It is appropriate for all areas to consider that point. The answer may be local, based on the local facts of crime.

Gordon Warren Case

12. Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): If he will make a statement on the Home Office and Metropolitan police's policy towards the Gordon Warren case. [53519]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): This case is essentially a personnel issue for the Metropolitan police. As police authority, we have approved the ex-gratia payment of £85,000 which is on offer to Mr. Warren. I believe that this figure represents a fair settlement to Mr. Warren. We all agree that he was unfairly treated and unlawfully retired from the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Brake: I thank the Minister for that response. Attempts began in 1982 to get Mr. Warren retired from the police force on mental health grounds because he refused to go to a blue movies party that was organised during staff time. Those attempts continued for five years. Attempts were also made to get him to retire on ill-health grounds, on the basis of an ailment that he did not suffer.

Madam Speaker: A question, please.

Mr. Brake: Does the Minister agree that £85,000 for 16 years of suffering at the hands of the Metropolitan police—to cover his legal costs, and the loss of his salary and pension rights—is a derisory sum? Does she also agree that she needs to act now to ensure that this matter is resolved to the satisfaction of Mr. Warren without further prevarication or procrastination?

Kate Hoey: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this case has taken a long time. I believe that the settlement of £85,000 is fair and reasonable. If that is finally agreed, there will be an independent assessment of the sum once the other elements of the settlement package are agreed.

Police Spending

13. Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): By how much in real terms police spending will increase in each of the next three years. [53520]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): The outcome of the comprehensive spending review for the Home Office provides for a real-terms year-on-year increase in police funding of £3 million in 1999–2000, £23 million in 2000–01 and £107 million in 2001–02. In actual terms, that represents a total of £1.24 billion over the three-year period.

Mr. Randall: I thank the Minister for his reply. What guarantees can the Minister offer outer-London boroughs that they will get their fair share of any increases?

Mr. Michael: The whole point of the needs-based system, which was introduced by the previous Government, is to ensure that the allocation to police forces is based on need rather than on whim, on what has gone before or on any other criteria. Some outer-London areas will be affected by boundary changes. I met the representative of the outer-London police committee last week to discuss the issues. We shall make every effort to be fair to every part of the police service, and to take account of the effect of the changes on individual forces, particularly the three that will be affected by the boundary changes.

Angela Smith (Basildon): Does the Minister agree that, although the increased funding is greatly welcomed across the country, serious issues of inefficiency in the police force still have to be tackled to ensure that we have the best use of existing and new resources? What action will he take to ensure that we see such greater efficiency?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is right. I agree with the remarks of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, who said that there is an enormous variation in the performance of police forces, and that it is extraordinarily difficult to hold anyone publicly accountable. Senior police officers and police authorities now recognise this problem. We shall do all that we can to encourage the most efficient use of the resources available to the police service.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): Does the Minister agree that, under the last Conservative Government, the strength of the police service increased by 15,000, and spending in real terms went up by 70 per cent? Does he expect there to be more police or less police at the end of his period of office?

Mr. Michael: I must correct the right hon. Gentleman in both fact and grammar. If there were any reduction, there would be fewer, not less, police. His political inexactitude is as great. Between 1992 and 1997, the number of police officers went down, despite the fact that the Government whom he supported promised an increase of 2,000. They failed to deliver what they promised.

Sir Norman Fowler: Let me correct the Minister on the facts. Does he deny that, over the period of the last Conservative Government, police numbers went up by 15,000? Is it not a fact that the Police Federation, the Police Superintendents Association and chief constables all see the inevitable result of his policies as smaller police forces? How can the Prime Minister boast of zero tolerance policing at the same time as police numbers are falling?

Mr. Michael: It is all right to get artificially angry, but the right hon. Gentleman should look at the remarks of Lord Baker, a former Home Secretary, who said:

"There was impatience, if not anger, that although we"— the Conservative Government—

"had spent 87 per cent. more in real terms, and had increased police numbers by 27,000, there had still been a substantial rise in crime. 'Where is the value for money' asked my colleagues?"

The previous Government managed to more than double crime—they put resources into policing and did little about efficiency.

Police Dog Handlers

14. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): What criteria are used to determine the employment of a police officer as a dog handler. [53521]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): It is the responsibility of each chief officer of police to determine the criteria for the selection of police dog handlers.

In July 1996, the Home Office issued a manual identifying best practice and offering guidance on the training and care of police dogs. The manual includes a section on the selection criteria for handlers. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Prentice: How did that Home Office manual help WPC Thomas, who desperately wanted to become a dog handler but could not lift an 80 lb weight above her head, as was required, and could do only nine of the 23 press-ups that were required? Surely such tests are ludicrous: they tell us nothing about a woman's capability to control a dog.

Only this morning, I was speaking to my researcher, Ruth Wilkinson. She has an enormous great dog, and controls it just by looking at it.

Kate Hoey: My hon. Friend is right. The case of WPC Michelle Thomas ensured that the Metropolitan police accepted that the test did not conform to best practice, and it was withdrawn as soon as concern was expressed. We are clear about the fact that there should be no artificial barriers, and that each job should involve standards that are equal for men and women.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): Would the hon. Lady like to tell the House about her attitude, and her Department's attitude, to the implementation of those guidelines by Essex police? Will she admit that the conduct of Essex police—the brutality with which they conduct their exercises—has lowered the esteem in which the police are held in general, as well as prompting disgust and a general loss of confidence in the Essex force?

Kate Hoey: The right hon. Gentleman is clearly referring to a case on which the Home Office cannot possibly comment in any detail until the court action is over. Obviously, we would never condone cruelty to dogs, and, once the court case is finished, we will work with the police to make any necessary changes in training standards.

Police (Retirement)

15. Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): What percentage of police officers currently retire aged (a) under 55, (b) 55 to 60 and (c) 60 to 65 years. [53523]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): The most recent study examined police officers who left forces in the United Kingdom in 1991, through ordinary retirement, medical retirement or resignation. According to that study, 86.1 per cent. of officers who retired in 1991 were under 55; 13.5 per cent. were between 55 and 60; and 0.4 per cent. were between 61 and 65. Those figures include both ordinary and medical retirements.

Mr. Williams: We all sympathise with anyone who has to retire early for health reasons, but does my hon. Friend agree that there is far too much early retirement in British society, among teachers, local government officers and, certainly, the police? We are losing people with experience and valuable skills. In the current consultation exercise, will my hon. Friend specifically state that he would like the proportion of early retirements to be reduced?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend has made some good points. In the case of early and ill-health retirement, the burden falls on the finances available for policing generally, because this is not a funded scheme.

Policing can be dangerous. It involves shift working in all weathers, often featuring high levels of stress and physical activity. There are reasons for the large number of early retirements; but the variations in the proportion of, in particular, ill-health retirements across the country show no correlation with the size and nature of the force. There are serious questions about the quality of management in some police forces, and we shall be considering them continually over the coming years.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Does the Minister agree that no police officer, of whatever age, who is under criminal investigation should be allowed to retire from the force on grounds of ill health and still claim a full pension?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman is right. In the past, it has sometimes been too easy to make such a back door available. We must be careful to look at the precise circumstances of any individual application, but, in general, the management of such issues, and the way in which complaints and disciplinary matters are dealt with, needs to be much speedier and more concentrated.

Asylum Seekers

16. Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): How many asylum seekers are currently detained under immigration laws. [53524]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): As at 30 September 1998, the most recent date for which information is available, a total of 760 persons who had sought asylum at any time were recorded as being detained solely under Immigration Act 1988 powers. No one is detained merely because he or she is an asylum seeker. Many of the detainees are asylum seekers who have been through the process and have been refused; they are being held for removal. No one recognised as a refugee under the United Nations convention is detained.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister agree that that is a very large figure—much larger than that of most European countries for people in detention under immigration law? Will he take a serious look at the conditions under which many people are held, the state of depression that many of them are suffering and the lack of adequate medical facilities that many of them experience while in detention? Does he not think that this is an expensive and ineffective way in which to assist people, many of whom are deeply traumatised by the experience of seeking asylum in the first place?

Mr. O'Brien: Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons has done a number of reports on detention. Following the publication of the White Paper in July, the Government said that they would introduce an element of judicial oversight to detention decisions in the form of an automatic bail hearing within a week of initial detention, followed by a second hearing for those not granted bail at the first. Detainees will also be given written reasons for their detention.

Following the reports into detention centres by the inspector, examinations and improvements are taking place in detention centres to ensure that those detainees who, regrettably, do have to be held are held in conditions that are satisfactory.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): On that White Paper, will the Minister guarantee that, in relation to the 30,000 applicants being considered under the special schemes that were announced by the Home Secretary, only genuine political refugees will be granted permission to stay in this country?

Mr. O'Brien: The previous Government left tens of thousands of asylum seekers in a backlog for six or more years, many of them on benefit, without the Home Office taking a decision on whether they were refugees. The Tory record was shameful. We are now clearly trying to tidy up the mess that we inherited from the Tories. The Government are opposed to any amnesty—it would be a reward for law breakers. Instead, we have set up two units to consider exceptional leave to remain for the 10,000 in the backlog from before 1993, whose cases have been denied justice through delay, and the 20,000 cases between 1993 and 1995. None of them has ever had his or her asylum case rejected. There is no amnesty. We will process those cases quickly and then consider the post-1995 asylum cases. Instead of scoring mere party political points, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would apologise for his Government's shameful failure to deal with those issues.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it not important that asylum seekers who have suffered degrading treatment and torture should receive priority—people such as those who suffered terrible tortures day after day in Chile under Pinochet? Is it not interesting that, today and on previous days, Tory politicians have shown far more sympathy for Pinochet than for his many victims? Does that not say a lot about the modern Tory party?

Mr. O'Brien: The modern Tory party is a matter of great concern to many members of the modern Tory party, never mind hon. Members. I suspect that Conservative Members have all sorts of views on all sorts of issues, including Mr. Pinochet.

Metropolitan Police

18. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): What plans he has to provide additional resources to the Metropolitan police. [53526]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): No final decisions have been taken about the allocation of funding to the Metropolitan police or other forces for 1999–2000. We expect to announce provisional allocations towards the end of this year.

Dr. Cable: Will the Minister acknowledge that there are extreme recruitment difficulties in the Metropolitan police, in large part because, on current salaries, young police officers simply cannot afford to pay the cost of housing? Will she explain what response she has given to the approaches of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to deal specifically with that problem?

Kate Hoey: That particular problem is always under consideration and will be examined very carefully when we consider the settlement for the coming year.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Following the very welcome proposal and initiative to align the Metropolitan police boundaries with those of the Greater London Authority, what formula does the Minister expect to use to govern the transfer of resources from the Metropolitan police to the constabularies—including Surrey's—that will be affected? Will the formula be made public after it is determined by the Government?

Kate Hoey: That matter, too, is being considered very carefully. The boundary changes will lead to some redistribution of resources, and the matter is being examined carefully and discussed with all the affected police forces. Allocation of police grant will be based on a formula reflecting the relative policing needs of different areas.

Child Prostitution

20. Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): What action he is taking to prevent child prostitution and to assist those young people already drawn into prostitution. [53528]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): In the past, child prostitution has often been tolerated or ignored. This Government are making it clear that child prostitution must be dealt with as a vicious and sordid part of the abuse of children, which is a continuing national disgrace. New guidance to be issued by the Department of Health and the Home Office will stress the need to use the full weight of the criminal law against those who abuse children and the pimps who profit from that abuse.

Ms Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Many people think it incredible that so many children and young people have been allowed to live on the streets of so many of our cities and will welcome his assurance that the Government will deal with that situation. Will he assure the House that the full weight of the criminal law will be speedily and fully brought to bear on those who are exploiting children and young people for sex and for money, so that they are not only deterred but convicted?

Mr. Michael: I take my hon. Friend's point very much to heart. We very much want to make it more possible for children, and other vulnerable witnesses, to give their best evidence in court, to secure the prosecutions that she mentioned. For far too long, it has been possible for people to turn their eyes from that type of abuse at home and abroad. Earlier this month, we hosted a conference of European and Asian countries, at which I was able to announce the Government's intention to follow the recommendations of the Stockholm conference by formulating a national plan to combat child abuse. Several of the building blocks of that plan are now in place.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have the Government told you whether they intend to make a statement either on the current crisis—with all its attendant confusion—in our relations with Chile or on the outcome of the European summit in Austria? The Government are reported to have agreed at that meeting to a massive spending increase, to the harmonisation of taxes and to the integration of Europe's defences. However, there has been no communiqué and no press release on those agreements. Is not the House entitled to some information about what went on in Austria this weekend? Is it not a disgrace that Parliament is once again being treated with utter contempt by the Government?

Madam Speaker: I have not been informed by the Government that they are seeking at this stage to make a statement on either of those issues. As we shall today have a debate on the economy, perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will ask some of his questions during that debate—on which we are about to embark.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No, I shall take no further points of order on that matter. I have dealt with it.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. This morning, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions held a press conference at which it launched the important document on the response to climate change. However, there is not to be a statement on that response. I attempted to make arrangements for a member of our press department to attend the conference but was told that only journalists could attend. Therefore, not only will a statement not be made to the House, but we were not able to attend the conference to listen to the document being launched. Could we have your ruling and views on the matter, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: Yes, certainly. Although it is not for me to decide who is invited to press conferences, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that a written question on the matter was answered on Thursday, stating that the document was a consultative one—which is absolutely correct—and that it would be available in the Vote Office today. It is in the Vote Office today. I am quite satisfied that the Department has carried out all the correct procedures in dealing with a document that has the status of a consultation document.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments) shall apply to proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr. Paddy Ashdown as if this day were one of the Opposition Days allotted under paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 14 (Arrangement of public business).—[Mr. Hall.]

Economy

Madam Speaker: I must inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.34 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I beg to move,

That this House notes that the macro-economic policies of this Government have led to an uncompetitive and unstable pound, high real short-term interest rates and an unbalanced economy, that as a consequence of these problems, and the recent global economic slowdown, economic growth forecasts for the UK for 1999 are being revised downwards and unemployment forecasts are being revised upwards, that jobs in manufacturing industry are already being lost at the rate of over 300 per day and that agricultural employment is also declining sharply; and calls upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to resist pressures and temptations to compromise the operational independence of the Bank of England, recognise the role of fiscal policy in stabilising economic growth in order to avoid excessive reliance on interest rates for such a purpose, make an early Declaration of Intent of the Government's commitment to join the European Single Currency, agree and establish a joint Six-Monthly Report on Convergence by the Treasury and the Bank of England to the Treasury Committee, take further actions to tackle skills shortages, and maintain the recent plans for additional investment in key public services such as the NHS and schools.

I begin by warmly welcoming the Chief Secretary and the Economic Secretary to their new responsibilities. The House is looking forward to the debate and to what they have to say. However, I hope that they will not take it badly or personally if I say that many of us would have preferred it had the Chancellor himself been able to appear before the House. He is, after all, the Chancellor who has given some five Budget-type statements in less than 18 months and who seems to have spent the entire summer travelling around the world, making statements to anyone, anywhere, who would listen to his solution to the world's economic problems. He has lost no opportunity to explain the need to bring down interest rates, apparently unabashed by the fact that he is the Finance Minister of the country that has the highest real interest rates in the western world. Nevertheless, we look forward to the participation, for the first time, of the two newly appointed Ministers.

It is three months since the House had an economic debate. They have been three months of turbulence and uncertainty during which the global financial markets have been in turmoil and our economy has been suffering. Today, many people risk losing, or are losing, their livelihood and their income. They are looking not for excuses from the Government and not just for opportunistic soundbites masquerading as strategy from the official Opposition, but for answers from, and action by, the Government.

Economic commentators are debating whether our economy will grow by 2, 1 or 0 per cent. next year. Whatever the academic theory, we are experiencing serious economic problems in our manufacturing and farming industries.

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way so early in his contribution. Has he seen the figures published at the weekend by the Office for National Statistics, which show that all sectors of the economy, including manufacturing industry, grew more than expected in the third quarter?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Lady is right to say that the overall economy is not in recession. We do not wish to have a recession and are trying to ensure that the Government deal with the existing difficulties in manufacturing and farming in order to ensure that the economy does not move into recession. The people who have lost their jobs, or who face the threat of losing their jobs today or next week, will not be impressed by complacent general statistics. The reality is that, in net terms, we are losing 300 manufacturing jobs a day. The farming industry faces a 50 per cent. drop in incomes, and employment is declining rapidly, too.

I represent a rural constituency in north-east Scotland that is dependent on the oil industry and is suffering from the lowest oil prices since North sea oil exploration began. It is also dependent on a paper industry that is struggling with the consequences of the exchange rate, and on a farming industry devastated by the consequences of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, the collapse of the pig market, poor sheep prices and a poor harvest with depressed grain prices. Whatever is happening to the economy in general, the Government must deal with the problems facing those sectors.

In private, the Government seem to recognise the problems. A report in this week's Sunday Business quoted a "frank" Treasury source as saying:

"Gordon's view"—

clearly, the source is someone very close to the Chancellor—

"is that the Tories have got the attack on us wrong. They are hitting us on . . . the public finances . . . but if they were brighter they would talk about the economy, where we are arguably on shakier ground."

It is absolutely true that the Government are on shakier ground with regard to the economy, and we Liberal Democrats intend to talk about the economy.

Instead of addressing the economic problems that we face, the Chancellor has been attempting to play the blame game. He has argued that our economic problems can be blamed on the world economic slowdown and on incompetent and unproductive businesses and workers. Nobody but a fool would argue that the problems in some developing countries will have no effect on our exporters, but the Chancellor is seriously exaggerating those effects so far.

We should consider that 75 per cent. of our exports go to western Europe and north American where there is no recession and where growth in the past year has been quite robust. The United Kingdom exports more to the Netherlands each year than to Russia, Japan, Hong Kong, South Korea, Thailand, Indonesia, Malaysia, Brazil and Argentina together. So let us address the reality and not the theory.

What about the Government's second favourite target—low productivity? We have had many debates on the subject and we all know that productivity in British industry has been a problem for years. However, a sudden change in productivity does not explain the present difficulties in manufacturing industry and farming. Nobody is suggesting that productivity should not be addressed, but it is not a sudden problem that has caused job losses.

The Government recently had the unpleasant experience of discovering that economic statistics are sometimes seriously inaccurate. There were substantial revisions to the earnings data and the inaccuracies in those earnings data arguably led to an unnecessary increase in interest rates. Will the Chief Secretary address the following question? Given the work recently carried out by economists at the London business school arguing that manufacturing productivity has recently been significantly understated, will the Government undertake to establish an inquiry into whether the productivity figures on which they are basing their analysis are accurate? It is important that, before they consider spending public money on programmes to address the problem, they are sure that they have the correct analysis. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) will return to that later in the debate.

The causes of our present economic problems are not a mystery. They are clearly and simply an uncompetitive and unstable pound and high real interest rates. The pound rose by 37 per cent. against the deutschmark from peak to trough between 1996 and 1998. The Library has calculated that, in real terms, the pound was higher against the deutschmark in the first half of 1998 than at any time since 1985, including during the 1990 recession, when we were in the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): It has gone down.

Mr. Bruce: As the hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position, it has gone down but, despite the recent fall in the pound, we are only back to the 1990 level against the deutschmark and are probably about 20 pfennigs above a fair and sustainable value.

We are also suffering from real short-term interest rates that are the highest in western Europe. Although our nominal interest rates seem relatively low, that is the consequence of low inflation. Our real interest rate—the rate that people are paying on the base rate today—is 5 per cent. and that is higher than the 2 per cent. experienced during the 1990 recession and the 2 per cent. that now prevails across the euro-zone. Therefore, the two problems of high interest rates and a high exchange rate are intimately connected.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the reason why the exchange rate has been so high—it is now lower than when we came to office—is the international confidence in the management of the British economy? In an uncertain world with problems in Asia and indeed in Europe and elsewhere, the only way to bring down the exchange rate would be to bring about a complete loss of confidence in the British economy by voting in the Liberals.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman was obviously so eager to intervene that he did not listen to a word I was saying. I was about to suggest that a 5 per cent. real interest rate against a 2 per cent. real interest rate was an incentive to hold sterling and is the reason why, in the short term, sterling's value has been forced up. If the hon. Gentleman does not believe that, he knows nothing about international financial markets and, as he claims to support the Government, perhaps they should be wary of that kind of support.

Labour cannot pass the buck on the current high exchange rates and high interest rates, because they are the consequence of Government economic policies.

They did too little to cool the consumer sector and have created a seriously unbalanced economy in which the means of slowing growth—the high pound and interest rates—are bearing down on those sectors that least need restraining.

Mr. Davies rose—

Maria Eagle rose—

Mr. Bruce: I have already given way to both hon. Members.

The Chancellor is not now acknowledging the problem. He has got his acolytes to come along today and has not turned up himself. However, he acknowledged the problem publicly in his first Budget. He said:

"Britain cannot afford a recurrence of the all-too-familiar pattern of previous recoveries"

He went on to explain:

"there is now an imbalance between strong growth in the consumer and service sector and weak growth in the manufacturing and exporting sector. . . My goal, therefore, is to ease inflationary pressures without damage to industrial and exporting prospects. . . . In this way, we can moderate the upward pressure on interest rates and on the exchange rate".—[Official Report, 2 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 304-05.]

The Chancellor had the analysis right. He had the right diagnosis, but prescribed the wrong cure—extra taxes on businesses and savers. As a consequence, the pound rose to a new high within days and interest rates went up again. I should hate to have the Chancellor as my surgeon, because he acts as though, if he treated someone with a hernia, he would give that person a heart bypass.

The imbalance in the economy, which the Chancellor analysed correctly, has got worse. It was exacerbated by the decision to go on dithering on the single currency and to rule out membership in this Parliament. The Chancellor has talked tough about ending boom and bust—he talks of little else. He has done many good things that we have supported, such as giving operational independence to the Bank of England.

Mr. Skinner: I do not agree with that.

Mr. Bruce: Sometimes constructive opposition crosses the Floor.

However, the Chancellor has failed to address the instability created for our economy and for our exporters by a high and volatile pound—it has been up and down and nobody knows where it is going to settle—and by high real interest rates. The failure to address our economic problems, combined with a deteriorating global economy, threatens growth prospects next year. No doubt we shall hear evidence of that in the Chancellor's statement in the next week or so. It is clear that the Chancellor will have to revise his borrowing forecasts upwards when he presents his pre-Budget report next week.

However, we should keep matters in perspective. Our objective ought to be avoiding recession. Labour Members should agree with that. Last week's gross domestic product figures show that the economy, particularly the service sector, is continuing to grow. I acknowledge the points that have been made in interventions on that. Inflation is low and we have a tight inflation target. We support that. It should be possible to ease monetary policy and to lean against recessionary forces. That is common ground.

Recessions usually occur when high inflation prevents policy from being eased in that way, so there are optimistic signs. Growth this year is likely to come in above the Chancellor's most recent forecast, leading to lower-than-expected borrowing this year. With a moderate slowdown in growth, all the signs are that the golden rule could still be met.

The key for the public finances—before Labour Members get too complacent—is to avoid an outright recession and to rebalance the economy. If we fail to do that, the golden rule could come under pressure.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The hon. Gentleman is weaving a tangled web for himself. He referred fleetingly to the effect of additional business taxation, but then regrettably changed the subject almost immediately. Given that the Liberal Democrat motion refers—cryptically and, I fear, euphemistically—to the role of fiscal policy in stabilising economic growth, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House by how much he would like to increase taxation, above the increases for which the Government have already provided, over the course of this Parliament?

Mr. Bruce: I shall certainly deal with that—if the hon. Gentleman will allow me—in the appropriate context.

There is no room for complacency because, general recession or not, there are already serious problems in manufacturing and farming, as I have described. It is not overstating the case to say that there is a crisis in those sectors. If the economy suffers a full-blown recession, they will bear the brunt of the losses. Manufacturing is already losing more than 300 jobs net a day. Leading indicators of industrial prospects suggest that things will get very much worse next year.

We face a serious recession in manufacturing. The House of Commons Library forecasts that that will destroy 420,000 jobs over two years. That is very similar to the prediction made only today by Ernst and Young of 500,000 job losses. Ernst and Young identify the problem as the "fundamental mismatch between monetary and fiscal policy . . . which has led to unnaturally high interest rates unfairly penalising manufacturers at the expense of booming service industries."

The forecasted job losses would reduce manufacturing employment—this is a startling figure—to levels not seen in Britain for 150 years. [Interruption.] I am astonished that Labour Members think that that is funny. The forecasted job losses would mean cutting into industrial muscle, not just fat; this is not just a shake-out. My hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) will speak later about the situation in farming, which is perhaps even more serious. If job losses continue at the recent rate, more than 50,000 more farming jobs will be gone before the end of the century. Job losses in the two sectors alone could amount to more than 500,000. That is why we need action.

What should we do? In taking account of the intervention of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), I would prefer to resist the temptation to pay too much attention to the official Opposition's pronouncements on those matters. What an utter shambles they have become. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] At least I have some support from those on the Labour Benches. The official Opposition have had 18 months to think of something to say, but they are still clueless. They cannot even decide who should set interest rates—let alone at what level they should be set. They blame recession on a minimum wage and spending rises without appearing to realise that such policies have not even been implemented yet. They accuse the Government of profligacy yet, in power, they increased current spending at twice the rate that this Government have planned. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is boasting of the fact that he is holding down spending more than the Tories ever did. The Tories say that they would cut spending in general, and pledge only to raise it in the particular.

[Mr. Bruce]

The Tories accuse the Government of fiscal laxity yet, according to the House of Commons Library, they broke the golden rule by an absolutely staggering £147.7 billion in the previous Parliament alone. They have in fact just one economic policy: to be twice as undecided as the Government on the single currency. That is not any kind of alternative. The shadow Treasury team sounds like the only group of politicians that could be trusted to make an even bigger mess of the Indonesian economy.

Our alternative would be to focus on four key areas. [Interruption.] I say to Labour Members that, however much I believe in the long term, the crisis is now and action is required today. First, my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West, who will be called later to move the second motion, will set out in some detail proposed help for the farming industry. Secondly, we need a strategy to bring down interest rates, and that does not mean bullying the Bank of England—something that Bank officials who were quoted in the Financial Times on 7 October suggested took place before the previous Monetary Policy Committee meeting. Nor should that be achieved by reversing the operational independence of the Bank. To bring down interest rates, we need to ensure that fiscal policy helps, rather than hinders, the process of cutting interest rates. It would be far better if the next Budget were followed by lower interest rates than if it contained lower consumer taxes. If that means delaying the much-trailed 10p tax rate, so be it.

The third priority must be an early commitment to single currency membership. Anticipating the arguments that I already hear from Conservative Members, I ask hon. Members to consider the article in today's Financial Times, which says that the car industry warns of a bleak future if the United Kingdom fails to join the European single currency. That almost exactly echoes the words said by the President of the Board of Trade only a week last Sunday.

A strategy to cut interest rates would mean a strategy to bring them down to the European level of 3 per cent. That is one of the reasons why we have argued for the establishment of a joint report on convergence by the Treasury and the Bank of England, to be presented twice a year to the Select Committee on the Treasury. Such an explicit process would lead to a more deliberate policy of harmonising fiscal and monetary policy and a strategy of reducing our interest rates. Surely, both would be good for business and exports.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): What the hon. Gentleman suggests—bringing interest rates down to the European level—would cost between £30 billion and £60 billion. That means 20p on the basic rate of taxation. Is that what he is proposing?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Lady appears not only to have surfed the internet, but to have headed off into the galaxy with that information. That is preposterous.

In the course of a debate in the House, I have no problem with people trying to undermine the Liberal Democrat argument. However, it is not only our view, but the view of an increasing number of commentators outside the House, that there is an imbalance in the economy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he wants Britain to join the euro and that he accepts that that requires convergence of inflation rates, interest rates and exchange rates; yet, for the past 18 months, he has been pursuing a strategy that has widened the gap on all three. He clearly cannot be serious about his endgame, if he is not prepared to apply himself to the policy that would get him there. We are setting out exactly how he might achieve that end.

When they came to power, the Government promised an end to boom and bust. They assured us that things could only get better. However, for a large part of our economy, the Government's macro-economic policy has produced a severe bust, and things are getting far worse. Instead of playing the blame game, let us now hear what the Government propose to do to turn the situation around and save jobs, secure investment and promote growth.

In the three months since the House last met, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been to the International Monetary Fund, to the Economic and Finance Council and to most of the capitals of the world—he has hardly had time to come home and wash a shirt. He has embarked on a campaign to suggest that we need a dramatic reduction in interest rates. I should have thought that there would be resounding applause for such a strategy from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Will the Chief Secretary tell us how and when the Chancellor, instead of lecturing the rest of the world, is going to implement domestic policies that will deliver lower real interest rates, a competitive pound and an end to the threat of losing half a million manufacturing jobs in the next two years? We await an answer.

3.58 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"notes that the Government inherited an economy in which public sector net borrowing was £28 billion, inflation was set to rise sharply above target because of the failure of the previous Government to take the necessary action on interest rates; recalls that the previous Government presided over a boom and bust economy where interest rates reached 15 per cent. and inflation reached 10 per cent., doubled the national debt in the 1990s, worsened inequality and failed to tackle the weaknesses in the British economy; commends the actions of this Government which is steering a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world, has established a credible framework for monetary policy that has led to the lowest long-term interest rates in 35 years, and inflation hitting its 2.5 per cent. target, and has taken tough action to cut government borrowing by £20 billion; and welcomes the increase in employment of 400,000 since the election, the launch of the New Deal, reform of the tax and benefit system to tackle unemployment and poverty traps, support for British business through cuts in corporation tax and small business tax to their lowest levels ever, and the extra investment of £40 billion in education and health over the next three years."

On behalf of the Economic Secretary and myself, I thank the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) for his kind remarks on our appointment and our fresh responsibilities, which we intend to discharge in the interests of the country.

As we debate the state of our economy, there is a responsibility on all of us to strike the right balance. We must ensure that we do not talk down our economy and that we recognise the challenges that we face as a result of the worldwide slowdown in economic growth. I therefore want to make an honest, realistic assessment of the state of our economy, which acknowledges rather than runs away from the fact that, within sectors, certain areas are suffering hardship.

We must recognise also the underlying strengths in our economy, which were reflected just last Friday in the gross domestic product figures for the third quarter of this year, which revealed that there had been growth across all sectors. That demonstrates that, as a result of the Government's policies, we are able to steer a course of stability in an increasingly unstable and uncertain world.

At the beginning of this debate, it is worth considering for a few minutes the position that we inherited on 1 May last year.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to strike a balance between not talking down the economy and not being seen to deny the fears of people in the manufacturing sector who are losing their jobs? There are also fears in areas such as my constituency, which has one of the highest unemployment rates in the country, where people know that without real growth and a cut in unemployment, they have no chance of getting back to work.

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend will be aware that, in her constituency in the east end of London and in my constituency in the north-east of England, there are now more people in work than there were on 1 May last year. I am sure that she will join me in congratulating the Government on that fact.

Ms Abbott: I accept what my right hon. Friend says, but does he share my concern that, although 1,808 people in Hackney have passed through the new deal programme, which is one of the Government's key strategies for getting people in areas such as Hackney back to work, fewer than 170 of them are now in jobs? The new deal cannot work in a recession, when there is an absence of growth.

Mr. Byers: I am sure that the 170 people in Hackney who have gained work and high-quality training as a result of the new deal are pleased that we implemented that policy. I say to my hon. Friend that manufacturing will benefit only if we take a long-term view of our economic prospects and do not take short-term measures, which may grab a headline today, but do not provide lasting growth for the future.

The short-termist approach of the Conservative Government meant that we inherited not a golden legacy, but an economy with serious fundamental weaknesses. Inflation was set to rise; there was chronic under-investment; consumer spending was growing at an unsustainable rate; and productivity was low. We had a weak skills base and the value of sterling was artificially high. In addition, our public finances were running out of control. The national debt had doubled under the previous Government to £400 billion and public sector net borrowing was £28 billion.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: In a moment.

During the 18 years that the Conservative party was in government, Britain had lower growth than any other major industrialised country and suffered two major recessions. We do not need to look back 18 years to examine the Tory legacy. We could turn the clock back just eight years to when the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), was a Treasury Minister. I regret that he is not here this afternoon. [HON. MEMBERS: "Neither is the Chancellor."] The shadow Chancellor does not have to prepare a pre-Budget report—the Chancellor does.

What is our golden legacy from the shadow Chancellor's time as a Treasury Minister eight years ago? Let us turn back the clock. Interest rates were at 15 per cent.; inflation was at 10 per cent.; 1 million manufacturing jobs were lost as output in manufacturing fell by over 7 per cent.; unemployment rose by more than 1 million; and 1 million people suffered the misery of negative equity. That is hardly a glittering record for the shadow Chancellor. There was no surprise, therefore, at the verdict of the electors of Warwickshire, North who voted the right hon. Gentleman out of office.

Mr. Tyrie: The Chief Secretary has repeated the mantra of how debt as a proportion of gross domestic product increased under the previous Government. Is he aware that the level of debt as a proportion of GDP has fallen since 1980—in other words, in the course of the previous Conservative Administration—and that Britain is almost the only country in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development that succeeded in reducing its debt as a proportion of GDP?

Mr. Byers: I am afraid that that intervention reveals a degree of complacency among Conservative Members that was reflected by the previous Conservative Government. I do not find it acceptable that we spend more in this country repaying debt interest than we spend on our schools. The previous Government were prepared to accept that situation, but this Government are not. That is why we have set about reducing the public finance deficit.

When this Government came to office in May last year, we faced an economy set to repeat the same old cycle of boom and bust. There was no golden legacy, but the worst effects of 18 years of short-termism: playing party politics with interest rates; borrowing today and hoping that tomorrow would never arrive; and failing to address the skills gap and the need to improve productivity.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I do not cavil at my right hon. Friend's speech, or at his Government's policies. However, today I visited the large Kimberly-Clark factory in my constituency which is to close. There will also be 200 redundancies at the modern optical fibres factory in my constituency and promulgated steel redundancies at Shotton steelworks. May I meet my right hon. Friend to tell him of my constituents' concerns and about the £400 million proposed investment in Deeside that was announced just this year? I would be grateful for a meeting with the Chief Secretary so that I may highlight the concerns of those who are about to lose their jobs.

Mr. Byers: I would be more than pleased to meet my hon. Friend and discuss the situation in his constituency that he has outlined. As I said in my introduction, it reflects the fact that certain areas within sectors are facing hardship. I recognise that fact and I do not run away from it. This Government will not turn their back on my hon. Friend's constituents, but will want to work with local employers to find a way forward and a means of offering new jobs and opportunities to those who are affected by the changes that my hon. Friend has outlined.

When Labour took office, we had to take tough action to tackle the difficulties that our economy faced. In the light of unsustainable growth, rising inflationary pressure and high public borrowing, we have put in place a platform of stability on which to build an economy that is capable of sustained and steady growth. We established a new and more credible framework for monetary policy by giving independence to the Bank of England in setting interest rates. Interest rate decisions are now taken in line with the long-term needs of the British economy rather than the short-term political considerations of a particular political party. As a result, inflation is at its target of 2½ per cent. and Britain now has the lowest long-term interest rates for 35 years.

However, the independence that we have given to the Bank of England in setting interest rates has caused confusion among Conservative Members. The Leader of the Opposition declared that he opposed independence, and said:

"They have given up control of interest rates when they should have kept hold of them."

That view is shared by the shadow Trade and Industry Secretary. However, the deputy Leader of the Opposition has said that no knee-jerk decisions should be taken regarding the independence of the Bank of England. That reflected the views of the shadow Chancellor a few weeks ago, who said that taking back control over interest rates was "not a decision to rush into."

However, last week, the shadow Chancellor said that he, too, opposed Bank of England independence. He said:

"We would not have given up control of interest rates in the first place".

So there is a degree of confusion on the part of the shadow Chancellor.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I welcome the Minister's strong, robust reaffirmation of the Government's decision to make the Bank of England independent, but will he explain why, given that independence, the Chancellor of the Exchequer feels it necessary to give the Bank unsolicited advice on interest rates?

Mr. Byers: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the evidence that the Governor of the Bank of England, Eddie George, gave the Treasury Select Committee a few days ago, when he said clearly on the record that he did not feel under any pressure from the Chancellor of the Exchequer over his decision making on interest rates.

Ms Abbott: My right hon. Friend will accept, though, that the fact that the redoubtable Eddie George does not feel under any pressure does not mean that pressure was not applied.

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend knows that Eddie George is a robust character. Occasionally, he may feel under pressure, but, last week, he said clearly that it did not affect his decision making. That is the important point in this context. It is to be expected that, at times, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will express views about these important matters. However, the important point is that the decision-making process no longer rests with party politicians, whether it be the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the House; it now rests with the Bank of England and its Monetary Policy Committee.

In addition to tackling the issue of interest rates, we have had to tackle the difficulties that we found regarding public finances. In our first year in office, we reduced borrowing by £20 billion. In the first six months of this year, borrowing was reduced by a further £10 billion. We have also set out our spending plans for the next three years. A central feature of our new spending regime is the fact that we have built in margins to cover uncertainties, including the risk of slower growth and its effect on revenues.

As a result of our prudent management of public finances—including last year's £20 billion cut in the deficit—we are on track to meet our strict fiscal rules, while maintaining our commitment to an additional £40 billion for improvements in health and education over the next three years.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Given the recent downward revisions to gross domestic product forecasts, can the Chief Secretary tell the House by how much his forecast for public borrowing will increase, compared with the Red Book, in the years 1999, 2000 and 2001?

Mr. Byers: As the hon. Gentleman knows, a week tomorrow, the Chancellor will produce his pre-Budget report, and that will be the time for our new forecast for growth to be revealed. However, I can tell the hon. Gentleman, because he has asked an important question, that the margins that we built into our spending programmes at the time of the comprehensive spending review will be sufficient to cover our commitment of £40 billion extra spending for health and education.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Byers: Just a second.

Labour Members need to know whether the Conservative party opposes the £40 billion for health and education. The Leader of the Opposition says that it is "reckless". The shadow Chancellor says that it is foolish. However, the shadow—

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Byers: I want to make this point. The shadow Education Minister, the hon. Member for Havant

(Mr. Willetts), says that it is not enough. The shadow Health Secretary, the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), says that it is not "a generous settlement for our health service", but

"a let down."

The Opposition must state their policies clearly. Is it reckless spending, or is it under-investment in health and education? The Opposition have refused consistently to say whether they are in favour of the additional spending or not. The Leader of the Opposition says that he is against it, and that it is reckless.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): What about welfare?

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): The answer just came from a sedentary position, from the shadow Treasury Bench. Is not the truth that the Tories want to cut pensions and benefits, but that they are not prepared to go on television and tell the people that?

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend is right. When hon. Members have a chance to look at the spending on welfare, they will see clearly that three specific areas receive the bulk of the increase that was outlined in the comprehensive spending review. The increase is targeted at pensioners, the sick and disabled, and children. The Opposition must come clean and say for which of those three categories they would cut the increase.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Byers: No, I have taken seven interventions already and I want to make progress.

We must ensure that the money that we spend is targeted on the areas that need it. The shadow Chancellor may say that the extra spending is reckless, and that it is foolish, but he should try telling that to parents whose six-year-old son or daughter is in a class of 40, or to pensioners who have been told that they will have to endure another two years of agony before they can have the benefits of a hip replacement operation.

Parents and patients do not regard our extra £40 billion spending on schools and hospitals as foolish. They see it as an investment—a reflection of the Government's priorities—which is essential to building a modern Britain and a decent society.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to make progress.

No debate on our economy at present can ignore the world situation. With one quarter of the world now in recession, including Japan—the world's second largest economy—no country is immune from the effects of the current instability in the global economy.

The International Monetary Fund has revised down its forecast for world growth next year from nearly 4 to 2.5 per cent. It expects world trade growth to fall by two thirds this year. Britain's export markets are set to grow more slowly.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to make progress. I shall give way in a few minutes.

We have experienced the opportunities that flow from the new age of globalisation. We have benefited from the accelerating integration of the international economy. Now we must manage it through more difficult times. Our shared commitment to open trade and orderly progress among the G7 nations has been a driving force for growth, even in countries that not so long ago seemed likely to be permanently left behind.

Now that trend is stalled, and in some places reversed, but I believe that it is only a temporary setback, not a permanent condition. I believe that the essential answer to the problems of the moment is not less globalisation—not new national structures to separate and isolate economies—but stronger international structures to make globalisation work in harder times as well as in good times. Our urgent need is for closer co-operation, continuing dialogue and an unwavering commitment to open commerce. We must not let temporary instability put global progress at risk.

Mr. Loughton rose—

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Byers: No, I still want to make some more progress.

As the economic weather turns, as a storm in one region threatens to spread, there are easy but dangerous shelters: a return to protectionism, the breakdown of co-operation and the rise of beggar-thy-neighbour policies—but that will only make matters worse and will not lead to renewed growth.

Protectionism anywhere is a threat to prosperity everywhere. Closing off national economies only increases national and international instability. In Asia, across the world and in the United Kingdom, it is the poorest and the most vulnerable members of society who suffer most from financial crisis and stagnation.

We make no apology for taking the lead in seeking to achieve the objectives that will lead to great co-operation and sustainable world growth. It is vital to do that to ensure that employment opportunities continue to grow.

Mr. Loughton rose—

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Byers: I have a wonderful selection. I shall go for piggy in the middle.

Mr. Bercow: That was an extremely courteous description. I congratulate the Chief Secretary on his well-deserved promotion to the Cabinet. He will be aware that, in Labour's business manifesto published in April 1997, his right hon. Friend the current Chancellor stated:

"We will not impose burdensome regulations on business, because we understand that successful businesses must keep costs down."

How does the right hon. Gentleman square that ringing declaration with the evidence in the report just published by the accountants Chantrey Vellacott, which estimates that regulatory costs to business by May 1999 will be at least £5 billion or 17.3 per cent. higher than when Labour took office?

Mr. Byers: I do not know how much that report cost the hon. Gentleman, but we know that accountants come up with these reports at regular intervals.

Mr. Bercow: I was given it.

Mr. Byers: The report was given to the hon. Gentleman. He should know better than to quote with authority freebies that might be handed out to him. The reality is that the Government have costed the introduction of a variety of measures. I know that Opposition Members disagree with some of them. However, we believe that it is in the long-term interest that some of these provisions are introduced into our economy. I shall talk later about some of the possible solutions to our difficulties that are being put forward by Opposition Members. Before I do that, and before the Treasury and the Government have costed the implications of such solutions, I must say that there is no relationship between our figures and the fantasy figures that have been quoted by Opposition Members.

Mr. Loughton: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: No. I want to make some progress. I shall give way in a minute or two.

I want to talk about the employment that has been created. We are talking of 400,000 extra jobs since May 1997. I recognise that there have been some high-profile job losses. Many companies have cited current difficulties in the world economy, and those alone, for closures that might have been experienced. However, whatever the reasons for job losses, whether they be in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), my constituency or elsewhere in the country, we on the Government Benches recognise that they are a personal tragedy for the individuals concerned, for their families and for their communities.

That is why the Government, unlike our Tory predecessors, will act positively to do what we can. There will be no turning our backs on people who become the victims of decisions that result in job losses. That is why we shall provide practical help at a local level, with training opportunities, advice on self-employment and payment of the costs of travelling to job interviews.

During the election campaign, we said that we would govern for the many and not for the few. In particular, we wanted both the young unemployed and the long-term unemployed to feel that they had a place and a role within our society. That is why we launched our new deal—the biggest employment programme for a generation. It was launched in the teeth of opposition from the Conservative party. Already, more than 140,000 young people have been helped into work and high-quality training opportunities. Although the Liberals spoke warm words about the new deal, they opposed our windfall tax which made it possible. We shall take that as a further £5 billion spending commitment from the Liberals. It is another one to add to the list.

The hon. Member for Gordon, in moving the Liberal Democrat motion, raised the question of productivity. Any honest and realistic assessment of our economy will show that there are a number of fundamental weaknesses that have held it back for too long, and one of those is our low level of productivity. I take the point that the hon. Gentleman made about figures from the London business school. Next week, with the pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will specifically address issues related to productivity. We are confident that our figures, which show that we are falling behind our major competitors on productivity, are accurate. However, we shall examine the figures to which the hon. Member for Gordon has referred to ascertain whether, in the light of them, we need to revise our forecast. I have to say that given the work that has been done so far, our figures reveal an unacceptable productivity gap between us and our major competitors.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has just said. I am sure that he would agree that, if the Government have it in mind to put money into schemes to boost productivity, we must be sure that we have the facts right. We all acknowledge the productivity gap, but it has not suddenly become worse, and that is really the problem. Will the right hon. Gentleman address how long British manufacturing industry must continue with an interest rate that is 3 per cent. higher in real terms than that of our continental competitors? Can he give any indication of when convergence might be achieved, and how?

Mr. Byers: I am happy to discuss productivity. Long-term interest rates are at their lowest level for 35 years. We hope that interest rates have peaked at 7½ per cent. and that they are on their way down. Announcements from the Bank of England have shown that the balance of risks has now changed in respect of inflation. I hope that significant decisions will be made in the next few weeks. I am guarded in what I say because, if I say something, it will be regarded as putting pressure on the Governor of the Bank of England and I would not want to do that.

The Government's productivity agenda must be seen as a fundamental part of modernising our economy. It is not about working harder, but about working better—working with world-class investment, technology, skills and management. That is why we have established a new investing in Britain fund, which will nearly double net public capital investment in this country in the next three years, and a root-and-branch reform of our education system to drive up standards.

None the less, it is not just how much we invest, but what we do with investment that is vital. Ultimately, it is business, not Government, that will close the productivity gaps, although the Government have a central role. That role includes getting the competitive framework right, underpinning the effective workings of capital markets and providing the right education and training to enable business to deliver a world-class performance. It also includes pulling down unnecessary barriers that hold Britain's companies back. Next week's pre-Budget report will take that agenda forward and build on work to strengthen the country's productivity potential.

It is instructive that, faced with world turmoil and global downturn, the Opposition's response has been to resurrect tired old Tory policies, clinging on to them like a comfort blanket. They include rejection of the national minimum wage and, in the process, condemning 2 million people to continued poverty pay; opposition to the social chapter, which provides a minimum entitlement in the work place; and objection to the working time directive. With a quarter of the world in recession, is that a serious response?

In the past few weeks, the Conservative party has gone much further in policy development. The former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), warned politicians about commitments made on a wet night in Dudley. I know that we have had some pretty bad weather recently, but that advice has clearly not been heeded by the shadow Chancellor, the shadow Trade and Industry Secretary or the shadow Social Security Secretary. Between them, those three have committed the Tory party against the working families tax credit, which will make work pay for up to 1.5 million families with children. They would not spend £40 billion over three years on schools and hospitals. The new deal would be scrapped, denying hope to tens of thousands of young and long-term unemployed people. They would also take away the Bank of England's independence and play politics with interest rates.

What we have witnessed in the past few weeks has not been a coherent and thought-out response, but political positioning to be the new darling of the right. It has been about personal ambition, and nothing to do with the national interest. The result is a significant lurch to the right. The Tory party is now the party that likes to say no—no to the social chapter, to the working time directive, to the national minimum wage, to independence for the Bank of England, to the working families tax credit, to the new deal for the unemployed and to an extra £40 billion for schools and hospitals. As a result, it is a party with no chance of winning the next general election.

The Labour Government have put in place a comprehensive economic strategy to ensure that we can steer a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world. The questions that we face are complex and difficult, but in all our debates and policy making, we must never forget that they are also human questions. They involve people's living standards as well as the level of financial transactions. They involve not only the value of capital, trade or investment, but the deepest values of our society.

We must make markets work, in tough as well as easy times. That is the burden and responsibility of all in the Government. It is a responsibility that we intend to discharge so that, together, our country and our people can meet the challenges that lie ahead.

4.29 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): This is the first time that the new Chief Secretary has come to the Dispatch Box, and I join others in congratulating him on taking up his new post.

The Chief Secretary's job is important in any Government, and I look forward to debating economic matters with the right hon. Gentleman on many occasions, but his speech was a gigantic missed opportunity. He said nothing that we had not already heard from the previous Chief Secretary, and he should have used the debate at least to say something about what has happened to this economy and others in the past three months, and what sorely needed policy changes we can expect.

The Chief Secretary started hopefully by saying that he was about to make an honest and realistic assessment of the economy, but then immediately started to rewrite history and deny the existence of the golden economic legacy that he was bequeathed by the previous Government. We know—it is a matter of record, not of opinion—that we left the incoming Government with steady growth, falling unemployment and low inflation. All those achievements are now at risk or are in reverse.

The Chief Secretary asserted that the previous Administration left him with a deteriorating inflation target. That is not true; we met our target of 2.5 per cent. or less by the end of the Parliament. The policy mistakes committed last year, in the Government's first Budget, reversed that inflation record and gave the whole burden of controlling inflation to the Bank of England, which put up interest rates and caused a lot of other problems in turn.

I do not believe that the novelty of the Chief Secretary's position or his unfamiliarity with the brief produced such a shallow and unconvincing speech. Rather, the Government's whole economic strategy has become unsustainable. It was based on a growth forecast of at least 2 per cent. in this and every future year. All their spending commitments and borrowing forecasts were based on that growth prediction.

Today, no one believes that that growth will occur, and the Government do not believe that that will happen. Three weeks ago, the Chancellor told the International Monetary Fund in Washington that British growth forecasts are too optimistic. We know that the IMF has a special place in Labour hearts—it bailed out the previous Labour Government—but it is a scandal that the Chancellor of the Exchequer chose a meeting with the IMF in America to inform it about the British economy when he will not come to this House to tell us what is happening. He should tell us how the forecasts on which the Budget and the expenditure commitments were based have become largely fictitious.

Instead of a statement, a debate or some information from the Chief Secretary today, we have been given unattributable press briefings from the unofficial press spokesmen at the Treasury. In the City and throughout the private sector it is illegal for a firm to give selective briefings about price-sensitive information in its possession to third parties, but that is what the Treasury unofficial press spokesmen have been doing all through the recess up to today's debate.

All this secrecy and the dribbling out of little bits of news here and there come from a Government who came into office committed, so we were told, to openness and accountability. We remember all that waffle they cited in opposition about a Labour Government who would give the public all the information to which they had a right. The Government produced a White Paper last December entitled "Your Right to Know", but that has been quietly forgotten.

Even more recently, "The Code for Fiscal Stability", which was published last March, said that the Government would not withhold information on the conduct of fiscal policy and the state of the public finances except if substantial harm would benefit. What harm can possibly follow from the Government giving to the rest of the world information and internal Treasury forecasts already in their possession?

Mr. Geraint Davies: On the issue of disclosure, would the right hon. Gentleman disclose what the official Conservative position is on the expenditure of £40 billion on health and education? Would expenditure on welfare be cut? If so, where? What is the Conservative party's position on the Bank of England? Would interest rates be left in the hands of the Government? Why has the shadow Chancellor taken so long to attend the debate? Has he been in Asda?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman has obviously already forgotten that we voted against the Bank of England Bill on Second and Third Reading. We also argued against its provisions in Standing Committee. If the hon. Gentleman wants the answer to one of his questions, he should refer to the record.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: This is an important issue, because the Bill to make the Bank of England independent is now an Act, and is a matter of law. Is the Conservative party committed to taking the Bank of England back under political control—yes or no.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It was the Government who broke their election promise. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he would not give interest rate decisions to the Bank of England until it had established a proven track record, but, within days of taking office, he broke that promise and introduced a Bill that we voted against. I would have preferred it if the Liberal Democrats had assisted us in holding the Government to their election promise. I will tell the House what we will do at the next election when the Government tell us when they will keep the promises that they made at the election.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why cannot we get a straight answer to this question? We keep seeing Tory spokesmen on television being asked that simple question. Will the Tories take the Bank of England back under political control? That is all we need to know. Can we have a clear answer of yes or no, and put an end to all the waffling at the Dispatch Box?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We will give the hon. Gentleman some of the answers he seeks when he apologises for deceiving the electors in his constituency. He stood on a manifesto and a promise not to give independence to the Bank of England, but within days of taking his seat in the current Parliament he broke that promise. When will the hon. Gentleman apologise for that?

At the time of the comprehensive spending review in July, we said that it was reckless to lock the economy into a three-year spending commitment with annual increases of more than 3 per cent. a year in real terms.

Maria Eagle rose—

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Events have shown that we were right. We also pointed out that the extravagance of the expenditure forecasts were due to another central failing by the Government: their failure to reform social security expenditure. It is significant that the Chief Secretary, in his speech, was already sliding on that commitment. We used to have it from the Government—indeed, from the Prime Minister—that welfare reform was right on moral grounds to end dependency on the state. It was also essential, so the Prime Minister assured us, to find the extra money to spend on health and education from a reduction in the welfare budget. It is significant that all the Chief Secretary spoke about were the problems, and the fact that that would not be possible after all.

That is why we called the overall expenditure commitment up to three years hence irresponsible and unsustainable, and we were right to do so. Since then, growth has more than halved.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I will give way one last time.

Mr. Beard: The right hon. Gentleman made much of the possibility of a recession, but went on to outline a policy of cutting Government spending, and thus cutting demand even further. If a recession is pending, such action will make it worse. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary proposes that we continue spending, to boost demand and counter the recession. The Opposition policy will deepen any recession, not cure it.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I gave way to the hon. Gentleman because I had seen him on one or two Finance Bill Standing Committees, and thought that I would hear a more informed intervention. Once more, I was disappointed.

The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. If the Government had listened to what we were saying about unsustainable spending commitments, and if they had reformed welfare as a precondition of all their other expenditure ambitions, the Bank of England would not have had to go on raising interest rates. Industry, business and the economy generally are now paying for earlier mistakes that we pointed out. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to suppose that anything that I would have done, then or now, would make the recession worse.

We would not be where we are today under the Conservatives. We would not have had the last two Budgets. During the debates on those Budgets, we warned of the dangers that the Government were risking. That is why there is now a serious possibility of a £36 billion increase in borrowing over the next three years—and that is by no means the most gloomy forecast: some recently published independent predictions speak of zero growth for next year. The £36 billion could represent the lower end of the estimates.

The Chief Secretary referred to some mythical margin of prudence built into the expenditure review. I know that the right hon. Gentleman has been in his job for only about three months, but he need only read "The Code for Fiscal Stability", and the other documents that were published at the time of the comprehensive spending review, to realise that no margin has been built in. I refer the right hon. Gentleman to page 43 of "Stability and Investment for the long term". Over the coming years, borrowing is already set to rise by at least £4 billion every year. That is extremely serious when considered alongside the new black hole that is opening up in the form of £36 billion of extra borrowing—or more, according to some scenarios.

Mr. Tyrie: May I make a point about the alleged margins built into the spending plans? The Chief Secretary seemed to be completely unaware that his Government had announced the lowest level of reserves as a proportion of gross domestic product that had ever been announced, certainly in living memory. The margin, in as much as it exists, was dangerously small even before the growth forecast was drastically altered a few weeks ago.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is right. The comprehensive spending review was already risky, and, with the halving—at least—of the growth forecast, it has gone into the danger zone.

Maria Eagle: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I will give way in a moment.

It is no good saying, as the Chief Secretary did, that all will be revealed in the pre-Budget statement. We had a pre-Budget statement last year, and there was nothing worth while in that. Meanwhile, savers and borrowers want to know what will happen to Government debt. Businesses need to plan. Will all the growth in the economy be pre-empted by the public sector? Will the Government have to go on putting up taxes on businesses? People want answers to those questions today. The figures exist in the Treasury; why are they not being given to the House of Commons?

Maria Eagle rose—

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Perhaps the hon. Lady has an answer.

Maria Eagle: It is not my responsibility, but I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way to me at long last. Perhaps that represents the triumph of persistence.

Given his concern about excessive commitments to public spending, can the right hon. Gentleman explain just what the Opposition would cut?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have made that clear to the hon. Lady, but she need not take it from me; she can read the record. Back in July, we were saying that locking into a three-year commitment of that magnitude was irresponsible, given the Government's abject and continuing failure to deliver on their promise to reform the welfare state.

I am not asking the Government to do anything that we did not do. Over the past four years, social security expenditure has been stable, under the Conservatives and in relation to the expenditure forecasts that we left behind. During those four years, it rose by a total of only 1.5 per cent. in real terms. All the Government had to do was continue what we were achieving; instead, in their own comprehensive spending review, they have committed themselves to an annual real-terms increase of 3.3 per cent. in the social security budget. That, when added to all the other expenditure commitments, is reckless and unsustainable. We said so at the time, and we have been proved right.

What does the Chief Secretary do? He does not give us any new figures; he has no plan to sort the matter out. Instead, he simply blames business for everything. Meanwhile, job losses mount. Productivity is the new problem. It used to be the Asians who were at fault; then it was the Russians; then it was the banking system. The new problems are all caused by greedy management and lazy workers. Meanwhile, on the shop floor in our constituencies, in businesses and workplaces, job losses mount. I believe that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) mentioned the Ernst and Young report, which predicts half a million extra job losses over the next two years.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have already give way to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not prolong my speech by taking more interventions from him.

The Prime Minister's remarks last week were nothing short of scandalous. He dismissed all talk of job losses or the possibility of a recession as "idiotic hysteria". That was itself an interesting commentary on the Bank of England's own Monetary Policy Committee, which had said in its minutes for the month before that the chances of a United Kingdom recession had increased.

It is not only the Bank of England that has said that. In a circular sent out a few days ago, Goldman Sachs said:

"There is a rising risk of recession as evidenced by the continuing collapse in business confidence . . . On our projections the government will fail to meet its fiscal rules".

Chase Manhattan says that a

"UK recession is now very likely in 1999".

NTC, the independent research group, says that, according to its figures, there is a "strong likelihood of recession in the second half of 1999."

Mr. Bercow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, for the last time.

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend agree—especially in the light of the reports from which he has just quoted—that the Chief Secretary was guilty of gut-wrenching complacency in respect of the increased regulatory burden that British business will undoubtedly face in the lifetime of this Parliament? Was it not extraordinary that, in a 30-minute oration, the Chief Secretary failed even to refer to the European Commission's prediction that the country would slump to the bottom of the European growth table next year?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is right. All the warnings and all the independent research are dismissed as idiotic hysteria by the Prime Minister.

My hon. Friend is also right in saying that this concentration on failures of productivity shows a breathtaking hypocrisy. We have this from a party that opposed, with its allies, the Liberal Democrats, every one of the industrial and trade union reforms and privatisations that transformed our economy during 18 years of the Conservative Government. Those policies are being copied throughout the world, yet that same Labour Government are at it again. They lecture British industry about competitiveness and productivity and then bring in the job-destroying measures to which my hon. Friend has referred. As promised, they believe in the three Rs, which we are rapidly learning stands for regulation, regulation and regulation.

To take just one, on the Government's own figures, the working time directive will add some £2 billion a year to business costs. Everyone knows that distribution and freight charges are an important component in the cost of a manufactured item. We have among the highest distribution costs in Europe. Why? It has nothing to do with failures of industry, or the haulage industry in particular. The Government have ratcheted up fuel duties in both their Budgets and they are singling out diesel duty for yet more, higher increases.

According to Library figures, the extra costs of motoring, over and above what we calculated in our forecast, will amount to £9 billion in this Parliament, yet the Government have the nerve to tell industry to sharpen its act. The Government are piling on such extra costs and extra taxes every day.

The only consolation to the Government is that, possibly, they have the Liberal Democrats on their side. Here, I refer briefly to the weasel-worded Liberal Democrat motion, which recognises "the role of fiscal policy in stabilising economic growth in order to avoid excessive reliance on interest rates".

Is that some bizarre code? Can the Liberal Democrats now talk to the Government in coded language only? Have all relations broken down? Are we to suppose, therefore, that those words have within them some coded support for the Government's high-tax policies and the £20 billion-plus extra business taxes that the Government are loading on to industry in this Parliament?

Helen Jones: Given his concern about taxation, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could explain how it is that his party voted for amendments to the last Finance Bill that would have given us £6 billion—worth of extra spending? Which taxes would he have raised to pay for that?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Lady is wrong. I do not believe that she attended all the debates—[Interruption.] If she was there, no one noticed it. She might have missed the fact that on the Finance Bill we were proud to oppose the extra taxes that the Government and their Liberal Democrat allies tried to load on to individuals and businesses.

Mr. Loughton: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me. I must make progress.

I want to mention interest rates because they have been mentioned by Labour Members. They are higher than they need to be precisely because of the Government's persistent and continuing failure to bring their tax and spending policies into line with their monetary objectives. The best example of that was the attack on savings in their first Budget, the notorious £5 billion-a-year raid on pension funds. That was the last thing that the economy needed at that time. It meant that the entire burden of controlling inflation was transferred from fiscal policy to the Bank of England.

Of course, at the time, the Chancellor said that it was nothing to do with him—all those nasty interest rises were due to the Bank of England; he could not control the Bank. However, last month, he was going around the world—but not this country—telling everyone else that we needed a co-ordinated cut in interest rates. Frankly, he has to decide: does he control interest rates and, if he is urging all these lower interest rates, why has he signed up in principle to joining the European central bank in Frankfurt? If that happens, it will be illegal even to seek to influence the level of European interest rates ever again.

Last week in the Chamber, we had the hilarious spectacle of Labour Back Benchers complaining about the Governor of the Bank of England. They wanted him to be sacked because he had pointed out that the United Kingdom was a single currency zone, so interest rates for the north of England were set in accordance with conditions in the country as a whole. Those same hon. Members, however, want to join a single European currency, in which case it would not be British conditions that determined the interest rate, but conditions in continental countries, which would be very different. Matters would be 10 times worse if we did that.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: European Union interest rates are 3 per cent. lower.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: That was a sedentary intervention from the Liberal Democrats, who, as usual, have forgotten nothing and learnt nothing. When we were in the exchange rate mechanism, we were told by the hon. Gentleman and others that it was going to mean lower interest rates. By the time we came out, it was the reason why we could not lower interest rates.

In the economic cycle, interest rates go up and down and the need for them goes up and down, but if we were party to a single European currency the requirements would be set not by British conditions, but by continental ones. Perhaps that realisation is beginning to dawn on those on the Labour Benches, but clearly it is not dawning on those on the Liberal Democrat Benches.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I must raise another point.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who is answering this debate, will have an opportunity to clarify—because we need clarification—what went on at last weekend's European summit in Austria. That summit produced a proposal for a £200 billion spending programme. The jobs crisis in the European Union has produced a left-wing response at EU level.

The Prime Minister may not want to be left wing, but he certainly wants to bolster his European credentials by going along with that proposal, so we face not only a £36 billion black hole in our domestic expenditure, but a £200 billion black hole at EU level.

We want to know what Treasury Ministers think about that. How will it all be paid for? Again, some people who attended that summit have an answer for that as well. They want an EU-wide direct tax to be levied on businesses or individuals in member states. It would bypass national Governments. That is the new proposal, so can we have a definitive statement about it before the end of this debate? Can the Chief Secretary or Ministers speaking for him assure the House that the Government will veto any such increase in the EU's taxation powers? Can we have a clear, unequivocal response to what is, after all, a straightforward question?

The problems that the Government have with unemployment, economic growth and borrowing are not sudden or unexpected. They were warned about them at the start of the summer. They fit into a pattern of mistakes and broken promises that go back to May last year. The Government broke their promises on taxes; they put them up 17 times last year. They attacked savings in their first Budget at the precise moment when they should have been encouraging them. They continue to put up business costs by introducing regulations and more taxes, and then blame the managers for being greedy and the workers for being lazy. The Government have also not only failed to reform social security but made reckless spending commitments.

Ministers blame everyone but themselves, and they fail to come clean with the House. The country is now paying for the Government whom it elected last year.

4.59 pm

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): In my short time in the House, I have not seen such a good example of the bad practice that politicians have adopted over the years—of being asked to answer a question but failing to do so—as that provided by the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). When asked a simple question about what the Conservative party would do about Bank of England independence, he told us, "We will answer you only when you answer this, that and the other question." Does the right hon. Gentleman realise how ridiculous he looked today? His speech was pathetic.

If Conservative Members are able to take decisions so quickly on matters such as the single currency, why on earth cannot they take a decision on whether to reverse Bank of England independence? They really have to answer that question. The right hon. Gentleman was asked other questions, which he ignored completely. He tried, pathetically, to duck giving any answer.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) said, during the passage of the most recent Finance Bill, Conservative Members proposed removing £8.7 billion of funding for public services. If they want to reduce public spending by such an amount, they should tell us which services they would cut. We know that they would remove the working families tax credit. We know also that they are not worried about the poverty trap or structural unemployment, because they think that people affected by those issues can go to the wall. Do Conservative Members realise that £8.7 billion—an astronomical sum—is more than is spent annually on fighting crime in the United Kingdom?

Conservative Members have also mentioned welfare and social security. They must therefore be thinking about what they would do with pensions and child benefit.

Mr. Ruffley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leslie: Of course I will give way; I should like some answers.

Mr. Ruffley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, on 10 April 1997, the Prime Minister said that he wanted to "start reducing the very high welfare and benefits bills we pay in this country"?

Nevertheless, it has been clearly demonstrated that, between now and the end of this Parliament, there will be an average annual spending increase of 3.3 per cent. Why did the Labour party deceive the British people on welfare?

Mr. Leslie: As the hon. Gentleman knows, in the Labour party manifesto, we talked about shifting our priorities from paying the costs of social and economic failure, such as paying the jobseeker's allowance, and placing greater emphasis on education and health. Making such a shift is our policy, and that is what we are doing. We are spending an extra £40 billion on health and education, although Conservative Members oppose that increase.

I should love to hear a Conservative politician come clean, for a change, and just spit out what is at the bottom of his heart. We know that the right hon. Member for Wells is against the euro and against the independence of the Bank of England. What spending cuts would he make?

Mr. Loughton: Perhaps the hon. Gentlemen will take a stab at answering this question. Will he commit himself and the Labour party to retaining the independence of the Bank of England after the next general election, or will that independence have been abdicated to the central European bank by then?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman has a funny way of answering a question about whether the Conservative party would reverse the Bank of England's independence. Labour Members made the Bank independent, and independence is working well. Interest rates have reached their peak and are now on a downward slope. We feel that independence is the best policy for managing the British economy and monetary policy.

The House wants to know the risk—the clear and present danger—presented by Conservative Members to the British economy. Would they recklessly return monetary policy to the control of politicians, who might tinker around with that policy for their own benefit? How would Conservative Members go about things? The fact is that they offer fiscal and monetary policies that would be disastrous for the British economy.

Conservative Members talk about the need to cut and slash public services, but disregard the infrastructure that is necessary across the country and the vital public services—health and education services—that people cherish.

Curiously, although Conservative Members talk about an economic downturn, they talk also about reining in public expenditure. Surely such spending cuts would simply amplify any possible economic problems and—as the Financial Times said today—push things in the wrong direction?

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): My hon. Friend is very eloquently making his case. Opposition spokesmen say that our spending plans on education and health are irresponsible, reckless and unsustainable, which implies that they would not propose such plans. I should like to confirm that, as my hon. Friend said, Conservative Members would like to rein in those plans. They should make their intentions very clear.

Mr. Leslie: As my hon. Friend says, Conservative Members face in two directions on those issues. Although they like to talk about more public expenditure on this, that and the other, they try simultaneously to appease their own right-wing instincts by saying, "We must rein in all public expenditure, regardless of the value that it provides to the economy and the nation."

Mr. Loughton: The hon. Gentleman has expressed his great confidence in the ability of the Bank of England to do a better job of running the economy than his colleagues are able to do. Does he therefore agree with the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), who recently called for the resignation or sacking of the Governor of the Bank of England and claimed that the Governor and his colleagues were sacrificing manufacturing jobs in the north for the sake of protecting the south? Does the hon. Gentleman think that the Governor is doing a good job?

Mr. Leslie: I think that interest rates should be left to the experts—those who are expert in monetary policy. I do not think that politicians, such as the hon. Gentleman and I, are capable of dealing with the daily technical issues of monetary policy—which is why the Government, correctly, gave the Bank independence and created the new monetary policy framework. Although it is open to all hon. Members to make suggestions on monetary policy and on what course the Bank should take, ultimately the decision rests with the Monetary Policy Committee—which is where the decision should be made.

I accept that world economic conditions will undoubtedly have an impact on the British economy. Events in Japan have ricocheted around Russia and Latin America, and problems such as the crisis in Long Term Capital Management and other financial institutions have caused significant problems that are likely to have an impact on Britain. Perhaps other problems are to come. I am extremely proud that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have shown such strong leadership on the world financial and political stage. They are showing the way forward, urging greater transparency among financial sectors, pushing for better supervision and regulation—particularly of wide-scale speculation—and ensuring that they create a framework and show the leadership that are necessary to avert significant global recession which could affect Britain in the long term.

We should consider current events in Britain in the wider context. Although we might prefer it if some things did not happen, many good things are happening. Britain is having many economic successes. As Labour Members have said, economic growth—currently at 2.5 per cent. annually—is still very robust. Moreover—much as Conservative Members would love there to be, so that they could rub their hands in glee and poke fun—there is no recession in manufacturing.

Labour Members will try our best to keep growth on a sustainable course in the long term. Interest rates have peaked, and homeowners and businesses will be helped in coming months as rates decrease. The pound is now lower against the deutschmark than it was when Labour was elected. A survey of corporate management by Energis, reported in yesterday's Financial Times, stated that 70 per cent. of corporations believe that profits will be higher over the next 12 months. It says that two thirds of companies are predicting higher sales. In fact, it shows that exporters are among the most optimistic firms, so it is not all doom and gloom as the Opposition love to suggest.

We know why Opposition parties call for debates such as this. They like to rub their hands in glee whenever there is a hint of any bad news so that they can take a dig at the Government and try to grasp some scrap of political advantage. Unfortunately, it rings rather hollow when they have absolutely no solutions or suggestions of any substance as to what they would put in the place of our policies.

Let us consider the Liberal Democrats for a moment, as Opposition day debates provide us with a great opportunity to scrutinise Opposition parties' policies. At the heart of their recent document entitled "Moving Ahead", which was published at their party conference, was a policy to increase the personal income tax allowance from £4,195, as it is now, to £10,000. The Library has calculated for me—I am happy to share the information with the House—that the cost to the Exchequer of that policy would be more than £30 billion.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: It would be £29 billion.

Mr. Leslie: What is the odd £1 billion to the Liberal Democrats? Whatever the figure, it is still an awful lot of money. In fact, it is more than is spent on trade and industry, crime fighting and defence combined. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) likes to combine statistics—let us see how he likes them apples. He should realise the implications of his policy—£30 billion is nearly half this country's income tax take. He talks about fiscal policy having an impact on the wider economy, but we want to know specifically how he would find a substitute for that £30 billion.

The Liberal Democrats' solution is to

"phase out ill-judged reliefs and allowances", as it says in their policy document. Would they phase out tax relief for occupational pension schemes to raise £9.3 billion? Would they phase out tax relief on redundancy payments? That would raise only £1.1 billion. The hon. Member for Gordon has been talking about phasing out mortgage interest relief at source all together, which would raise £2.7 billion. Even if the Liberal Democrats phased out all of those, they would still have a heck of a long way to go to find that £29 billion or £30 billion.

The Liberal Democrats say that they want an extra 1p on income tax, but that would raise less than £2 billion. They want a new 50 per cent. tax on salaries of more than £100,000, but that would raise only £2 billion. I shall give way to the hon. Member for Gordon if he can clarify how the black hole is to be filled. I see that he is not rising to his feet, so I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle).

Maria Eagle: Did my hon. Friend, like me, obtain a copy of the Liberal Democrats' document from the internet? If so, did he notice the name under which it was filed, namely "FINECON"? Having read it, I thought it was a fine con. Does my hon. Friend agree that the document is packed with uncosted and unfunded spending commitments, and that it would be impossible for the Liberal Democrats to pay for any of them?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. It is a fine con that the Liberal Democrats are trying to pull. They would create a £30 billion or £29 billion gaping black hole, and I hope that they will specify how they are planning to fill it.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I am more than happy to deal with the hon. Gentleman's point. We said at the conference that there should be energy taxes—I believe that that appears in the document. We also said that some reliefs should be phased out. How is the hon. Gentleman's party going to pay for the 10p rate that it has set as its long-term tax target? I ask the hon. Gentleman that as his party is in government.

Mr. Leslie: That is very revealing. We know that the carbon tax, or whatever the Liberal Democrats call it, means that petrol would have to triple in price. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Oh, so it is not quite as clear as we thought. I shall have to read Hansard to see exactly what was said.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): As the hon. Gentleman is talking about the cost of fuel, is he aware that the fuel duty escalator that the Government have applied to above-inflation increases in the cost of fuel means that, by 2002, the cost of a gallon of petrol in Scotland will be nearly £5?

Mr. Leslie: That would be a matter for the Chancellor to review every year in his Budget. I do not know how the hon. Gentleman arrived at that figure, but he knows that it was the Conservative party that introduced the fuel tax escalator, and we are continuing it. That is entirely realistic.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Leslie: I must make some progress, as I wanted to make a concise contribution.

Let us consider what the Liberal Democrat party and the Conservative party are saying. One wants to slash public expenditure but fails to say where it would make the cuts. The other wants more spending on everything, not only on services but on reducing interest rates. As usual, they have no solutions and do not accept responsibility for the consequences of their pronouncements. They spit out proposals, but they must follow through and take responsibility for them.

The Government are pursuing the right course. Instead of falling off to the right or taking the Liberal way, they are pursuing a course of prudent and stable fiscal policy, aiming to increase productivity and long-term investment and making sure that the economy is put on a very firm footing. The Opposition parties present risks, but we know that the way forward is the Labour way forward.

5.16 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): As we are discussing a Liberal Democrat motion, I shall pay some attention to Liberal Democrat policy.

We know the problem: it is that a recession is looming. We have higher interest rates than we would like and the exchange rate is higher than we would like—and it is the Government's policies that have brought much of that about. The Liberal Democrats are at least consistent—their response is to join economic and monetary union. That was their policy 18 months ago, as well as three years ago. In every situation, their response is to say that we must join EMU. They believe that it will solve whatever the short-term problem might be at any moment. I want to knock that idea on the head completely before I concentrate on other matters.

Britain's economic ills certainly cannot be solved by joining EMU now. Of course, joining EMU would deliver lower interest rates, but it would make the short-term problems even worse. The differential in interest rates between Britain and Germany did not happen by accident; it reflects the fact that the markets believe that there is a long-run inflation performance differential between this country and the average of the euro Eleven. In other words, if Britain joined EMU, something would have to be done to squeeze out that differential. Nominal wage rises would have to come down to European levels, as would private consumption. Forecasts of those two measures reveal a 1 or 2 per cent. differential, so the economy would have to be squeezed over a period of years to enable interest rates to stay at the lower level.

What exactly would the Government have to do to achieve that? They would have to do one of two things—there are only two things that they could do. One is to tighten fiscal policy, which would mean higher taxes all around on a pretty big scale. At one point, I thought that we were going to hear commitments to higher taxes from the Liberal Democrats, but they seemed to change their mind.

The other option is to enter EMU at a higher exchange rate than we have now, but that policy would be even more disastrous. However, it is what the Irish have decided to do. In the spring of this year, they revalued the Irish punt against the basket of euro currencies as a prelude to entering EMU.

Apart from the Liberals, I do not think that anybody seriously believes that joining EMU now offers a short-term solution to Britain's current economic problems. It would give the British economy a far worse headache. It seems to me that the Liberals will remain isolated on that issue. Without a policy on EMU, their entire economic strategy starts to look extremely shaky.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) hinted at a tightening of fiscal policy with a rise in tax rates. Unfortunately, however, when pressed on the issue, he was able to tell us merely that the commitment to a 10p rate should be abandoned. That seems to be an abdication of both fiscal and monetary policy on the part of the Liberal party.

Mr. Edward Davey: The hon. Gentleman seems to think that Liberal Democrat policy is immediate entry into

[Mr. Edward Davey]

EMU. Of course that would be neither practical nor feasible. It would take at least two or three years. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the interest rate differential could be closed over that period—yes or no?

Mr. Tyrie: The hon. Gentleman has just changed Liberal party policy quite dramatically. We are now told that the Liberals would not consider joining EMU for two to three years. I have no doubt that, if they analyse the position a little more closely, they will conclude that EMU should wait four or five years. Conservative policy is that we shall return to the issue in seven or eight years' time. Labour policy seems to be pretty elastic. Just after the election, there were rumours that there would be a snap referendum and we would be in in a jiffy. Given relations between No.10 and No.11 on the issue, it now appears that entry will be many years hence, if ever. So there is movement towards a marriage of minds between the Liberals and Labour on the issue.

I should say a few words about Labour policy. This is the first debate in which we can reasonably say that the Government should be held responsible for the performance of the economy. Eighteen months have elapsed since the election—certainly enough time to see whether monetary and fiscal policy have been handled well. On the supply side, the Government may be benefiting from some of our reforms. In any case, the economy does not generally respond instantly to supply side changes and there tends to be a long lag before the damage to the supply side caused by increased regulation becomes apparent.

Labour has made something of a mess of monetary policy. In an effort to give the impression that the golden economic legacy which the Government were bequeathed—and which they tried to pretend did not exist—was not so golden after all, the Chancellor produced an emergency Budget in July 1997 in which he said that we were on the brink of an unsustainable boom. Rather than sort it out himself, however, he decided to hand responsibility to the Bank of England. In my view, he botched the job as he did not make the Bank of England fully independent, but created a halfway house. He gave most of the members of the Monetary Policy Committee three-year terms and, as a result, they have been over-anxious to bare their monetary teeth and prove their anti-inflationary credentials. So interest rates have been higher than they would have been.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): On interest rates, does the hon. Gentleman not accept that the Bank of England, operating independently, has taken the inflationary pressures that we inherited from the previous Government out of the economy by taking rates to 7.5 per cent? Does that not compare favourably with the record of the previous Administration who, on three separate occasions when interest rates were under political control, took interest rates to 14 per cent.—twice the level that has now succeeded in dampening inflationary pressure?

Mr. Tyrie: I would like to be able to share the hon. Gentleman's optimism that interest rates have peaked. I note that Labour Members seem to take that absolutely for granted. We do not know that. Indeed, most Ministers appear to have no idea whether we are in an upswing or a downswing. When I asked the former Chief Secretary to the Treasury that very question, he was unable to tell me the answer. I expect that he has noticed by now that we are probably in a downswing. We cannot be sure. Nor can we be sure that interest rates have peaked. Of course they were set at the level required to get inflation down. We did bring down inflation to meet our target. At the election, inflation was below 2.5 per cent., as promised by the Conservative Government. I am trying to recall what interest rates peaked at to deal with Labour's inflation in the mid-1970s, but the figures elude me. No doubt someone will be able to tell me. [Interruption.] I understand that it was 15 per cent.

Now we have the result of the initial decision to give the Bank of England independence in a form that led it to tighten monetary policy. There has been a rapid slowdown in the economy, a rise in sterling, the collapse of manufacturing, as well as falls in exports and increases in unemployment. All that was under way before the far east crisis and the Russian crisis. Now, 18 months later, the Chancellor is begging the Governor of the Bank of England to take his foot off the brake. The Chancellor's acolytes are on to the press to persuade the Bank to cut interest rates sharply and there are calls for the resignation of the Governor from a number of Labour Members.

One minute the newly independent Bank of England was the most visible symbol of new Labour and the next minute it is a stumbling block to Downing street's preferred economic policy. First, we were told that monetary policy was too loose; then we were told that it was too tight. First, we were told that the Governor of the Bank of England should be left to sort it out; now we have been told that the Chancellor should be and is leaning over his shoulder. Nobody would consider that to be a good record on monetary policy. It may be short of a disaster, but it is certainly in a mess.

Let me now deal with fiscal policy. Initially, the Labour Government got it roughly right, but that is hardly surprising, because they were implementing Conservative spending plans, even down to the level of each departmental spending head. However, a few months ago, the Chancellor turned all that on its head and let spending rip. Now we have a massive and almost certainly unsustainable increase in spending.

The Chief Secretary talked about margins to his spending plans, suggesting that we do not need to worry about the growth forecast having been cut, but he seemed completely unaware that the Government's most recent Budget provided smaller reserves as a proportion of gross domestic product than any Budget that I can remember. I do not have the exact figures to hand, but I think they are less than half the average reserves in every Budget presented by the Conservative Government. That is very worrying and should be taken extremely seriously. I am pleased to see that someone has gone to check the figures with the Treasury officials. That is very prudent. The Government will no doubt wish that they had had higher reserves. The most recent Budget took a gamble on spending. In my view, that risk should not have been taken and we will find out soon enough whether the Government will need to backtrack on that.

There have also been massive hikes in taxation, albeit cleverly concealed from the taxpayers who will have to stump up the money. Tax increases have not been easy to spot, but they have been to the tune of at least £20 billion on business alone. Although I do not think that borrowing will rise much in the current financial year, in two years' time we will realise how fast it has been rising. Whatever figure the Chancellor announces in a few days' time, I predict that, although it may not happen in the first year, in future the borrowing outturn will be higher than the figure that he announces.

Let us put fiscal and monetary policy together. How does Labour want to see the combined picture? The Government want us to believe—I have heard this again today—that their policy will put an end to boom and bust. It is astonishing that they are prepared to continue that argument. There will be no more stop-go, they say, just nice, smooth economic performance. Sometimes I feel that their rhetoric consists of saying that there is no longer a business cycle. As I said a moment ago, the previous Chief Secretary was unable to tell me what he meant by boom and bust. They give us mere rhetoric and soundbite economics.

I should like to say a few words about the supply side of the economy. We have had some discussion about the regulatory burdens imposed on business. All those measures taken together amount to a furring up of the arteries of the whole economy. It will take a long time for the effects to come through and we are only at the early stages. I shall not catalogue them all, because some may find it tedious, particularly if others refer to the same points. However, agreeing to the social chapter was a huge blunder, as were the changes to employment protection and the introduction of the minimum wage. The supply side of the economy has been damaged since the election.

Should anyone doubt that, I invite Labour Members to ask groups of business men in their constituencies a few simple questions, such as whether they sincerely believe that the burden of taxation on business will be lower in two years' time, whether borrowing will be lower and whether there will be fewer burdens on business. I do not think that they will find any takers in the business community. They should try it—I have.

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): I have spoken to many businesses in my constituency. Will the hon. Gentleman concede that the Government's introduction of the lowest ever rate of corporation tax is an excellent boon to business, as those in my constituency told me during the recess?

Mr. Tyrie: I am afraid that that intervention betrays ignorance about the total burden of business taxation. The total burden has risen substantially. That is how the Government have succeeded in surreptitiously obtaining far more revenue than they implied they would before the election. That is one reason why business performance in the medium term will be poorer than it would have been had the measures not been introduced.

The Labour Government were elected not to implement an alternative economic strategy, but because they had convinced the electorate that they were capable of running the policy that they inherited. The Chief Secretary's comments this afternoon about the importance of markets and how they must be made to work were in language that very few Labour spokesmen would have been prepared even to consider only a few years ago. That is one reason why Labour was elected.

In the past 18 months, the economic legacy that the Government were bequeathed—it is a remarkable legacy; compare Britain 20 years ago with Britain today—has been put at risk. Monetary policy has pointed in two directions, almost at once. Risks have been taken with the public finances, particularly on the spending side, and heavy burdens have been placed on business. We do not need to look into a crystal ball to know what will happen if those policies continue—we can read the book. We know what happens with such policies. They are being implemented less vigorously than in the 1970s, but the genre of policy is the same in many ways, despite the new Labour rhetoric concealing the fact.

When the electorate come to judge, they will realise how damaging many of the Government's policies are. They thought that they had elected a Labour Government who would broadly continue Conservative economic policies, but they will realise that that was a terrible mistake and that, to continue with the economic policies that brought prosperity to Britain, they should return a Conservative Government.

5.35 pm

Jacqui Smith (Redditch): I am pleased to be able to contribute to the debate. Of all the constituencies in the Hereford and Worcester area, mine is the most reliant on manufacturing industry. The west midlands is the engineering centre of the country. I shall not take any lectures from the Conservative or Liberal Democrat Opposition on the need to maintain manufacturing jobs or on the record of the present Government.

Several hon. Members have mentioned our inheritance from the previous Government. When we talk about manufacturing jobs, perhaps it is worth thinking about that inheritance. If anyone is an expert on manufacturing job losses, Conservative Members should be. We shall not forget the early 1980s, when manufacturing output fell by 15 per cent. and investment fell by 17.5 per cent. Nor shall we forget the second Conservative recession, in the early 1990s, when manufacturing employment fell by 10 per cent. and investment fell by 16 per cent. We shall not take lectures on manufacturing jobs from the Conservative Opposition.

We shall also take no lectures from the Liberal Democrats, who have called today's debate. Their opportunistic approach to economic policy is truly breathtaking. Their response to the announcements of increased Government spending for public services in the past 18 months has invariably been to shout, "Higher, higher!" while refusing to explain how they would support their calls for higher spending. Indeed, they have voted against policies such as the windfall tax, which have been necessary to support the measures that the Government have been willing to take to improve the country's skills base.

Mr. Bercow: Given that the hon. Lady wants to continue with substantial increases in public expenditure, the economic downturn notwithstanding, will she take this opportunity to confirm her belief that taxation at the end of this Parliament will be higher than it was at the beginning?

Jacqui Smith: I will confirm that the Government have taken the necessary tough decisions on public spending in the first part of the Parliament, enabling us to put into operation the spending increases on education and health that were part of our manifesto. I shall come back to the Conservative approach to fiscal policy.

[Jacqui Smith]

We can add to the Liberal Democrats' previous inconsistencies the argument that fiscal policy should be tightened so significantly that short-term interest rates could be halved for early entry into the European single currency. Presumably, that means another increase in taxation. At least they are ambitious. Last year, they were calling for an extra 1p on income tax; they have now boosted that to at least an extra 20p on the basic rate and a rate of 50 per cent. for those on £25,000 or more.

Manufacturing in my constituency most certainly does not need the political opportunism that we have heard today. It needs a Government who are willing not only to take decisions for the long term in the macro-economy but to put renewed vigour into dealing with long-term structural improvements in productivity.

Ms Abbott: If it is important for the Government to take decisions on the macro-economy, why have we given away the ability to make decisions on monetary policy to the Bank of England?

Jacqui Smith: I was about to come to that point. The Government have the fundamentals of macro-economic policy right. As I suggested, the Government took the necessary action in the first part of this Parliament to cut borrowing—part of the previous Government's golden economic inheritance—and to find the extra £40 billion for education and hospitals that the country so badly needs. We have seen today further evidence of the disarray in the Conservative Opposition's approach to fiscal policy. The shadow Chancellor says that we should spend less on public services; shadow health and education spokespeople say that we should spend more; and the Leader of the Opposition claims not to have heard what they have said.

Mr. Tyrie: I really do not think that the nation believes that the Conservatives will find it impossible to control public spending. After all, Labour spent years telling us that we were at it too vigorously. As for where we shall find savings, one need look only at the fact that social security spending was growing at a lesser rate than the economy as a whole under the previous Government. It is now growing at a far greater rate. That is an area in which the Conservatives will be able to find some savings when we return to power.

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman describes precisely the problem that we inherited. The previous Conservative Government were not at it vigorously enough when it came to ensuring that social security spending went on providing opportunities for people as opposed to keeping them on the dole. Through the introduction of the new deal, this Government have ensured that that happens.

Mr. Ruffley: Does the hon. Lady believe that the Prime Minister said on 10 April 1997 that he wanted to cut the social security benefit bill? Did he say that—yes or no? If so, why are the Government not doing so?

Jacqui Smith: We have already done so. I reiterate that there is a significant difference between the expenditure on economic and social failure that we inherited from the previous Conservative Government and spending on the new deal, which is providing opportunities for people to work, using money to good effect as opposed to keeping people on the dole. The Government have turned such spending around.

If the Government had not granted the Bank of England independence in setting interest rates, we would still be facing a political-risk premium on long-term interest rates instead of their being at their lowest for 35 years. On that issue, we once again see contradictions in the Conservative Opposition's policy. As I understood his comments, the shadow Chief Secretary suggested earlier that the Conservatives would reverse the policy. We certainly need clarification from the Opposition on that.

High exchange rates have undoubtedly caused concerns for exporters but, as a Redditch manufacturer told me this month,

"I can't build my business on hoping the pound will fall. I've got to get out and sell and build the quality of my products".

That is, of course, the crucial lesson for the Government.

International competitiveness, business success and jobs cannot be built solidly on calls for constant devaluation. It can be built only on improved competitiveness and productivity. Furthermore, only by dealing with improving productivity can we get rid of the sort of bottlenecks that were responsible for the boom and bust and the instability from which the economy suffered under the previous Government. By getting rid of such bottlenecks and improving productivity, we remove the inflationary pressures that were so obvious under the previous Government.

I welcome the measures that the Government have already taken on corporate taxation, research and development, science, reform of the tax and benefits system and transport. Even so, we in the west midlands face a major challenge in skills shortages. I urge the Government to work even harder on improving training opportunities and skills levels. My local chamber of commerce reports that 59 per cent. of manufacturers have attempted to recruit in the past three months but that 75 per cent. of them have had difficulty, particularly in the recruitment of skilled manual and technical employees. There are several reasons for that. Employers, for example, report that young people are unaware of opportunities in engineering and manufacturing and still tend to view such jobs as dirty, badly paid and of low status. The main answer to that lies with employers. I am therefore pleased that representatives of the Redditch Manufacturers Association are already considering how they can communicate the positive benefits of manufacturing and engineering work to young people.

The Government also have a role in boosting positive contact between young people and employers. That is recognised in initiatives to break down the academic and vocational split in education and to ensure that young people take part in imaginative and on-going work experience projects, such as those that have been introduced in parts of Worcestershire by the Hereford and Worcester chamber of commerce, training and enterprise. It is also important to boost training for people who are already in employment. I welcome the opportunities provided by the introduction of individual learning accounts to boost skills levels, especially in areas such as information technology. We must push that forward to broaden the scope of such training if we are properly to deal with the skills shortages that we in the west midlands face.

Some employers express concern to me about the mechanics of implementing the individual learning accounts, tracking the training provided and ensuring that work force development can be facilitated through training funds. Redditch manufacturers, for example, have plans for a training centre that is linked to setting skills, for which there is great demand locally. Through imaginative use of training and enterprise council funds and new training finance, we should be able to promote projects that respond to positive local initiatives in order to build productivity. I hope that the Government continue to make that area a priority. They have shown a commitment to building the skills base and the provision of opportunities through the new deal in order to tackle unemployment and skills shortages. That must be carried forward—despite warm words but a lack of political support from the Liberal Democrats and a lack of any support from the Conservative Opposition.

I look forward to the Chancellor's statement next week. The Government have taken important decisions on the fundamentals of the economy that will enable the country to steer through difficult economic times. We must also look forward to the Chancellor spelling out further measures for improving productivity, because only with such a dual approach, which I believe that the Government are adopting, will we offer real hope for manufacturers in my constituency and the economy as a whole.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Although I have no wish to talk down our economy—on the contrary, I have the greatest belief in the strength of this country and its work force—running at the heart of this debate, when we can pull the Government on to the subject, is a concern that many parts of our manufacturing industry are in the midst of a life-or-death struggle. That struggle for survival has not been helped over the past couple of decades by a Government who basically allowed manufacturing to lapse into neglect. In fact, that Government treated the industry with contempt and left much of it ill prepared and ill equipped to face the demands of the cut-throat global market.

Most Labour Members present today, whether or not they were Members of Parliament at the time, will remember that the previous Government made no secret of their contempt for industry. The 3 million jobs that were lost while they were in power were described as "The jobs we do not want".

Well, the Conservatives might not have wanted those jobs, but it is a racing certainty that those who lost them did want them. We had a right to expect something better after almost 3.5 million voters turned their backs on the Conservatives and turned them out of office. For our industry, we had the right to expect better than a reliance on market forces to kill or cure its ills. We had a right to expect better than low productivity being blamed on lazy workers.

The House will recall that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is a man of many talents, but on the Sunday before last he revealed what one might describe as an almost endearing talent for honesty. On "Breakfast with Frost", he said that Britain's refusal to join the single European currency was starting to damage our trade prospects. That is honesty. He went on to say that, by failing to join the single currency, we could not be at the heart of Europe. That is more honesty. That being so, the Secretary of State added, the USA might now think twice about investment in Britain, because it was not just Britain that the Americans were worried about, but access to Europe. That is a key point.

Hon. Members might like to reflect that, for more than 15 years, the USA has been the largest inward investor in Britain, accounting for more than 40 per cent. of total inward investment from 1984 to 1994, and nearly 60 per cent. in 1995. The Secretary of State might have added that failing to make, at the very least, a statement of commitment on the single currency, failing to stabilise the economy, failing to bring down interest rates and failing to bring down sterling quickly enough is crippling what remains of Britain's manufacturing industry.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: Ah, it is the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), whose new nickname politeness forbids me to use.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman's politeness is unequalled in the House, as we all know. Given his enthusiasm for joining the European single currency as soon as is feasible and, therefore, his acceptance of the running of interest rate policy by the European central bank, would he support in principle the idea that the European central bank should also run our direct taxation policy—yes or no?

Mr. Chidgey: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's kind words, although whether my politeness is known in every corner of the House is a matter for debate. However, as he well knows, the two issues he raises are quite separate and unrelated.

Mr. Bercow: Answer.

Mr. Chidgey: No, because they are not related.

Mr. Bercow: Answer.

Mr. Chidgey: The hon. Gentleman is clearly a little hard of hearing today. The answer is: no.

To return to the subject of the performance of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry over the past week or so, I should like to point out that, on Wednesday's "Today" programme, his response to the crisis facing the 16,000 workers at Longbridge and the 45,000 other workers linked to that business was that "Rover should sharpen up its act".

Between Sunday and Wednesday, the message changed from a failure of Government policy to a failure on the part of lazy workers and poor managers. We know that the Secretary of State is famous for his ability to spin, but to spin a complete U-turn in only three days must be a record even for him.

The Government have been quick to point out that, although Rover is in severe difficulty, other car manufacturers are committing large investments to their UK operations. I welcome that, but it is not surprising, given that Britain attracts far more inward investment than any other country in the world, with the exceptions of the

[Mr. Chidgey]

USA and China. Records show that, over the past decade, the UK has attracted about 40 per cent. of all inward investment into the European Union, far outstripping any other country. However, the key question is: why? A recent Government survey shows that almost three quarters of the investors in this country's industry—our inward investors—invested because they needed a British or European base. Only 10 per cent. were attracted by labour skills and only 6 per cent. by labour costs. It is clear that most investment could readily divert to other European Union countries and my concern is that such will be the trend if the economy becomes unstable and if interest rates and the value of sterling do not fall to sustainable levels.

In spite of improvements in productivity, Britain still lags far behind our competitors in modern management, capital investment and, most critically, in skills. That is not new—the evidence has been clear for decades. The Government can shrug off any responsibility for the past, but the figures from the House of Commons Library tell a depressing and continuing story for which the Government must take some responsibility. Between the 1970s and the mid-1990s, manufacturing as a share of gross domestic product has fallen from more than 30 per cent. to slightly more than 20 per cent. That is a fairly common message across the industrialised world. Employment in manufacturing has fallen from 7 million to 4 million.

However, it is interesting to note that, in the same period, productivity in this country has almost doubled. That is a relatively good performance compared with that of many of our competitors, but it is not good enough. In 1995, United Kingdom labour productivity still lagged 14 per cent. behind France, 18 per cent. behind Germany and 30 per cent. behind the United States. It is hardly surprising to learn that Britain, having been the first nation to industrialise, is now de-industrialising faster and deeper than any other country.

The rot is set to continue. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said, industry suffers a net loss of 300 jobs every day. The House of Commons Library, using the Treasury model, forecasts that, in the next two years, a further 420,000 jobs will be lost. Those jobs will be lost for ever: the records show that jobs shed when industry is in recession do not return when the economy improves. The losers end up in dead-end jobs, with lower wages and even lower prospects. Under-investment in improving productivity, skills and competitiveness has the inevitable outcome of dumbing down the economy.

Maria Eagle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: Ah, I see that the Millbank mafia are still twitching over their pagers. If the hon. Lady has something to contribute, I should welcome it, but I greatly doubt that she has.

Maria Eagle: If the hon. Gentleman gives way, he will hear my contribution. I agree with much of his lengthy analysis, especially his comments about skills shortages and productivity, but will he fill in the details of the motion being debated? It makes passing reference to taking "further actions to tackle skills shortages".

Can the hon. Gentleman tell us what he would do and how he would pay for it?

Mr. Chidgey: I am delighted to learn that I have managed to hold the hon. Lady's rapt attention for so much of my speech—she is obviously itching to hear my conclusions. If she has just a little more patience and there are fewer interruptions, I promise that all will be revealed towards the end of my speech.

We are all too familiar with Conservative policies: strip out regulation of business and commerce, leave everything to market forces and let the fittest survive. The Conservatives appear to think that any form of employment protection adds an unbearable burden to business, but it might surprise them to learn that France and Germany—the most regulated countries in Europe—outstrip Britain in productivity by 14 per cent. and 18 per cent. respectively.

There is no doubt that, at its best, British industry is a world-class performer. Our aerospace and pharmaceutical industries are world leaders, as is our film industry. Hon. Members might be surprised to learn that the local shipbuilders in my constituency of Eastleigh are still winning contracts worldwide. An award-winning local firm involved in the optics industry has slashed the cost of contact lenses through advanced technology and, in just five years, has grown from having 60 to having 600 employees—that is a success record of which we are proud.

However, we cannot rely on market forces and the survival of the fittest. Government policies have to ensure the success of the able. The new driving force in our economy, as many of us recognise, is made up of small and medium enterprises. They are the dynamic job creators that need an environment in which they can flourish—they need less bureaucracy, easier access to affordable capital and, most of all, a steady flow of well-trained, highly skilled workers.

Helen Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: I shall make progress. The hon. Lady can have nothing to contribute to what I have heard before.

While industry and commerce wait in vain for clear, efficient policies from their Government to attract and maintain inward investment, three Ministers have their fingers in the pie. The Deputy Prime Minister, who is responsible for regional development agencies, is tasked with promoting business in the English regions and providing better support for SMEs. The Secretary of State for Education and Employment is responsible for training and enterprise councils, which have a long way to go before they will have any impact on bridging the skills gap. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is anxious to shift the emphasis away from regional agencies with a new regional industrial policy aimed at getting industry clusters to collaborate across the country. Three Ministers, with an annual spend of around £5 billion, are each pursuing their own agenda.

If we are to maintain the high levels of inward investment that we currently attract, Government Departments must develop a more co-ordinated approach to strategic business support. The White Paper on competitiveness, which we await with bated breath, and the Committee stage of the Regional Development Agencies Bill give the Government opportunities to strip away the bureaucracy in the system. They could provide opportunities to end the scramble for inward investment and start to target resources on the areas of greatest potential for the long-term benefit of our economy. Simply targeting new jobs at areas with the longest dole queues does little for the country's long-term economic stability.

Inward investment must be a lever for developing skills, retraining and upskilling. Poor productivity results more from low skills than from lazy workers. Germany's high productivity owes far more to skills than to sweated assets. It is interesting that, throughout the 1980s and 1990s, the proportion of skilled and qualified technicians in the German work force has consistently been three times that in Britain.

This may be the last chance for any Government to bridge the skills gap in our industry and create a well-trained, flexible, highly skilled work force, which is attractive not only to overseas companies looking to invest but to successful British firms eager to expand. It is a chance that the Government must not be allowed to miss.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I am grateful to have the chance to take part in this important debate on the economy.

There has been a great deal of party political point scoring, but beyond these Benches is a real economy. My hon. Friends are right to say that, overall, the economy is not in recession, but there are sectors that are anxious about the future. People in the north-east, who saw the traditional smokestack industries, in which they were brought up to believe they would find work, collapse under them, did the right thing and retrained and reskilled. They went into high-tech industries, such as the new car industry in the north-east which was created by inward investment. That is now collapsing under them.

People in north Hackney, which has one of the highest unemployment rates in the south-east, are locked into structural unemployment. After 18 long years, they look to a Labour Government to implement the economic policies that will create a return to full employment. Only full employment will float my constituents back on to the job market.

The problem for Conservative Members in attacking the Government's economic policy is that so much of it is their own policy. In its survey of the British economy earlier this year, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development remarked that the Government are largely following the market-orientated policies of the previous Government. That is why the Tories are twisting themselves into knots, making spurious claims and descending into their internal obsession with Europe.

I want to make a few brief points not about what is going wrong, but about issues that need to be considered if my constituents, who have waited for so long for a Labour Government to put them back to work, are to have their hopes for themselves and their children fulfilled.

I was surprised, last week, to hear my colleagues abusing the redoubtable Governor of the Bank of England, Eddie George, who is well able to look after himself. Eddie George's views on inflation were well known; his background and history were well known; the likelihood that, given control of monetary policy, he would subordinate to the City the interests of manufacturing in the north was well known; and the history of the Bank of England in relation to interest rate policy up to 1945 was well known. My hon. Friends are raising their hands in horror because Eddie George has expressed opinions that he was well known to hold when he was given control of monetary policy. Their criticisms might better be directed at those who gave him those powers.

My colleagues hailed the handing over of monetary policy to the Governor and the Monetary Policy Committee as the greatest political act since Moses parted the Red sea. They will know that I have consistently criticised that policy. One did not have to look into a crystal ball to know what would happen if one gave the Bank of England untrammelled control of monetary policy; one simply had to read the book. It was always the case that handing over monetary policy would have the deflationary effects that we are now witnessing.

To be fair, Liberal Democrat Members have been consistent on this matter, and have consistently pushed the policy today. However, it surprises me that my colleagues are criticising Eddie George for expressing views that it was well known he held when he was given those powers.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): The hon. Lady is making an interesting speech and I do not want to interrupt her, but she has not dealt with the fact that the Bank of England is constrained not so much by the personality of the Governor or by the MPC, as by the laws that the Government have laid down for 2.5 per cent. inflation. That is what the hon. Lady should be attacking.

Ms Abbott: I shall come to that.

Far from being a great forward leap, the Government's early step to return monetary policy to the Bank of England was a reversion to the system that obtained until 1945. It has not been much remarked on in the House or the media, but part of the Government's problems with monetary policy is the way in which they implemented the handing over of the policy to the Bank. That was done not by an announcement on the Floor of the House, but by administrative diktat at a press conference outside the House.

As a member of the Labour party's national executive committee, I can tell the House that giving monetary policy to the Bank of England has never been party policy and was never specifically debated by the party at the NEC or any other level. I put it to colleagues on the Treasury Bench that, if the policy had been properly discussed inside the party and in the House before implementation, we might have arrived at a better framework for the Bank.

I am opposed in principle to giving the Monetary Policy Committee power over monetary policy, but if the Government had allowed a debate in the House before implementing the change, better legislation might have resulted. The Governor is constrained, which is why I am surprised that he is criticised by my colleagues. He is dealing with the narrow target of inflation rates, and he does not have to take into account jobs and growth.

[Ms Abbott]

One of the problems that arises from the lack of debate, in the party and in the House, on the change in monetary policy is that many people do not seem to understand it. I was against handing monetary policy to the Governor of the Bank of England because the decision is not reversible. It is absurd for colleagues to say, "Let's drop hints and put pressure on the Governor." The decision is not reversible, and it is quite wrong for the Government to attempt to put covert pressure on the Governor by way of Charlie Whelan's briefings to journalists. If I were the Governor of the Bank of England, I would be a little irritated by that. Either we have given the Bank genuine independence or we have not. According to colleagues on the Treasury Bench, Eddie George said that did not feel under pressure. However, that is not the same as saying that he was not subject to pressure—indirect and direct, implicit and explicit.

In due course, it might be possible for the House to reframe the legislation and the terms under which the Bank operates. However, a policy of spinning and leaking and covert pressure will make that much more difficult. It will also increase the price that we shall have to pay on the markets for reframing the policy.

My colleagues on the Treasury Bench have two or three soundbites about monetary policy that they repeat constantly as a substitute for expressing a view. The first is, "No return to boom and bust" and the second is, "We have taken the politics out of interest rates". Whether the Government like it or not, interest rates are a political matter in this country at this time. We cannot tell the public that the price that they must pay for their mortgages—people are likely to lose jobs because of climbing interest rates and an overvalued pound—is not political. Colleagues must not think that, by handing monetary policy to the Governor in the ill-advised manner that I have described, they will escape the political responsibility if monetary policy is seen to be going badly wrong.

I do not want to dwell on this topic, but many of my hon. Friends refer constantly to Germany. The circumstances are very different in Germany: the German people have fixed-rate mortgages and companies have long-term investments. The German political class has long been inured to the consequences of high interest rates in a way that politics in this country is not.

My colleagues on the Treasury Bench also frequently repeat the soundbite, "There is no trade-off between interest rates and employment." There is no absolute trade-off, but it is a fact that, in certain sectors of the economy—particularly manufacturing and sectors that export—and at certain points in the cycle, there is obviously a trade-off between rates of interest and job growth and prospects. If, as Ministers insist, there is no trade-off whatsoever, why do people set interest rates? Why do we not just program a computer to set them? I repeat: if, in nine months or a year, monetary policy is seen to have gone badly wrong, Ministers will not be able to escape their responsibility.

However, it is a done deal: we handed control of monetary policy to Eddie and his committee, and the consequences were totally predictable. However, the Government could have taken further action. They could have examined other aspects of macro-economic policy in order to offset the very obvious and predictable deflationary consequences of giving monetary policy to Threadneedle street. One of those aspects is fiscal policy.

When Liberal Democrat Members spoke earlier this evening, some of my colleagues said, sotto voce, "What are they saying? Are they saying that we should put up taxes?" Taxation, in itself, is morally neutral. We seem to have reached a position in the Labour party where taxation is viewed as an absolute evil. Taxation is simply another instrument of macro-economic management. The issue for the Government is not whether taxation is good or bad but whether taxation—

Jacqui Smith: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Abbott: I am sorry, but I must make progress as the Economic Secretary wishes to respond in a few minutes.

The issue for the Government is not whether taxation is good or evil, but what is in the interests of the British people. There are times when taxation and fiscal policy are important. The Government could have used taxation policy to help bear down on inflation. Taxation is a key instrument for redistributing wealth. We do not hear that from Ministers any more, but I come from one of the poorest constituencies in the country and I assure them that redistribution of wealth is still dear to my heart. Taxation is also a very important instrument when it comes to raising revenue.

Hon. Members have talked about taking the big decisions about macro-economic policy. However, within weeks of attaining office, Labour handed over monetary policy to the Bank of England without bothering to debate the decision on the Floor of the House. The Government have adopted an attitude to fiscal policy that is not pragmatic or economic, but political and entirely doctrinaire. Taxation is an ill—the Mondeo owner in middle England will not wear it—so, regardless of the consequences for the economy or the problems inherent in trying to bear down on inflation using monetary policy alone, the Government will not consider using fiscal policy as an instrument. If there are three major instruments of macro-economic policy—monetary policy, fiscal policy and public expenditure—the Government have already ruled out two of them.

I turn, therefore, to the third major lever of macro-economic policy: public expenditure. What can we say about this Government and public expenditure? The Government boast that, overall, they will have tighter control on public expenditure than the Tories had. I served in the last Parliament and I remember how the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) did not even believe in these public expenditure limits when he brought them before the House. Now I must sit behind Ministers who boast that they will have tighter public expenditure controls overall than the Tories.

The rise in expenditure to which Ministers refer—luckily, the Tories are also talking it up—is contingent on growth. I am sorry to say that many forecasts suggest that certainly the growth prospects to which the Chancellor referred at the beginning of the summer are now remote and that we may have less than 0.4 per cent. growth. Expenditure is contingent on growth but, apart from that, the Government have tighter controls than the Tories.

How do the Government respond when not just Labour voters, but electors around the country ask: from where will the investment in public services come? Ministers talk about the public finance initiative. I do not wish to examine that mechanism in detail, but I put it to the House that, although PFI sounds like some sort of magic wand, in truth, it is a glorified form of hire purchase. We shall face all sorts of problems regarding the long-term effects of PFI on public expenditure. PFI is fine when used to build a toll bridge, but it is a very dangerous and dubious instrument to use in the health service. If colleagues believe that PFI will get them out of their public expenditure fix, they are very much mistaken. I refer them to the many excellent reports produced on this subject by the Treasury Select Committee in the last Parliament.

There are many theories about why people voted in such huge numbers against the previous Conservative Government in May last year. However, few would deny that the public wanted to see more investment in the public sector; they wanted to see public sector standards rise. There is no question but that the Government have introduced a series of initiatives, held launches and conferences and conducted other consciousness-raising exercises concerning the public sector. I say to Treasury Ministers—I will have cause to return to this theme—that, if they want to raise standards in the health service, they will have to pay the nurses. The single most important thing for a person who is admitted to hospital is the quality of care that he or she is offered by nurses.

I read the Government's submission to the pay review body regarding the nurses, and every other sentence read, "We want an affordable settlement." In this context, I take it that an "affordable settlement" is a settlement on the low side—after all, the Government can afford what they wish to afford. The situation is the same with teachers and education. In those areas of the public sector, everything turns on the people who deliver the service. Ministers are deluding themselves if they believe that standards can be raised if there is no willingness to raise the basic rate of pay for some of these people.

It is no good talking about super-nurses. Ordinary people will be nursed by ordinary nurses, and those nurses should have decent pay. Which one of us in the House would want to teach in schools in the inner city, given the pressure that those teachers are under, their difficulties in finding accommodation, and the social problems that they must deal with among the children in their schools, and who can expect them to work for the salaries that they are offered?

There are three major levers of macro-economic policy: monetary policy we have handed to the Bank; fiscal policy we forswear; and our proud boast on public expenditure is that we are bearing down on it more heavily than the Tories did.

In the early months of this Administration, the Government have said a lot of things that the nation has waited a long time to hear. A tremendous responsibility rests on the Government's shoulders to fulfil the aspirations and life chances of people like my constituents in Hackney, but I put it to the Government that, within the broad framework of Tory macro-economic policy, it will not prove possible to fulfil the aspirations that we were elected in May 1997 to fulfil.

People may mock tonight, but I believe that, as this Administration wear on, and as we see the full nature of the slowdown that we are presented with, we shall return, as a party, to this subject. It is all very well to give people soundbites and to refer to the pledge card, but we know in our hearts what people expect of the Labour Government, not this week, next week or next year, but in the long term—and how can we fulfil those genuine hopes and aspirations within what is, as I speak, broadly a Tory macro-economic framework?

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Mr. Deputy Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak in the debate.

Several Labour contributions to the debate showed complacency. However, the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) spoke about real, live economic conditions, such as those that are familiar to me from my constituency. I should have thought that, as this is the second week since Parliament reconvened after the recess, we might all be more aware of the realities of life in our constituencies, but the several Labour contributions that I have heard do not strike a chord with me when I consider the conditions that I found, and the experiences that I learned about, in my constituency during the summer.

I listened with care to what the hon. Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith) said about productivity. She said that the value of sterling was a side issue to the issue of productivity and the challenge that it sets our economy. During the summer, in my constituency, I visited many highly productive and very effective companies which, although they demonstrated to me that they had made 30 to 35 per cent. productivity gains in their activities, were crippled in their export activities by the value of sterling. However much productivity improves, if the pound is valued above an acceptable trading level, it will create trading difficulties for companies in our constituencies.

This debate takes place at an appropriate time in the economic cycle, in the light of some of the information that has been traded across the Floor of the House about the difficulties that are faced. In addition, we are all aware of the succession of job loss announcements that were made during the summer, throughout the country. The Chancellor's announcement of a change in his growth target makes this debate very appropriate. Obviously, we await with anticipation the publication of the pre-Budget report next Tuesday, but I sympathise with the concern that was expressed in the House today at the Chancellor's absence from a major debate after the end of the summer recess.

The debate also takes place against the background of the European Commission's conclusion that the United Kingdom will have the slowest growth in the European Union area in 1999, and against the background of other survey information. I quote two surveys whose findings reached me in the past few days. The Bank of Scotland survey of Scottish businesses shows that, in August and September, output and employment fell in the manufacturing and service sectors in Scotland. It shows that the manufacturing decline in Scotland is in accord with the United Kingdom pattern, but that service sector activity has suffered a sharper slowdown in Scotland than in other parts of the United Kingdom. A Business Strategies survey of consumer confidence in Scotland has shown an index fall from 29 to 26 in the space of one quarter—the largest quarterly fall since 1992. In that consumer survey, confidence about employment was at its lowest for four years.

[Mr. John Swinney]

Since the general election in May 1997, nearly 9,000 jobs have been lost in companies in Scotland. During the summer, several high-profile announcements were made. Yesterday, there was a major demonstration—at which many hon. Members were present—in the borders town of Galashiels, in connection with the severe job losses that have affected several sectors there, such as textiles, agriculture and electronics.

The agricultural sector predominates in my rural constituency. One learns—from visits to markets, individual farmers or estates, from lobbying organisations and from council events held to represent the interests of the agricultural sector—that every aspect of the industry records difficult economic conditions. In the House, against the background of those difficult economic conditions, whether in the manufacturing sector, the service sector or the agricultural sector, we must guard against the complacency that was more than amply shown by what the Government said tonight.

That brings me to the influences on Government policy. It is no wonder if the ears of the Governor of the Bank of England are warm this afternoon, given the way that he was referred to in the House. Let me continue those references. The Governor has said that, to cope with over-heating in the south of England economy, it is necessary for a price to be paid in other parts of the United Kingdom. He told us—from Washington—that the Monetary Policy Committee had engineered a slowdown in the UK economy to dampen down inflation. Interest rates have been used as the device for controlling the unsustainable growth in the economy.

If we are to be grateful to the Governor of the Bank of England for one thing—or if I am to be grateful to him for one thing—it is for the fact that he has confirmed a suspicion that I and my party colleagues have long peddled in the House: that economic policies were pursued to address economic conditions in the south of England, and that, as a consequence, other parts of the United Kingdom where those economic conditions did not exist would pay a price that did not need to be paid.

In many respects—this is where I very much agree with the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington—the Government have absented themselves from setting an effective fiscal policy that could counterbalance the pursuit of that monetary policy by the Bank of England. The indications of what the Government are prepared to do, and what they were prepared to do when they came to office, to address any aspects of economic management have been compromised by the Government's unwillingness to address fiscal issues, and by their willingness to hand power to an independent Bank of England.

There is a contradiction in the arguments that have been advanced on that subject. We are constantly told that we cannot have monetary policy that is directed toward the economic conditions of different parts of the United Kingdom. I contend that there is no overheating in the Scottish economy, so we do not need interest rates to be at the present level. However, by dint of the Governor's admission that interest rates are used to address overheating in the south of England economy, we now know that one part of the United Kingdom is predominating in decisions on economic policy.

During the passage of the Bank of England Act 1997, an attempt was made, in this House and in the House of Lords, to secure broader representation on the Monetary Policy Committee to guarantee that opinions from different component parts of the United Kingdom could be brought to bear on the discussions of that committee. Those representations met Government refusal, but I noticed that, in the weekend press, a growing number of commentators on the Scottish economy were recognising that the case was continually becoming stronger for broader representation on the Monetary Policy Committee, to enable that committee to come up with a more representative set of actions in relation to economic conditions in various parts of the country. The difficulty will be the framework within which the Monetary Policy Committee operates.

Mr. Bercow: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with close interest. He objects to the fact that the Bank of England takes interest rate decisions without regard to the interests of particular parts of the United Kingdom. Given that that is his criticism, why are he and his party in favour of permanently giving power to set interest rates for the whole of Europe, and not for the interests of Scotland, to the European central bank?

Mr. Swinney: The answer is simple: so that we do not make the same mistake in the constitution of that project that has been made in the constitution of the Bank of England project. That will guarantee that interest rates set by a European central bank are based on a broader assessment of economic conditions than is the case in the United Kingdom.

It is essential that we establish a balance between monetary and fiscal policy, to create the trading conditions that are appropriate in different parts of the United Kingdom. From what the Government have done so far, and from what we have heard from the Government Benches this evening, there is no recognition of the existing economic conditions in our community.

At a time when we are clearly moving towards greater economic difficulties, the Government are reducing the resources available for economic development in the Scottish economy. Real cuts in the Scottish Enterprise budget over the next financial year will compound the cuts that were made in two successive years under the Conservatives. That instrument could assist in counterbalancing the dominating effect in UK monetary policy of the overheating of the economy in the south-east of England. By giving appropriate economic development assistance to parts of the United Kingdom that face challenges in their economic development, we could address some of those economic imbalances, but the Government have not been prepared to do that.

As the debate winds to a conclusion, I hope that we shall hear from the Government clear and definitive answers to some of the questions that have been left hanging. The Chancellor appeared on television a few weeks ago to tell us that, despite revising his growth targets, borrowing, taxes and spending would remain unchanged. One does not need to be a member of the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England to work out that something has to give in all that. Like many other hon. Members, I was surprised to hear of the elastic margins of the financial settlement produced in the comprehensive spending review, in the previous Budget and in other documents.

The Government must give us an answer on what is going to give in the relationship between borrowing, taxes and spending. We need a balanced economic policy which reflects monetary and fiscal considerations. Most important of all, UK monetary policy should be designed to allow us to counter the present difficult global trading conditions, not to walk straight into them.

6.32 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I begin by adding my welcome to the new Ministers on the Treasury Bench. We look forward to future debates with them. I hope that the former Education Minister turned guardian of the nation's purse will be as keen as we are that the spending review's settlement for schools is not just delivered in full, but is exceeded in the next three years.

I pay tribute to the former Member of Parliament for Wolverhampton, South-West, Mr. Nick Budgen, whose death was announced today. I know that he brought incisive intelligence and a dogged determination to debates on the economy. We on the Liberal Democrat Benches rarely agreed with him, but he certainly made a contribution.

Tonight's debate has been a long time coming. Over the summer recess it sometimes seemed that every day brought another shock to our nation's economy—job losses at home, storm clouds abroad and forecasts of worse to come. Now we have heard from the Chief Secretary and Labour Members that the picture is far rosier than has been made out.

During the debate, there has been the usual ping-pong of statistics across the Floor, quote and counter-quote, but no one has sought to argue with the fundamental point that the United Kingdom is fast decelerating. No one has challenged our basic premise that manufacturing and agriculture are in great difficulties. Indeed, the Chief Secretary acknowledged that. I cannot recall any hon. Member arguing this evening that the economic prospects, especially for industry, are anything less than serious, with a distinct possibility of a significant loss of manufacturing jobs over the next few months.

There has undoubtedly been disagreement over the causes of the downturn. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) predicted, the Minister tried to play the blame game. He said that it was not the Government's fault and he tried to blame the previous Government. He said that it was the fault of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). He blamed the crisis in the far east, and unproductive and inefficient businesses. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon pointed out, the facts do not bear out that story.

The mistakes made by the Chancellor, particularly those in his first Budget, are now all too apparent, with the economy unbalanced by a growing services sector and shrinking manufactures, caused by the misguided mix of monetary and fiscal policies in the Government's first 18 months.

The Chief Secretary's speech was full of good stuff. We could all agree with much of what he said, but he did not deal with the fundamental point. It is a pity that the Chancellor has not participated in the debate, to take this early opportunity provided for him by the Liberal Democrats to answer the rising criticism in the country.

In the Chancellor's absence, what has the Minister said in his defence? How do the Government try to argue that the current situation is nothing to do with them, and that all their policies have, despite evidence to the contrary, been successful? Unfortunately, they have used little more than the usual stale and unconvincing mantras, which we have heard in every debate since the election and in every "Today" programme interview.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: I want to make progress. I shall take interventions later.

The Chief Secretary said that the Government's policies were designed to end the cycle of boom and bust. In the parrot-like fashion to which we have become accustomed, he said that stability and prudence were the thing, for the long term. Those are good objectives. We all agree with them. Like motherhood and apple pie, even John Humphrys could not disagree with the sentiment. However, the continual incantation of such choruses does not put the words into action. That is the key part of our charge tonight.

The Government's oft-recited rhetoric of long-termism is not sufficiently followed in their practice of economic management. That is why the pound has been so unstable, real interest rates are so high and the economy is so unbalanced. Those are the results of bad economic judgments made in Downing street.

Unlike many hon. Members who have spoken tonight, we do not blame the Bank of England for the high interest rates. The Chancellor gave the Monetary Policy Committee little choice but to raise interest rates when he refused to use taxation to curb the consumer boom in his first Budget. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said in reply to the Chancellor back in July last year, instead of shackling businesses, the Chancellor should restrain the consumer in order to prevent high interest rates.

Of course Liberal Democrats support the independence of the Bank of England. That policy, borrowed from our manifesto, is essential. [Interruption.] Labour Members laugh, but the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) said so herself. That policy is essential to tackle the boom and bust that has been endemic in the British post-war economy. The problem is that the Chancellor has failed to understand his newly acquired policy. In his recent comments urging the case for reduced interest rates—

Mr. Plaskitt rose—

Mr. Davey: No, I must press on.

However correct thatcase is, the Chancellor has done much to undermine the policy of independence for the Bank. As our motion states, it is important that the Chancellor resist such pressures and temptations.

The pressure that the Chancellor put on the MPC from the International Monetary Fund to cut rates was not the first time that he has meddled. In autumn 1997, Treasury sources were reported as saying that the Bank was not putting rates up fast enough—"Stick 'em up, Eddie, one season; drop 'em, Eddie, the next." That is not the stuff of long-termism.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Will the hon Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: No. That is not the stuff of long-termism. It does not contribute to ending boom and bust. Why cannot the Chancellor practise what he preaches? This is not an academic point. Whatever the governor told the Treasury Select Committee last week, if the markets begin to perceive that the Bank does not have the independence that the Chancellor promised, its credibility will be hit.

Mr. Gardiner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: The low long-term rates that the Government rightly crow about could start to rise. The Government's meddling with the Bank's independence could have even worse effects. The Bank may feel the need to reassert itself to prove its independence. Short-term rates will fall more slowly than they would otherwise have done. There will be higher short-term rates and long-term rates merely because of the ill-discipline of the Chancellor and his Charlie on the mobile.

It is not only with the Bank's independence that the Government are failing to practise long-termism. Their lack of policy on exchange rates shows their complete failure to set a clear and stable lead. In less than three months—

Mr. Plaskitt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: I will not give way because I need to make some progress.

In less than three months, 11 of our partners in the European Union will grasp a new opportunity for prosperity—the euro. Our Government still have not made up their mind. Apparently the single currency is a good thing in principle—no doubt like central bank independence and manufacturing industry. However, in practice, the Government dither, dodge and duck.

We on the Liberal Democrat Benches are absolutely clear where the United Kingdom's long-term interest lies. That is where currency stability for hard-pressed manufacturers and farmers can be found and not in the let's-not-take-a-decision economics of the Labour party. Look at the gyrations of the pound over the past year. It is—

Mr. Plaskitt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. Davey: Labour Members should consider the gyrations of the pound over the past year. It soared to DM3.10 to the pound before falling to a still rather high DM2.80. That is how unstable the Government's current policy is. The Chancellor's bungie jumping policy on sterling is a return to the Tories' boom-bust economics, not an end of them.

That brings me to the third part of the Government's macro-economic policy, which we are told has been set for the long term, for stability, but which Ministers look ready to fudge if the going gets tough. That is fiscal policy. It is our old friend prudence.

The problem is that prudence has been put in a straitjacket. Unwilling to admit that their election promise not to raise rates of direct taxation was irresponsible, the Government have tied their hands behind their backs. That is why the economy is now so unbalanced. It is the result of the Government's disavowal of a proactive role for fiscal policy. That is something that the occupants of the Government Front Bench share with the Tories. In a world where Governments struggle against global economics it is pure madness to deny oneself weapons such as direct taxation.

When Liberal Democrats argued for an independent Bank, we did not say that the Government should give up all responsibility for macro-economic management. Fiscal policy has to support monetary policy. In some situations—classically in that of an unbalanced economy, where services and manufacturing are growing at different rates—fiscal policy can be used far more effectively than monetary policy. That is why we argued when considering the Budget of July 1997 that taxation should have been increased.

Mr. Bercow: By how much?

Mr. Davey: We said at the time and it is on record.

A Chancellor truly concerned with the long term would be prepared to take the political flak for raising personal taxation, when needed.

The Government are culpable in this economic situation because their actions have not met their words. They are meddling with the Bank, when they said that it should be free. They are dithering over the exchange rate, which they say in principle should be joined to the euro. Worst of all, they are unwilling to use the weapon of fiscal policy, making their target a starting rate for income tax of 10p in the pound.

In the minutes that remain, I shall move on to a key, issue that has been raised by Ministers before and during the debate—the productivity performance of British manufacturing industry. This is relevant because Ministers are saying that poor productivity is a cause of our problems. Why this should suddenly be the case is not clear, but that is the ministerial charge. The Government are right to be concerned about the productivity gap. However, I hope that Ministers will examine the charge made by some people, who believe that the productivity performance of British industry is much better than the official statistics suggest. This is crucial because it bears directly on the interest rate decisions of the Monetary Policy Committee. Productivity figures are relevant because they tell us about the inflationary implications of wage rises of 4 and 5 per cent. It is possible for firms to meet such wage demands without a knock-on effect if healthy productivity increases accompany those wage rises.

Yet we are told by the Office for National Statistics that wage increases in recent years have been accompanied by very low increases in manufacturing productivity, seeming to add new cost-push pressures to inflation. We are told that worries about wage inflation have been a major factor in the decisions of the MPC to keep interest rates high. However, I wonder whether Ministers have seen a recent paper produced by two academics, Paul Robson and Neil Blake, in the "August Economic Outlook" of the London business school. The paper questions the reliability of the official statistics for manufacturing productivity. It argues that the dramatic slowdown recorded in these figures since 1994 has not actually happened. Using other evidence, the two academics to whom I have referred find that productivity could have risen by as much as 4 per cent. per annum rather than the tiny 0.7 per cent. in the official data. That is a dramatic difference.

Coupled with the Government's concerns about the reliability of the statistics on average earnings growth—concerns that prompted the Chancellor to launch an inquiry into that dataset—it is quite possible that the MPC has been making decisions not only in the dark but with the wrong information. If average earnings are growing more slowly than the data have been telling us and if manufacturing productivity has been much higher than we previously believed, the danger of inflation has been completely overstated. Against that background, interest rates should be moving to lower levels, converging with European levels. This analysis backs up our long-held view that the problem in today's economy is not manufacturing but an overheated service sector and that interest rates and an over-valued pound are exactly the wrong policies to be applying.

I hope that the Chief Secretary will, as he promised in his earlier remarks, reflect on the argument that I have outlined. It is fairly fundamental. The right hon. Gentleman said that he would do so. If the data of the Office for National Statistics have significantly affected policy making, as they appear from the minutes of the MPC to have done, it is the Government's responsibility to act fast.

The motion calls for some significant changes in economic policy. It sets out how to operate a truly independent Bank and refers to exchange rate and fiscal policies. All our policies are consistent with what the Government claim they want to introduce—a long-term approach to macro-economic management and a more stable economy. With manufacturing jobs being lost in their hundreds of thousands and with farming on its knees, it is time that the Government listened to our arguments and acted. Liberal Democrats provide the Government this evening with the opportunity to act and they should take it.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I thank the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and his colleagues for initiating the debate and for the welcome that they gave to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and to me. It has been a pleasure for me, as the new Economic Secretary, to listen to the debate. It has been a particular pleasure to hear so many thoughtful and well-informed contributions from my hon. Friends. I say with some regret that we heard very little by way of policies from the Liberal Democrats, and even less from Conservative Members by way of answers to the questions which remain on what their policies really are.

The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) spoke of the golden legacy which the Government have supposedly inherited from the previous Administration. He suggested that we needed only to continue what the previous Administration were doing. That would mean continuing to let inflation get out of control and excessive borrowing. Indeed, borrowing in the public sector reached £50 billion in the early 1990s. If we continued with what the Conservative Government were doing, it would mean continuing to fail to invest in education and health. It would mean also continuing with one in five of working-age households having nobody in work. It would mean continuing to ignore the productivity gap between us and our competitors.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) rightly stressed in his very fine contribution that the official Opposition were once again talking down the British economy. He stressed that we need to recognise the successes that, despite the difficult conditions that we face in the rest of the world, we are still achieving at home. The output figures published last Friday—those are real figures, not surveys or predictions—show that output in the third quarter of this year rose by 0.5 per cent. on the previous quarter, and by 2.5 per cent. on the previous year.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): I thank the Minister for giving way, as it gives me an opportunity to congratulate her on her appointment. What growth figure do the Government forecast for 1999?

Ms Hewitt: I thank the hon. Gentleman and in turn congratulate him on his promotion to the Opposition Front Bench. As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said at the beginning of the debate, and as the hon. Gentleman well knows, our revised forecast for growth and for the public sector will be published in the normal way in the pre-Budget report next week.

The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) spent some time pointing out, and rightly so, that there was a black hole in Liberal Democrat policy, although he fell into the hole himself in respect of Conservative policy on EMU. He tried to argue that the Government's monetary and fiscal policies were working against each other. Mervyn King, Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, said at the Bank's press conference on the August inflation report that "the idea that in some sense fiscal policy is being wildly expansionary I think is completely off the mark. Fiscal policy is absolutely in line with the golden rule and on a stable, sustainable path."

The hon. Gentleman also suggested that our public spending plans were unsustainable. Let me stress, as the Chief Secretary did, that, unlike our predecessors, this Government have consistently taken a prudent and cautious approach to managing the public finances.

Mr. Ruffley: Will hon. Lady explain why the Prime Minister said in April 1997 that he would reduce welfare spending, when the Government are now increasing it?

Ms Hewitt: The Prime Minister said then and on many other occasions that we would reduce the bills on failure and invest in the conditions for success. That is precisely what we are doing. We said, as a result of the comprehensive spending review, that we would invest an additional £40 billion over the next three years in health and education, and we shall do so. We are able to do so, despite the difficult conditions that we face in the world economy, because we took a more cautious view of the trend rate of growth in the economy and tested our public spending and investment plans against the risk that there might be lower growth than we were then forecasting. We built in margins to cover uncertainties, so we shall stick to the £40 billion investment.

Mr. Gibb: Will the Economic Secretary spell out to the House precisely what those margins are?

Ms Hewitt: I have just done so. We built into our forecasts a lower rate of trend growth in the economy than the Conservative Government did.

Mr. Gibb: Read the document.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman will see it there.

Mr. Loughton: How much by?

Ms Hewitt: By 0.25 per cent. We also tested our public sector spending plans against the possibility of lower than expected growth. The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) will have to wait for detailed figures, which will appear in next week's pre Budget report.

Mr. Loughton: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Hewitt: I have already given way several times—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) interrupting all the time. He must calm himself.

Ms Hewitt: We shall stick to our £40 billion of planned additional spending on health and education, which the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton and other Conservative Members do not want us to spend. We favour additional spending on health and education, whereas Conservatives are against it. That is one of the biggest differences between us and the modern Conservative party—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) must behave himself.

Ms Hewitt: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Tyrie: The hon. Lady mentioned me in her speech. Can she explain what those margins are? For example, what percentage of each spending total are they, and how are they built into each part of departmental budgets? Such margins are a novelty in the history of public accounts, as they are not separately identified in the general reserve, which the Government halved.

Ms Hewitt: I have already dealt with that point twice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith) spoke for manufacturing industry in her constituency and the rest of the country. She made an extremely important point about the need to raise the level of training and skills. She said that employers in her constituency are, like some in my constituency, finding it impossible to recruit people with the required skills. She will welcome, as I have, the Government's investment in the new deal, a programme that not only has individual learning accounts but establishes a university for industry. We shall hear more about productivity and improving skills and training in next week's pre-Budget report.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) was rightly concerned about the health of manufacturing industry after 18 years of Conservative Government. The real disaster for manufacturers in his constituency and throughout the country would be a return to the Conservative policies that gave us interest rates of 15 per cent. and a devastating loss of jobs in manufacturing industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) made a particularly robust contribution to the debate. She seemed to conclude that there was no difference between the present Government and the previous Administration. Let me remind her and the House of some of the differences. By giving the Bank of England operational independence we have achieved the lowest long-term interest rates for 35 years. We have brought down corporation tax to the lowest rate for 30 years. We shall introduce a minimum wage to protect millions of the lowest paid people. We have introduced the new deal for young and long-term unemployed people, lone parents and people with disabilities. Moreover, we shall make work pay, particularly with the introduction of the working families tax credit.

The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) was concerned about the impact of economic policies on the Scottish economy. I remind him that, in the year to the third quarter of 1998, employment in Scotland increased by 13,000 and unemployment fell by 26,000, and employment in Scotland has risen by 52,000 since the general election. Thanks to the work done, particularly by Locate in Scotland and the Scottish Office, we have helped to attract to Scotland 87 inward investment projects involving planned investment of more than £1 billion and we expect the creation or safeguarding of nearly 18,000 jobs. Those measures will be as welcome to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues as they are to me and mine.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr.Davey) appeared unable to say whether we had given too much or too little independence to the Bank of England. He repeated a concern raised by other hon. Members that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had somehow put undue pressure on the Bank of England. Just a week or so ago, the Governor of the Bank of England said:

> "It is . . . entirely legitimate for the Treasury, the Chancellor, to make plain what their perception of the future of the economy is, and indeed rather proper that they should, when they see a significant change of this kind, so I have absolutely no complaints about that".

As I hope the hon. Gentleman would agree, an independent central bank is the best way to ensure the long-term credibility of this country's monetary policy.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton referred to the arcane dispute about productivity between the London business school and the Office for National Statistics, but what he failed to say about that interesting article from the London business school was that it accepts that the revised figures—the revised methodology—produce more accurate and reliable estimates of level of output and of employment in the economy.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Will the Minister acknowledge that the true problem facing manufacturing industry is real interest rates of 5 per cent. compared with 2 per cent. in Europe and an exchange rate that is higher than that achieved in the previous recession? When will the Government address those issues?

Ms Hewitt: The exchange rate against the deutschmark is now back where it was when we were elected last year; long-term interest rates are the lowest they have been for 35 years; and the problem that manufacturing industry needs to address, and which we are helping it to tackle, is the productivity gap between us and our competitors.

We inherited from the previous Government an economy that was heading for another Conservative boom and bust. We have taken the tough decisions necessary to get the economy on a long-term, stable course. Thanks to the tough decisions that we have made, especially on public finances, we are able to invest an additional £40 billion over the next three years in education and in health.

Of course the United Kingdom is not immune to what is going on in the rest of the world economy. We will announce next week our own predictions for growth; that will still be growth in line with other forecasts for next year. We have put in effect measures to strengthen the economy for the long term—the new deal, the minimum wage and cuts in corporation tax.

We are making the decisions that are needed for the long-term strength of the economy and to make provisions that will enable everyone in the community to fulfil his or her potential. That is why the United Kingdom economy is steering a course of stability in an increasingly unstable world. I commend the amendment in the Prime Minister's name to my hon. Friends and to the House.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to the Order [this day], and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that the Government inherited an economy in which public sector net borrowing was £28 billion, inflation was set to rise sharply above target because of the failure of the previous Government to take the necessary action on interest rates; recalls that the previous Government presided over a boom and bust economy where interest rates reached 15 per cent. and inflation reached 10 per cent., doubled the national debt in the 1990s, worsened inequality and failed to tackle the weaknesses in the British economy; commends the actions of this Government which is steering a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world, has established a credible framework for monetary policy that has led to the lowest long-term interest rates in 35 years, and inflation hitting its 2.5 per cent. target, and has taken tough action to cut government borrowing by £20 billion; and welcomes the increase in employment of 400,000 since the election, the launch of the New Deal, reform of the tax and benefit system to tackle unemployment and poverty traps, support for British business through cuts in corporation tax and small business tax to their lowest levels ever, and the extra investment of £40 billion in education and health over the next three years.

Farming and Food

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): We now come to the debate on farming and the food industry. I wish to announce that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes moves made by Her Majesty's Government in recent weeks to address some of the problems facing the British agricultural industry but believes these problems would more successfully addressed by measures such as accessing agri-monetary compensation funds, ensuring that animal welfare standards are enforced uniformly across the EU and that UK standards are applied to imports, encouraging supermarkets to support British farming in their buying policies and addressing the imbalance in the bargaining power between producers and the supermarkets, implementing a 'Buy British' policy in central government and its agencies and encouraging local government to do likewise wherever possible, retaining the Calf Processing Scheme, reducing inspection charges on farmers, ensuring that payments to farmers are made promptly, stabilising exchange rates by making an early declaration of intent of the Government's commitment to join the European Single Currency, implementing longer-term measures that are also needed to secure the future of British farming, including the clear labelling of products including imports, and ensuring that CAP reform does not discriminate against British farmers and any uptake of an early retirement scheme does not lead to compulsory amalgamation of holdings; further believes that confidence in the safety and quality of British food will only be restored when a fully independent and authoritative Food Standards Agency is established; and regrets any delay in its creation.

This is one of our two half-day debates being held shortly after the resumption of the parliamentary Session. This motion, together with the question that my party leader, my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), asked the Prime Minister last week at the first Prime Minister's questions since the recess, underscores the fundamental importance that the Liberal Democrats attach to the crisis in British agriculture, and to the knock-on ramifications for the food chain and for wider rural policy.

Before I turn to the Government and to the new Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, I must express my surprise at the Order Paper. Given the countryside march and the high priority that the leader of the Conservative party has placed on these matters in recent months, it was astonishing to see that the Conservatives either agree lock, stock and barrel with Liberal Democrat policy—if so, I am delighted—and do not feel the need to table their own amendment, or have nothing new or original to say on these matters, which I suspect is the case.

I further gather from my friends in the Tory party—the few that are left—that they are on a one-line Whip. Given that they have been making such a song and dance in the House about these issues, one wonders why they are not on a three-line Whip and joining us in trying to put the Government under constructive pressure. They cannot all be having tea with General Pinochet—even genetically modified tea.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of early-day motion 1688 about beef-on-the-bone regulations? It is signed by 34 members of the Conservative party, but not one Liberal Democrat has signed it.

Mr. Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman may not recall the occasion on which the Liberal Democrats tabled a motion opposing those regulations, and I well imagine why he may not wish to do so. The Conservatives, to be fair, were happy enough to support us on that occasion, the reason being that our position is established in terms of the progress of legislation.

As I pointed out to the hon. Gentleman generously on the occasion to which I refer—for the benefit of those who were not present then, I will share it with him again—I always welcome interventions of that kind from him, because he was my defeated Conservative opponent in 1992.

The Conservatives seem to be removing themselves from the field of battle in this regard. That is no wonder, given what happened at their party conference. The party has an unreal attitude to Europe and, in particular, to European monetary union. That means that, in the long term, in respect of the broad parameters of agricultural policy and reform of the common agricultural policy—and, as we all know, the big decisions will be made in that context—the Conservatives have nothing to say for the next eight years.

I am glad that the Conservatives have clarified that, because it means that it is possible for a debate to take place this evening between the Government and Liberal Democrats. In speaking to the motion, I am mindful of the fact that the post of agriculture spokesman is a rather sticky wicket in all the parties. We are on our second Minister, and I wish him well. We are on our third Conservative party spokesman: one has diversified; one, presumably, has been "set aside"; and I wish the third well in his debut performance.

Wisely and carefully, we drafted our motion to encompass more than just farming. We have referred to the food industry in general, and there is a reason for that. In agriculture debates, we may all at times overlook the value to the United Kingdom economy of not just agriculture, but agriculture and the entire food-and-drink sector, in the context of the manufacturing base that we debated earlier.

The gross value added of UK food manufacturing is about £16 billion. It is a huge sector, and the food-and-drink sector's share of employment in manufacturing is about 11 per cent. That accounts for about half a million employees. No fewer than 1 million farmers, farm workers and food industry workers are employed in farming and food manufacturing. It is therefore appropriate for us to consider the issues on a slightly wider basis than that of agriculture, although I want to focus on the problems afflicting farming.

Over the summer, there have been repeated leaks, hints, press reports and speculation about legislation on the Food Standards Agency, culminating in a recent speech by the Minister in Yorkshire. Those of us who represent agricultural seats, and have participated in debates such as this over the years, know how opinion has moved in agriculture. I remember when I first stood for Parliament in 1983. I stood up in front of my constituency branch of the National Farmers Union, and argued that its interests would be better served by the hiving-off of the consumer-food safety side of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to a free-standing agency—that was what the alliance then supported—with the Ministry looking after only the production side. The response to that was pretty hostile.

Nowadays—largely as a result of the disasters that have been visited on agriculture and the food chain—those who talk to farmers throughout the country will find that they are as anxious as anyone else for the Government to proceed with all due haste. They know that the signal that will send to the consumer is profoundly important to the industry. The issue is wider than it might have been even a few years ago. The Government have rightly committed themselves to the introduction of an independent Food Standards Agency. If that is not in the Queen's Speech in a few weeks' time, not only will they have slipped in terms of their manifesto commitments; it will be damaging to the interests of both the UK agriculture sector and the UK consumer. It will be doubly damaging. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that the Government are not back-pedalling or stalling on their commitment, because, if they are, it will be a great setback.

In that context, let me say a word about supermarkets, which, in recent weeks and months, have been the subject of observations in various Select Committee reports. I hope that the Minister will be able to meet representatives of the retail sector soon: that is vital. When he does, he should—as well as bearing in mind one or two items on which I shall touch—have a constructive dialogue with the supermarkets, which are in an immensely privileged, powerful and monopolistic position. He must make it clear that they must play their part in encouraging consumer purchasing habits that will benefit UK agriculture.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Is it not regrettable that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is not looking at the wholesale as well as the retail side of the market?

Mr. Kennedy: I think that a broader analysis would have been better, but at least an analysis is being made in response to Select Committee reports—and, indeed, to the excellent report of my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) about the activities of supermarkets in this respect. However, I agree that the canvas could have been broader.

A dialogue between the Minister and the retail sector is essential. We urge him to do more to ensure that UK content means legitimate UK content, as opposed to content that is cut up, packaged and dispensed in this country but reared elsewhere; but, much as we want him to take such action, we cannot divorce that important facet from the Government's abysmal behaviour since they came to office in regard to the accessing of European Community funds.

The country is in a cycle of insanity. The United Kingdom taxpayer is paying into EU funds; those funds are being accessed by nearly every other member state to help its farmers—farmers who, frequently, are employing lower animal husbandry and other standards than are imposed on our farmers. Their products are then imported into this country, packaged and labelled as UK content, and sold, cut-price, to the UK consumer. In the process, our farmers are being put out of business. The Minister will have to address that issue with alacrity. He cannot, in all integrity, engage in the necessary dialogue with the supermarkets while his Government preside over such a policy.

Throughout the country, we see the dreadful state of British agriculture. It is said that farmers often complain—that whatever is right in one sector is not right in another, that if the weather is right for one part of the country it is not right for another, and so forth. The current crisis was summed up very well by a Yorkshireman who remarked to me, in typically ebullient fashion, "You know how bad things are, lad, when even the guys who won't pay stop ordering." That—put, albeit, in fairly rumbustious fashion—reflects the extent of the difficulty.

Hill farmers in Wales are probably suffering more than farmers in any other part of the United Kingdom, but there is no part of the United Kingdom that is not suffering. There is no sector that is not experiencing a drastic drop in prices and a bad harvest, as well as all the knock-on effects of BSE and the madness of the ban on beef on the bone. I was encouraged to note that the Minister was anxious to do something about that; perhaps he will reassure us further tonight. There is also the continuing difficulty caused by our failure to take a sufficiently positive approach at a European level.

In Scotland, if I may say a word in regard of my country, there is a disastrous ministerial regime under Lord Sewel. Given his recent defeats in another place, it is high time that he were allowed to concentrate all his energies on devolution and to pass to the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), interim responsibility for agricultural matters. I say "interim" because I hope that, after next May, we will have a Scottish Liberal Democrat in charge of Scottish farming policy and dealing with the difficulties in the Scottish Office, which have not been witnessed south of the border, with regard to arable payments.

The Secretary of State for Scotland has made a great headline announcement, saying that arable payments will be available to help the current income crisis, but such are the bureaucracy and failings in the system that those payments are not, in large measure, getting in time to the people whom they need to hit. These are serious issues with which government in all parts of the United Kingdom should deal.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, in relation to arable aid payments, there is still a hangover from the previous financial year for a number of farmers because of mapping difficulties and the flow of information to the Scottish Office?

Mr. Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman is correct. Those farmers face a double whammy because, as he rightly says, there is the hangover from the previous year, as well as difficulties with the present set of payments. When a Minister makes a great announcement about some additional help—remember, this additional help is targeted only at the short-term income crisis; it does not deal with the longer-term strategic crisis of UK agriculture—and even that help does not come forward in time and is not delivered where and in the way it is supposed to be delivered, it has a doubly depressing effect on those who are left in the agriculture sector, given the collapsed state of morale in the sector.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald) rose—

Mr. Kennedy: Having perhaps destroyed the hon. Gentleman's career by praising him as the possible Minister with responsibility for agriculture in Scotland, the least I can do is allow him to make his debut.

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are a little beneath him. His arguments would be better balanced if he would reflect that support to the farming community of Scotland is at its highest level ever—£500 million a year—and that, in this current year, that support has been further increased by an extra £50 million, a 10 per cent. increase. It would be better if he took that on board when he assessed the Government's help to farmers in Scotland.

Mr. Kennedy: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I always listen to him with respect and affection. I do not think that these arguments are beneath me or anyone else because, to a greater extent than any other Minister with responsibility for agriculture in any of the four nations of the UK, it is Lord Sewel who has tramped the country using the demon word "restructuring".

What does restructuring suggest to an agricultural community that is already in the depths of crisis? It suggests what the steelworkers, the coal miners and shipbuilders all experienced under Thatcherism. It means that this Government's mindset is to allow a significant proportion of traditional family farming throughout the UK to disappear. If they allow it to go to the wall, the great irony is that, when people retreat from the land, when the family farms are sold, when there are more amalgamations and more agri-businesses, when we do not have the families there who, for generation on generation, have looked after these areas, be it Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, the highlands or rural Wales, the very objectives on which there is all-party consensus in terms of CAP reform—that more funds should go into rural development, diversification, conservation, management of the habitat—will not be met and we will not be able to develop the post-CAP reform, Agenda 2000 approach to which the Government pay lip service.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that what is needed is an immediate package to rescue the industry, and that one of the most important things for family farms in upland areas is to have hill livestock compensatory allowances jacked up to the 1992 level, plus inflation? It is the Tories who cut the allowances and it is Labour who should restore them. We would support Labour if it did that.

Mr. Kennedy: I agree with my hon. Friend, who has made a notable contribution, both professionally and in his membership of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, to matters agricultural. He is right to say that, for hill and upland farmers, particularly in less-favoured areas, HLCAs are the most immediate, most targeted and most responsive assistance that any Government can come forward with.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) rose—

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland) rose—

Mr. Kennedy: I had better give way to the last but one shadow Minister.

Mr. Jack: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm just one fact? When we left office, hill livestock compensatory allowances were £160 million; currently, they are £125 million.

Mr. Kennedy: The point that my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) has made deals with that adequately. We do not support this Government's approach towards HLCAs. It must be remembered that the freezing took place in 1992, so the right hon. Gentleman cannot, as Conservatives are all too prone to do, believe that all the problems that we are discussing in this and other debates began at the stroke of midnight on 2 May a year and a half ago. Many of them are deep-rooted and, in part at least, the legacy of the previous overlong Conservative Administration.

Mr. Foster: I was going to compliment the hon. Gentleman on his powerful speech, but I should point out, before he leaves HLCAs, that he did not manage to cover my constituency, which includes Teesdale. I have 600 sheep farmers there, 400 of whom depend on HLCAs. It is the worst crisis that I remember in 20 years as their Member of Parliament. Clearly, the most effective thing that my Government can do is to increase HLCAs substantially.

Mr. Kennedy: I hope that one of the positive signals that can emerge in the direction of the Treasury Bench and the Minister tonight is that, the more all-party support we can have behind the continuance and upgrading of HLCAs in coming weeks and months, the better it will be. The Government can make a difference there and it is something that is well worth them responding to positively, if not tonight, at some later stage. I reflect only on the fact that I do not know which career has been more damaged—that of my friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland by my praising him, or mine by the distinguished right hon. Gentleman praising me.

The essential difficulty in terms of what we outline in our motion is that, the immediate crisis apart, and I do not think that there is any serious doubt that "crisis" is the appropriate word in this context, we now have a society—I have been interested by what the Minister has been saying in recent weeks in this respect—where there is perhaps too much polarity between urban and rural Britain.

The Minister and I are of a generation where we can recall our parents telling us how, in the last world war, children were sent out of urban conurbations to farms, parts of the country that they would not, otherwise, have seen or experienced. That is not happening these days. Even with greater social mobility, there is not the same fundamental understanding of the rural economy, and of agriculture in particular, that was a feature of that particular generation.

Therefore, it is incumbent on the Government and on the House as a whole to do more to support our agricultural base, to recognise that one of the important ways of so doing is to ensure the highest standards in the food safety chain, and to give reassurance and realistic positive support where it is so desperately needed. That is the clarion call that the Liberal Democrats express on behalf of the UK agriculture sector. It is one to which I hope that the House in general and the Government in particular can respond positively.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government's strong commitment to the UK farming industry and to the wider rural economy; welcomes in particular the steps which the Government has taken since May 1997 to support the beef and sheep industry via EU agri-monetary compensation and relief from charges; acknowledges the steps taken specifically to help the sheep, pig and cereal sectors with targeted EU measures; and endorses the Government's intention to bring about a secure and viable future for the UK farming and food industries through a market-orientated reform of the Common Agricultural Policy."

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) for the content of his speech, with much of which—particularly his concern for the rural economy—we can agree. We are particularly at one on the comments that he made in the final part of his speech.

The hon. Gentleman said that he would curtail his comments so that as many hon. Members as possible would be able to speak in this debate. He therefore could not deal in his speech with every item listed in the Liberal Democrats' motion on today's Order Paper. I do not criticise him for that brevity. Although I shall not respond to every item in the motion, I shall try to deal with some of the key issues that he raised. I should be happy to try to deal with all the issues, but, in a short debate, that would only cause complaints.

I welcome the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) to his new position in the shadow Cabinet. However, he is not the third shadow agriculture spokesman that the Government have faced in the past 18 months but the fourth. One of his predecessors as agriculture spokesman held the post for a little while, in May 1997, until changes were made. There has been—I do not criticise it—a high turnover in the position.

I know that the House expects me to deal with the much-needed support that is going to agriculture. Although no one makes any complaint about that support, at the end of an agriculture debate, one should never try to leave the impression, or make a public pronouncement, to the effect that the sector is devoid of support from the taxpayer, because it is not. Public support for agriculture amounts to billions of pounds. Although I shall not deal with the catalogue of issues affecting the sector, I shall deal with the main ones, because they are extremely serious.

I accept the comments made by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West at the beginning of his speech, and agree that, for the first time ever, many factors have come together simultaneously to affect agriculture. We have examined the ups and downs of the various sectors of the industry, and confirmed that, although all the sectors have never flourished at the same time, there has never before been a time when almost every sector has, for different reasons, been attacked and undermined as almost every sector is being attacked and undermined at present. The assault on all those sectors has had a cumulative effect on many farmers and food producers. We shall seek to make as much progress as we can in our negotiations on the package that we shall put together to meet the immediacy of farmers' and food producers' demands.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): May I emphasise the severity of the crisis on the hillsides in Wales, and tell my hon. Friend of the problems faced by sheepmeat and beef producers, even on the lower pastures and in the dairy industry? The National Farmers Union county delegate, Mr. Terrig Morgan at Fferm Carreg y Llech, Mr. Idris Roberts of Pwll farm, Trevddyn, and Mr. Clive Swann of Ffrith farm have told me of the real difficulties faced by their members. They hope very much that urgent action will be taken. The good news is that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), has agreed to meet my Trevddyn and Llanfynydd members—who I am sure will receive a favourable reply.

Mr. Rooker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning those locations, as it saves me having to do so. I am grateful also for the presence in the Chamber of my hon. Friends who are Ministers in the Welsh Office and the Scottish Office, as agriculture is an issue that affects people across the United Kingdom.

I should mention some aspects of the financial assistance available from taxpayers. Although I know that it annoys some people when we mention it, the fact is that, so far, £2.5 billion has been spent on BSE-related measures, some of which are market-support measures. The situation today would be far worse than it is if we did not spend that money provided by taxpayers. Moreover, beef producers are receiving annually in normal beef subsidy payments approximately £500 million. Furthermore, in 1996–97, some £450 million in ewe premium payments were paid to sheep producers. Although slightly less was paid in the subsequent year, several hundreds of millions of pounds were paid.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: I shall be happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman after I have made a little progress in my speech.

Should sheep prices remain low this year, producers will benefit from the higher ewe premium. Moreover, in response to currently low lamb prices, we have successfully urged the European Commission to grant private storage aid for sheepmeat in the United Kingdom. The Commission has very promptly responded to our request, providing private storage aid for a maximum of 2,400 tonnes. Early indications are that, because of the storage, significant quantities of lamb will be removed from the market.

The Government have also just agreed to an increase in advances payable under the beef special premium and the suckler cow premium scheme, from 60 to 80 per cent. The increase in the level of advance payments will, in the very near future, bring to the industry some £100 million, which would otherwise not have been available until spring 1999.

We have also persuaded the Commission to extend beef intervention coverage in Northern Ireland for the last four tenders in 1998 and to provide for an increase in the maximum carcase weight of animals purchased.

Although the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West did not mention some matters in his speech, they are part of the Liberal Democrats' motion, and I shall deal with them. Some matters are more important than others, because they are more pressing.

One such matter is the calf processing scheme. During the summer recess, we announced our decision on the statutory implications of that scheme, which will end on 30 November. As of today, that is still the position. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] No, nothing has been ruled in or ruled out. The Ministry is seriously considering a range of options, and we are genuinely considering all the points that have been made to us over the summer recess. To do anything other than that would be a derogation of our responsibility as Ministers to the House. We are genuinely considering all the points that have been made to us.

I have not said that there has been any change in the scheme. As of today, the scheme will end as we have announced that it would. The statutory scheme ends on 30 November. However, as I said, we are genuinely considering all requests that have been made to us over the summer recess. Although that matter was dealt with in the Liberal Democrats' motion, I cannot say any more about it now. I had hoped to deal with the matter in such a manner that I would not have to deal with it at greater length, but perhaps I will have to.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) rose—

Mr. Kennedy: The Minister is trying to be very upfront about the matter. Perhaps the way in which he is expressing himself—using double negatives—is almost making him sound disingenuous. Is he saying that the Government are considering extending the scheme, which is what we are asking for?

Mr. Rooker: No. I said that the scheme would close. However, we are considering each and every request that has been made to us over the summer recess by the farming and livestock communities. That is the current position. I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Curry rose—

Mr. Rooker: I shall give way to one of the other former shadow agriculture spokesmen.

Mr. Curry: This one is lying fallow.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, unless the scheme is continued or something that has equivalent effect is introduced, there will be a real welfare problem, and that farmers simply will not pay £2.50 for a tag for a worthless calf? Does he agree also that much poor-quality beef from the dairy herd will be reared and hang over the beef market, ultimately costing the Government much more than if they had produced a scheme to take that beef out of the marketplace?

Mr. Rooker: That may be true. However, I tell the right hon. Gentleman that, although dairy farmers in particular have pressed for continuing the scheme, the animal welfare lobby and abattoir operators have welcomed the decision to end it. The matter is not clear cut, and there is no uniform support in the industry for one particular option one way or the other. It is not correct to say that there is such uniform support. It is also quite clear that it would be a considerable time—into 2000—before the effect of ending the scheme was felt in the beef industry.

I am simply trying, as concisely as possible, to tell the House that we are seriously and genuinely considering all the requests that were made over the summer recess to me, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture and other Ministers. I am not in a position to announce any decisions. Therefore, the position must today remain as we announced it in the summer. I do not want to give anyone a false impression.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: Not now, although I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. I should like to deal with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West.

I accept that hill farmers are facing considerable difficulties. I know that from personal experience, having visited several over the recess, professionally—as a Minister—and as a tourist in the hills. I have gone out of my way to listen to as many as possible. Nevertheless, the fact is that £600 million of subsidies will this year be distributed to hill farmers alone, so the Government's commitment to support farming in the hills is in no doubt. I make it absolutely clear that we fully intend to continue supporting it.

The autumn review of economic conditions in the uplands is well under way. The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West referred to the hill livestock compensatory allowance rates. These are, of course, a structural measure. It is our intention to replace the scheme with one that will deliver support more effectively to hill farmers to meet social and environmental concerns, the very points that the hon. Gentleman made, albeit in a different form of words. However, the scheme is being considered in the context of Agenda 2000, which envisages a switch from headage payments to an area-based scheme.

[Mr. Rooker]

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West was a little unfair on Lord Sewel. Everyone understands that change is never easy, but we plan to consult fully on options for a new scheme later this year.

Sir Robert Smith: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: Yes, I promised that I would give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Sir Robert Smith: Does the Minister not understand the frustration felt by the farming community as it faces the crisis now? Lord Sewel talks about the future but wants to implement the scheme in the United Kingdom before it is implemented in the rest of the European Union. Farmers in this country are operating in an open single market and, unless the Government operate by the same rules as the rest of the EU, our farmers will be made to fight the crisis with one hand tied behind their back. There will be reform, but it must involve the whole of the EU, not just the United Kingdom unilaterally.

Mr. Rooker: It is no part of Government policy that the restructuring of agriculture within the EU should be on the back of a vanguard move by farmers in this country. That would be utterly unfair, and it is not something that we would support. However, the fact is that we have to discuss the restructuring of the industry without sending the wrong signals.

Mr. Gill rose—

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) rose—

Mr. Rooker: With respect, I want to make progress. It is not possible to take too many interventions.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West referred to the beef ban. We understand that it is a symbolic issue for many people. Progress is being made in Northern Ireland. Movement so far has been small—I understand that 60 tonnes have so far been exported, which is a drop in the ocean. It will take time to rebuild markets, but it is a top priority for the Ministry to get the ban lifted as quickly as possible.

Mr. Gill: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Curry: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No, not at the moment.

The date-based export scheme proposed by the Commission is one that we are actively negotiating in Brussels, virtually on a daily basis. The Commission has undertaken inspections in this country in recent months, which have been positive and helpful. We have a problem—

Mr. Curry: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No. There are problems with some of its demands in respect of bone-out beef, but we are seeking to overcome them.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West also referred to the ban of beef on the bone. No one ever claimed or demanded that it was for ever. I said as much in February when I put the relevant regulations to the House. It is self-evident that, as time goes by, different considerations prevail. The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee and the chief medical officer will look into the problem. Everyone can count 30 months from August 1996.

We have to be careful. We do not yet have the experimental results in respect of bone marrow, so we are not yet in a position to make an announcement. However, British people know that we are taking massive safety precautions to make sure that British beef is safe. What we are doing goes far beyond anything being done elsewhere in Europe, so consumption of British beef by British people has gone up again this year—it now accounts for around 79 per cent. of our beef consumption, compared with 72 per cent. last year. People know that the checks that we have put in place ensure that British beef is safe, and confidence is returning. We are not going to take a hasty decision, but the ban was not intended to be for all time. We never hinted that it would be so, and we want it lifted as quickly as possible.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The Minister has just said something that all hon. Members believe, which is that the controls on British beef are much greater and more effective than those that exist anywhere else in Europe. Will he assure the House that substandard imports of beef from other EU states and, indeed, from other parts of the world, will now be controlled, so that he can give a perfectly straightforward guarantee to the British people that they can eat British beef with safety and that they will not be subjected to substandard beef from other sources?

Mr. Rooker: I shall give the hon. Gentleman an example of something that crossed my desk only the other day. Substandard beef is a constant problem in a single market. In some ways, the European Union is the inspector of third-country imports. Recently, Australia was the subject of an EU inspection in respect of its meat industry and the processing side of it—the abattoirs and cutting plants. The EU inspectors were not satisfied with what they found, and Australia has been given six months to put its house in order. If it does not, there will be serious repercussions for its exports to the EU. That is something that happened only recently. It is a matter of public knowledge, although it did not make the headlines.

Inspections of third countries are taking place, and we do not intend to allow substandard food into this country or, indeed, into the EU as a whole. There are also problems relating to, for example, welfare conditions, with which I shall deal later.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West did not mention this, but another example of support for the industry—especially the beef sector—from the taxpayer and the Government is the start-up of the cattle movement service on 28 September. The reason why I have heard nothing about this service, either inside or outside Government, is that it is working. It works as a very successful information technology project, and I pay tribute to MAFF staff, our consultants and, of course, the industry. We have been working hand in glove for 18 months to get the system up and running.

The service's capital start-up costs and the first year's running costs represent an investment of some £35 million of taxpayers' money in the cattle industry. It could not have been done without massive co-operation. The service now has 200-plus new staff and, in the first four weeks, it issued 193,000 passports, processed 80,000 cattle movement notifications and handled some 30,000 calls from farmers. It will add credibility to our negotiations in Brussels in respect of the lifting of the ban, although it is not a requirement for it. We are well ahead of the European Union requirement for a computerised cattle tracing system, which is an EU requirement for every country by December 1999.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Does the Minister accept that the scheme will in effect be a tax on British farming if the Government do not enforce the same standards for imports, as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler)? Will he confirm that he recognises that it is not only beef farmers who are affected, but those who produce pigs and lamb?

Mr. Rooker: I shall deal with pig farming. I take the hon. Gentleman's point. We imposed unilateral controls on the removal of specified risk materials on beef imported into this country. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), the former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, told the House that he would do it if the EU did not get its act together, and we did it. We said that we would not have that beef in this country. We are not allowed to carry out random checks because of the single market, but we check the paperwork and have advance notification of the paperwork at the ports of entry. I understand that more than one load has been sent back because the paperwork was not in order. Vigorous attention is being paid to the import of beef into this country.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Mr. Rooker: I shall not give way. I must move on.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West mentioned the "Buy British" policy. That suggestion comes from the Liberal Democrats who would, by and large, have had this country in the EC before 1972 without any negotiation. A "Buy British" campaign is contrary to our obligations under the treaty of Rome and would be outlawed straight away—[Interruption.] I am referring to the motion, which states that there should be such a policy "in central government and its agencies".

As the hon. Gentleman knows full well, we are unable to do that. It is always the point, in opposition, to ask the Government to do something that they cannot do, but that does not mean that we are taking no action. Consumers and importers of food into the United Kingdom can operate a "Buy British" policy without falling foul of the treaty of Rome, but the Government cannot, as we act for a member state.

We persuaded the Commission to make intervention beef stocks available to the Ministry of Defence. The MOD hopes that all its requirements for beef for forces serving in the United Kingdom can now be met with products of UK origin. It is also considering whether it can source some of its requirements for lamb from the UK, but that is more difficult. First, there are no intervention stocks and, secondly, frozen lamb from overseas is competitively priced and there is a problem in respect of ordering contractors to purchase from a particular area.

We will go as close to the wire as we legally can on the treaty of Rome in encouraging our importers and producers to buy British. We cannot cross the wire. We have put it to our lawyers and legal advisers that we want to go as close as we possibly can. However, as the hon. Gentleman well knows, we cannot order people to buy British.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Minister note that the National Farmers Union, the Farmers Union of Wales and the Young Farmers Clubs visited the MOD in Bath? We tried to persuade the Ministry that the British forces should eat British lamb. At present, no one serving in the Army, Navy or Air Force eats British lamb. I was informed in answer to a parliamentary question that 52 per cent. of lamb consumed by the forces comes from New Zealand and 48 per cent. comes from Uruguay. Surely that is quite wrong.

Mr. Rooker: I have just explained the position regarding lamb, to which intervention stocks do not apply. We have acted where there are intervention stocks.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West also mentioned the major problems in the pigmeat industry because the EU pigmeat regime is very light. When one gets through the jargon, that means that, by and large, pigmeat producers are not on the receiving end of what can be described in shorthand as Common Market subsidies. They have operated in what is very much an open market over the years and, as a result, they have done better than beef and lamb producers. However, over-production causes difficulties with the pricing structure, which was also badly affected by the massive fire in Northern Ireland which created catastrophic problems. It is a vital sector of the industry. Total annual production is 1.3 million tonnes, worth more than £1 billion at the farm gate. The sector is very much reliant on the market, so scope for Government action is extremely limited.

The UK supported a Commission proposal for a scheme providing aid to private storage which came into effect on 28 September. It will allow payment for storage for four to six months, although rates may vary according to the length of storage and the cut. I hope that that will have a steadying effect on the market. We need an orderly pattern because of the massive disruption caused by the economic problems in Russia. Most people do not make the connection between events in Russia in recent months and the effect on European producers. I did not know until the issues were raised and we asked questions about them that the biggest purchaser of lamb skins from the United Kingdom was Russia, which has been completely wiped out as a market because of the catastrophic problems there. Of course that has caused difficulties for our producers.

The motion refers to prompt payment to farmers. I repeat that we are making excellent progress and I can confirm that advance payments under the beef subsidy scheme will begin early next week. The second advances under the sheep annual premium will follow shortly after that.

[Mr. Rooker]

As I said earlier, we have agreed with other member states that the advance payments on the beef premium schemes will bring an increase of £100 million six months earlier than would otherwise have been the case. We have also made a prompt start on this year's arable area payments—98 per cent. of the advance oilseed payments were made by the end of September. The main arable payments started last week and are due for completion by the end of December. By the end of October, 40 per cent. of the payments will have been made. We are making massive progress in trying to speed up the payments of those subsidies to our farming communities. I understand that cash flow is extremely important.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West—joined by the Conservatives—made his usual attack on agrimonetary compensation, not a penny of which was ever paid by the Conservative Government. For the avoidance of any doubt, there is no agrimonetary compensation in the kitty for sheep farming; at present it applies only to beef and cereals, so we must not give the impression that demanding the payment of agrimonetary compensation will help the sheep sector.

Mr. Gill: In respect of agrimonetary compensation, does the Minister recognise that the present crisis in agriculture is far more serious than it was under the Conservative Government? If the objection to paying agrimonetary compensation is based on the fact that the Treasury has to pay 71p for every £1 that is paid to the industry, does he recognise that, notwithstanding the fact that 71 per cent. has to come from the Treasury, every £1 going into the industry counts at this time of crisis? Inevitably, every £1 going into the industry finds its way back into the general economy and is good for jobs and services in the rest of the economy and, inevitably, the Treasury gets some of that money back in taxation.

Mr. Rooker: How can the hon. Gentleman dismiss with a flight the fact that 71 per cent. of the money comes from the British taxpayer because 100 per cent. goes into the sector? I have to say to the hon. Gentleman, whom I respect enormously for his contributions to debates, not least the number of his Adjournment debates that I have answered, that the Government cannot ignore that. Neither the Treasury nor any other Ministry can ignore the fact that 71 per cent. of the money will be paid by the British taxpayer. Hon. Members should remember that we paid £85 million of agrimonetary compensation to the livestock sector earlier this year in recognition of the exceptional circumstances. We recognise the current difficulties and we are keeping the situation under review. We shall continue to meet farming unions and other interested organisations and we are keenly aware of their case. I make no bones about it, as I said in my opening remarks.

Let me say a few words about producer negotiating power. I make no attempt to be a spokesperson or defender of the supermarkets. Far from it—they are more able to speak for themselves and have more money than my Ministry. Producers have to be able to deal effectively with major buyers in a global market. The UK has a historical and cultural problem in that the agricultural sector has been slower than others to respond. There is sometimes embarrassment when I ask farmers about getting together and working as producers. The fact that, for whatever reason, they have not done so in the past has allowed them to be the victim of a pincer movement by the supermarkets. The Ministry gives every encouragement—as it did under the previous Government—to any initiatives within the farming interest to encourage producers to get together and not to be isolated and picked off by those who have control of our food chain.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): Do not supermarket chains have enormous power? It must be right that British meat, which is of the highest quality, produced with good animal welfare standards, should be promoted and sold in our supermarkets. The reductions in prices at the farm gate should be passed on to consumers. Will my hon. Friend talk strongly with supermarkets to ensure that British farmers and British consumers get a fair deal?

Mr. Rooker: I can certainly answer yes to my hon. Friend's main question. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture and I are meeting representatives of the British Retail Consortium next week. We have been discussing the issue throughout the summer because of the apparent mismatch and some of the media stories. We have looked for evidence. The Ministry has neither the expertise nor the power to demand information about prices at different points in the chain, between animals leaving the farm and the meat arriving on our supermarket shelves. There has been great suspicion in the media that some of the practices of some retailers are not helpful to our farming industry—that is a polite way of putting it.

We welcome the efforts made by many retailers to ensure that their sourcing practices meet or exceed consumer expectations. I was talking to one of the supermarkets last week. I shall not name it—it is not one of the big four, but it is the fifth one; small in terms of food, but big in the high street. I was told that from 1 January it will require its suppliers of any imported pigmeat—be it bacon or Parma ham—to meet the same welfare standards as British producers. If those standards are not met, the supermarket will not import the meat. That is a fair point. The supermarket does not need the force of the Government—we have no legal authority in that area—but it is right and proper that that is being done. In due course, the supermarket will make known its policy to give it a competitive edge and to show what it is doing to help British industry. The message is: "We are interested in animal welfare; we want standards to be driven up; and we will use our purchasing power to do that." That is what that chain has said openly to me. I encourage all others to follow that example.

We have to be very careful or we shall end up pushing down the road to price controls and a fixed market. We know that that leads to empty shelves in shops. That is the reality that we have seen from the siege economies of the Soviet countries.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): Will the Minister look at the labelling laws, which allow imported chicken from Thailand to be labelled as British because it is processed in this country, even though it was reared under conditions vastly inferior to those in this country?

Mr. Rooker: Under the beef labelling scheme, beef must be reared, slaughtered and packaged in this country to be called British. The same rules do not apply to poultry, but we are making moves in the European Union to rectify that. People must not be misled by labelling. The words "Packaged in the EU" do not mean that a product was produced by a European Union farmer or food producer. People have to look at labels carefully. We want more progress on making labels meaningful. We do not want them to give a false impression that produce was nurtured by European Union farmers. The hon. Gentleman is right to make that point. Some of the issues can be dealt with on a voluntary basis, but there are difficulties with labelling. As a member of the European Union, we have to ensure that we get EU-wide agreement, otherwise it is nonsense for our farmers.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey) rose—

Mr. Rooker: This is the last time that I shall give way.

Mr. Colvin: I should like to declare an interest, as a farmer. The Minister mentioned supermarkets earlier and talked about price regulation. He is no doubt aware of the Office of Fair Trading report that suggested that the big four supermarkets were operating a cartel. How soon will the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report be available, so that we can know whether a free market is operating among the supermarket chains?

Mr. Rooker: I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman. I have not referred to that because I cannot cover every point. There is an inquiry going on. The Welsh Affairs Committee produced an important report earlier in the year. It is right and proper that some of the concerns that were highlighted should be investigated by the competition authorities as soon as possible. However, I have no information on that and we cannot interfere during the inquiry.

The first point that the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West raised was on the Food Standards Agency. It is one of the most popular promises in the Labour party manifesto. I do not remember any of the 1,100 submissions that we received on the White Paper earlier this year opposing the establishment of an agency. Obviously, there are different views about its powers, structure and charging. Last Friday, I was at a one-day conference in York organised by the Food Advisory Committee—the Ministry's most important committee on the subject—on that and related issues. The whole food production chain was represented and every speaker was in favour of the concept of an agency. I cannot pre-empt the contents of the Queen's Speech on 24 November. The Government are determined to take the Food Standards Agency project forward. I cannot say whether there will be a slot for the Bill in the next parliamentary Session, but my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture will outline immediately after the Queen's Speech how we shall proceed. We have a manifesto commitment to deliver a Food Standards Agency. However, I cannot go into greater detail because of the nearness of the Queen's Speech.

There have been unfounded press reports on the subject. There has been no back-door or front-door attempt in the Ministry to neuter the Food Standards Agency. I have heard no suggestion of that and neither have my civil servants. There have been arguments about nutrition, but everyone accepted the compromise reached in the White Paper "The Food Standards Agency: A Force for Change". There has been no backtracking on that. Our commitments remain as they were earlier in the year.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I appreciate that the Minister cannot anticipate the contents of the Queen's Speech, although if the commitment was one of the most popular in the Labour manifesto, as he says, it would be perverse in the extreme if it did not appear in the first two Queen's Speeches of the Parliament.

The restructuring of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is a related issue. What will be the relationship with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on planning, and with the Department of Health on health issues? Even if legislation does not come forward immediately, thinking about the Food Standards Agency must be pretty well advanced. What is envisaged for the future of the Ministry? Will we have a Ministry for the countryside? If so, will it have a planning remit?

Mr. Rooker: That goes much wider than the Food Standards Agency. I could take another 10 minutes on that, but I want to conclude. The key area is the relationship of the Ministry with the Department of Health. The joint food standards and safety group is a unified group across both Departments, headed by one civil servant reporting to Ministers in both Departments. All key decisions on food standards and safety are taken jointly by MAFF and the Department of Health. There is no unilateral action. The joint group consists of 300 civil servants, of whom 250-odd are from MAFF and the rest are from the Department of Health. It is headed by a civil servant of great seniority—a Department of Health civil servant who was already on secondment to MAFF. It operates as a unified structure across both Departments and is working very well. As I heard last Friday in York, all the outsiders who have contact with it speak with great respect about how they are treated. The future of the Ministry and our relations with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions are matters for the Prime Minister and go well beyond this debate.

Agriculture is intrinsic to the rural economy. We grow our food in the countryside. Some 70 per cent. of the country is used for food production—a very different situation from that in Canada or the United States, as my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture and I said last week to the House of Lords Select Committee investigating genetic modification. It is clear—there is no secret—from what my right hon. Friend has been saying on the record recently that we shall be making an announcement as quickly as possible on our decisions on the requirements of agriculture and the food production industry in this extremely difficult period. Prospects for the immediate future do not look good. I regret that I had to say that a year ago, too.

We are looking at a package of measures. We must ask ourselves what the package is for. It must meet short-term needs and not destroy the industry or grow like Topsy and make long-term restructuring more complicated. That would not serve anybody's purposes. That is one of the reasons why we are moving as quickly as we can towards bringing forward payments. We understand the urgency of the situation and will make our conclusions known to the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): I warmly welcome the fact that the House is debating agriculture. I congratulate the Liberal Democrats on choosing the subject for this half-day debate. Alas, I am not able to congratulate the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) on the way in which he opened the debate. The first quarter of his speech was devoted to an extraordinarily trivial series of party political points. When he reads Hansard tomorrow, even he will be ashamed of the way in which he opened the debate. Even the deplorably low standards of the Liberal Democrats were plumbed to a new low.

The Conservative party believes that the crisis in agriculture is far more important than scoring party political points. [Interruption.] That seems to be a matter of mirth on the Government Benches. The Conservatives had decided that half of the first Opposition day available to us following the summer recess would be devoted to this very subject. The seriousness with which we take the issue is reflected by the presence of not only my hon. Friends the Members for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) and for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) but my two predecessors, my right hon. Friends the Members for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) and for Fylde (Mr. Jack). I am delighted that they continue to take an interest in the subject.

I shall turn in a moment to the comments of the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), but must first say that I had expected by now to be responding to a speech from the Minister of Agriculture. I am amazed that he did not choose to speak in this debate. He has been in the job for 13 weeks—is that not long enough? He said on television yesterday that he knew that agriculture was going through difficult times, but does he understand just how difficult? At this very moment, farmers who are on the verge of quitting a way of life that has sustained them, their parents, their grandparents and, in some cases, many generations before that are waiting to hear from him. Their decisions may depend on whether hints of a rescue package, which have been so tantalisingly dropped over the past few days, turn out to be true or false.

The Minister has spent much of the past 13 weeks trying to show that he is different from his predecessor. I grant that he has had some success—although the standard by which he has been judged is not a very demanding one. This evening, that hard-won progress has been thrown away. For as long as the Minister occupies his new office, on which his predecessor lavished so many hundreds of thousands of pounds just when he was cutting help for Britain's poorest farmers, he will be known as the Minister who refused the chance to debate the worst crisis to hit agriculture for half a century.

After a two-and-a-half month parliamentary recess, during which conditions in farming have steadily worsened, the Minister has nothing to say. His silence today confirms what we all knew: new Labour does not care about the countryside. As far as the Government are concerned, farmers can go bust. Perhaps there is a reason for the Minister's silence; perhaps he does not know what to say. On this issue, as on so many other countryside issues over the past year and a half, Ministers have moved from denying that there is a problem, through panic at discovering that there is a problem, to confusion about how to tackle that problem.

Last week, the spin doctors were hard at work. On Saturday, we read that a package of help was to be unveiled by the Minister after the Prime Minister—no less—had intervened. On television on Sunday, 24 hours later, the Minister denied that. On Sunday morning, the newspapers said that the Prime Minister had asked the Minister to investigate supermarket prices. Then, on television, the Minister denied that as well. Just what is going on? Who is in charge of agricultural policy? Is it the Minister, No. 10 or the spin doctors? Those issues are too important to be trifled with in such a misleading way. I hope that, when the Minister eventually has something to say, he will say it in the House and not try to leak it to the newspapers through spin doctors, as he and his colleagues have clearly been doing over the past few weeks. The situation is too serious for that.

As the president of the National Farmers Union, Ben Gill, pointed out yesterday, farm incomes this year will probably be less than a fifth of those two years ago. In case anyone thinks that that is just like a few City dealers losing their Christmas bonus, I remind the House that average farm incomes in Wales last year were less than £160 a week and less than half that this year. That is an insulting reward for a demanding job. I notice that the issue is not one about which Labour Members have much to say at the moment. Many farmers are working for pay below the minimum wage. Indeed, it is hard to find a price of any commodity that is not lower than it was in May last year.

This crisis will destroy many farmers. Businesses that have provided a living for two or three people for generations are disappearing. Closure of a microchip factory in the north-east may make the headlines, but the trauma for the men and women who are being forced off the land every week by a Government who do not care is just as great. The crisis is not just hurting farmers and their families; it is hitting the entire rural economy.

Mr. Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the crisis to which he refers is most particularly hitting smallholdings and family farms, which have existed for generations but could be pushed entirely out of the industry?

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman is quite right; I fear that that is exactly what is happening.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry would probably say that the idea of helping farmers was pretty gut-wrenching, but if farmers—large or small—do not survive, many other businesses in other industries will be threatened, too. The effects of the agricultural depression which is only just around the corner will not be confined to the economy. Soon, the entire fabric of our countryside will deteriorate. Those beautiful landscapes, which are cherished even by urban dwellers, and those precious green fields—if, indeed, any survive the Deputy Prime Minister's attempt to cover them with houses—will suffer neglect.

I do not suggest that all the problems in agriculture started on 1 May last year. Some of them are clearly long-term difficulties. The tragedy is that, faced with such problems, the Government do things that time and again make matters worse. The average strength of the pound over the past 18 months of Labour Government has been a serious problem for many farmers. That is the direct result of Government policy. If a Government choose to tax savings and investment and announce spending increases without knowing how they will be paid for, inevitably, financial markets worry, interest rates are forced up and the pound starts to rise. The level of the pound is nothing to do with what the Bank of England has done and everything to do with what the Government have done.

Let us take the problems of the beef industry. Instead of trying to boost confidence in British beef, the Government ban beef on the bone.

Sir Robert Smith: Given what the hon. Gentleman has said about the fault not being the Bank of England's, does he support the independence of the Bank of England, now that he is happy with the way in which it is behaving?

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman does not appear to have followed my argument. The point is that, if the Government give the Bank of England a remit but then follow policies such that the only way that the Bank can achieve that remit is by raising interest rates, it is the actions of the Government, not those of the Bank, that have led to higher interest rates.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): If the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about the effect of exchange rates on the farming industry, why does his party show no interest in what the National Farmers Union wants—early entry into the European single currency—and instead rule that out for 10 years? How can the Conservative party be the farmers' friend when it would deny farmers what they want for the next 10 years?

Mr. Yeo: How farmers react depends entirely on the level at which we enter the single currency and on the relationship between sterling and the euro. The single currency solves no problems for farmers if, at the point of entry, the relationship between sterling and the euro is the wrong one.

Beef is a more immediate issue for farmers. Instead of trying to boost confidence in British beef, the Government chose to introduce the ban on beef on the bone. The previous Minister of Agriculture said that banning beef on the bone would help to get the European Union to lift the export ban, but it has totally failed to do so. Indeed, the ban on beef on the bone now appears to have become part of the problem. Lifting that ban would not cost consumers, taxpayers or farmers a single penny and it should be lifted today. If the Government do not lift it, there is a risk that the EU will try to make it permanent. What an extraordinarily disgraceful outcome that would be—a gratuitous act against British farmers committed by the Labour Government.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Is it not true that the controls in abattoirs that we were promised by Conservative Ministers were not rigorously enforced? The Labour Government have to deal with that problem, which was created by the Conservatives.

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman might be aware that the ban was described by the Selkirk sheriff court as "a manifest absurdity". It was described by the Institute of Trading Standards as "unenforceable". That underlines how ludicrous it is to attempt to introduce a ban to reduce an almost unmeasurably small risk. There is more risk of being killed by a lightning strike than by eating beef on the bone.

Mr. Rooker: The ban on beef on the bone was introduced on the advice of the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee and the chief medical officer. If we had not introduced the ban, we would have been the first Government knowingly to allow BSE—at whatever level—into the food chain. We are not yet aware of the results of the experiments on bone marrow, and for the hon. Gentleman to advance his arguments on the very day that the families are before the BSE inquiry is quite despicable.

Mr. Yeo: I do not think that the ban was justified when it was introduced; I do not think that is has been justified at any stage since its introduction; and I certainly do not think that it is justified today. I maintain that the ban on beef on the bone should be lifted forthwith.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Does my hon. Friend recall that, when the Minister banned beef on the bone and we debated the subject in the House, I put it to him that, if he were genuinely concerned about human health, he would ban those bovine bones, classify them as specified bovine material and have them properly disposed of? However, it is the only part of the bovine carcase for which advice has been given stating that it should not enter the human food chain that is not properly disposed of. That shows how bogus the Minister's argument is.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend speaks with great expertise and passion on the subject and she is absolutely right.

Mr. Curry: Would not my hon. Friend be more convinced by the Government's argument in respect of beef on the bone if there were any consistency in the Government's treatment of green-top milk? Why is green-top milk apparently unsafe for Scots to drink, but safe for the English to drink? Actuarially speaking, is not the risk from such milk far greater than that from beef on the bone?

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I hope that the Minister will address that point when he winds up the debate.

I welcome the signs of a rethink on the end to the calf processing aid scheme, although it appears that, on this subject as well, the Government are in a state of confusion. The Minister said that he was not thinking of extending the scheme, but that he was reconsidering the present position. I hope that he will sort out his views on the subject as soon as possible.

I realise that the Minister might encounter difficulty with the Treasury, which has been no great friend to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—MAFF was one of the Departments that did particularly badly under the terms of the comprehensive spending review. Presumably, the Treasury is one of the reasons why the Minister will not access further agrimonetary compensation, although that might also remain in the balance—the Minister was not absolutely clear on that point.

Still on the subject of money, I come to the hill livestock compensatory allowance. The Secretary of State for Wales let the cat out of the bag when he said, in the context of the hill farming review, that there was no money available. Will the Minister confirm that? A fat lot of good the consultation process will be if the decisions have already been set in concrete, but the public has not been told.

While the Minister tries to persuade his colleagues that farming is in crisis, may I suggest five things he could do instead, none of which involves public spending? Although one or two might require him and his colleagues to stick up for British interests in Europe to a greater extent than they have been willing to do so far, all five would help to secure a fair deal for British farmers—a chance to compete on equal terms.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Would the hon. Gentleman care to remind us exactly who got us into such a dreadful mess over the beef export ban and the subsequent debacle affecting British agriculture?

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman has just illustrated more eloquently than I could why we are in such a mess. If Labour Members do not understand that the situation affecting farming is infinitely more serious today than it was two years ago, there is little hope that Ministers will be persuaded to take the action that is needed.

Mr. Dawson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No, not again. The hon. Gentleman has demonstrated such ignorance of the issue, it is not worth wasting the House's time.

The first part of the fair deal is that we want farmers to have a fair deal when competing against imports. Pig farmers are now producing under conditions that, quite rightly, are more demanding than in the past. Their competitors abroad will not have to meet those conditions for several years, yet when bacon appears on the supermarket shelf, how is the shopper to tell whether or not it comes from a humanely reared British pig? Is it right for consumers to be offered pigmeat products produced under conditions that are not allowed in this country, without their being warned that that is the case?

Against a background of rising bankruptcies in the pig farming sector, will the Government encourage retailers to ensure that consumers know whether or not the pig from which the product on the shelf has come was reared in Britain? If the Government will not give that encouragement, every pig farmer in Britain will know that the Labour Government are not on his side. Every consumer in Britain will know that the Minister is happy to deny him or her a chance to support a home industry that is leading the way towards higher animal welfare standards.

Mr. Tyler: I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman now supports the policy that we urged the previous Conservative Government to adopt. Can he explain why he has undergone such an amazing transformation? Is it a case of the swine going over the cliff?

Mr. Yeo: I am amazed to learn that, even after the interventions from Labour Members, the hon. Gentleman has not spotted that there has been a sea change in the extent of the problems facing farmers. The situation facing pig farmers today could not be more different than the one facing them when the Conservative Government were still in power. If the hon. Gentleman has not bothered to go out and talk to enough farmers to discover that for himself, what hope is there for the Liberal party?

Mr. Colvin: My hon. Friend referred earlier to 1 May last year. It might be of interest to hon. Members to hear from a working farmer whose family normally benefits from about a 1 to 2 per cent. return on capital invested in our farm. On 1 May last year, we had profits almost equalling my salary as a Member of Parliament—about £45,000. Over the past year, under the Labour Administration—I do not blame them entirely—that profit, which was fairly regular, has turned into a loss of £60,000. That is a graphic illustration of what my hon. Friend is telling the House. There has been a drastic collapse of farming across the country, not only in hill areas.

In Hampshire, where I farm—it is probably one of the most innovative and successful counties in the country—every sector of farming is being hit. Admittedly, the smaller farms are coming off worse, but the whole industry and the rural economy are being drastically hit.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend clearly points out how severe are the difficulties that farmers now face. In view of the extent of those difficulties, it is right for the Conservative party to state that new responses are needed to deal with a wholly new position.

The second part of the fair deal for farmers is to cut the burden of regulation. As we are running short of time, I shall give only one example. Four weeks ago today, the Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) (Charges) Regulations 1998 came into force. That involves a massive increase in the supervision of abattoirs by official veterinary surgeons and meat inspectors. A small abattoir in Norfolk now faces the prospect of having two slaughtermen overseen by four supervisors. Does the Minister believe that the same degree of regulation will be applied evenly across the European Union? What is the cost of implementing those regulations? In view of his party's commitment to open government, will he release the so-called reasoned opinion document in which the European Union attempts to justify that interpretation of the regulations? If he is unable to answer those questions tonight, will he write to me and place a copy of his letter in the Library?

The third part of the fair deal for farmers concerns the Government's purchasing policies. The Minister explained that he cannot have a "Buy British" policy, but it seems that the spin doctors have been at work here. They are keen to suggest that Ministers are trying to encourage the buying of more British food.

Six weeks ago, I wrote to the Secretaries of State for Health, for Education and Employment and for Defence and the Home Secretary to ask about the policies followed for buying food in hospitals, schools, prisons and the armed services. So far, not one of those four Ministers has replied to my letter. It does not seem that helping the British farmer ranks very high in their priorities, but it so easily could. Will the Minister tell the House what discussions he is having with his colleagues? Will he ask them to answer my letter before another six weeks go by?

The fourth part of the fair deal for farmers concerns supermarkets, which are a popular target at the moment. Many retailers in Britain are highly efficient because they have responded to consumer tastes. They exercise great power, especially in relation to farmers, and that power carries responsibility. Supermarkets have some explaining to do about why falling farmgate prices are not reflected on the supermarket shelf. It is not in their interests or those of the consumer for large numbers of British suppliers to go out of business. Imported alternatives may not always be cheaper. I am glad that supermarkets such as Asda have responded to public opinion about lamb. I hope that they will show the same sensitivity over prices. The catering trade might also think about how it can help British farmers.

The fifth and final point about the fair deal for farmers concerns the wider issue of the Government's attitude to the countryside. Rural communities whose incomes are falling face serious challenges. Their morale and, therefore, their ability to cope with those challenges are greatly weakened by a series of Government attacks on the rural way of life, including the threat of a law giving an unrestricted right to roam, the attempt by Labour Members to ban traditional country sports and the cut in cash support for councils in rural areas. When will the Government abandon those attacks on the countryside?

Does the Minister realise that the first sign of whether the Government have had a change of heart will come when the Deputy Prime Minister announces the distribution of the revenue support grant—the cash support for councils for 1999–2000? That announcement is only five weeks away. Will the £100 million taken from the rural councils by Labour last year be given back this year? Has the Minister pleaded the cause of the countryside with the Deputy Prime Minister? Does he realise that the decision will be a litmus test of whether the Government's hostility to the countryside continues?

Those five issues form the core of the Conservative party's fair deal for farmers. They will not cost a penny of public money. They do not need European Union approval. All could be achieved right away. Of course the list is not exhaustive; there are plenty of other measures, such as improving cash flow by accelerating integrated control and administration system payments. Time does not allow me to deal with all the important issues; there will be other opportunities to do so.

The subject of the debate is crucial. Many questions have been asked and not many have been answered. The Minister must understand that the delay in responding to the crisis in agriculture will not only be a political embarrassment but damage the industry, hurt thousands of small businesses and weaken the morale of men and women across rural Britain. The Opposition are ready to support any measures proposed by the Government that will deal with the crisis, but we suggest that the Minister makes a start by accepting our proposals for a fair deal for British farmers.

8.45 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): I rise to speak in this debate as a member of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, which in the past few months has produced a detailed report on the crisis in livestock in Wales and recommended that the role of supermarkets should be referred to the Office of Fair Trading. We await the outcome of that investigation.

I speak also as a Member who represents a constituency where agriculture is the dominant industry. Nobody can deny that it is an industry in crisis. Six or nine months ago, farmers in my constituency who were affected by the beef ban were saying, "At least the price of lamb is holding up." I am afraid that, over the summer, the price of lamb has plummeted, which has affected farmers throughout my constituency and throughout Wales.

On top of that, this weekend we had some of the most severe floods that south Wales has experienced for 20 years. I shall never forget witnessing the distressing sight of dozens of drowned sheep at a farm near Abergavenny, or hearing stories of cattle floating down the River Usk being rescued by farmers. As if there has not been enough of a crisis for farmers, they had to experience those traumas. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to all those involved in helping during the aftermath of the floods: the police, the fire services, public servants, local authority workers and all the volunteers, such as councillors, who assisted my constituents and those of other hon. Members.

There is undoubtedly a crisis. It is estimated that 15 per cent. of farmers may go out of business in the next two years. In Abergavenny market a few weeks ago, lambs were selling for £1 per head.

Mr. Öpik: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that that is also common in Welshpool and mid-Wales? Only this morning, a farmer received, after commission had been subtracted, a net income of £8.69 for 44 cull ewes. That is even worse than the price quoted by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has a strong interest in the matter, and I do not deny the figure that he quoted.

There is a crisis in farming which needs to be referred to the social exclusion unit. We have never sufficiently applied the concepts of social inequality and poverty to people in rural areas, and now is the time to do so.

I welcome my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to his post and I congratulate him on having the guts to face the farmers who attended the rally at Blackpool football club at the beginning of the Labour party conference.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Edwards: Not now.

That must have been the biggest crowd that Blackpool football club had seen since the great days of Stanley Matthews. People were not there to watch Labour Members beating the press in a football match earlier that morning. I do not underestimate the significance of that rally—8,000 farmers attended, as did I and other Labour Members.

[Mr. Edwards]

The new Minister showed that he has an understanding of and an empathy with the farming community and its crisis. He showed farmers that there is a commitment to getting the beef export ban lifted by Christmas and that a package of short-term measures will be introduced as soon as possible. He demonstrated that he will consider agrimonetary compensation and consider extending the calf processing scheme, and that he will make progress on the date-based export scheme. He will also consider the early retirement scheme. I understand that some 8,000 farmers in Ireland have taken early retirement, and I hope that such a facility will be made available to farmers in Britain also.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I acknowledge his comments about the new Secretary of State. Is he not as disappointed as I am—and as all the farmers of Britain will be—that the Secretary of State is not present for tonight's debate? What signal does that send to rural Britain and to the farmers who have been so badly hit?

Mr. Edwards: My right hon. Friend has attended the debate, but I shall continue with my speech. Wherever the Secretary of State may be, I hope that he is working in the interests of British farmers.

I think that macro-economic policy can make a greater contribution. I looked through the quarterly bulletins of the Bank of England and I found no recognition of the rural economy. There is information about manufacturing prices and factory gate prices, but there is nothing in macro-economic discussion and deliberations about farm gate prices and the impact of interest rate policy on the farming community.

The Governor of the Bank of England has been in trouble in the past week as a result of certain comments that he is alleged to have made. I suggest that the Monetary Policy Committee should meet not just in Threadneedle street, but in the community. Perhaps it should start in the north and explain what the Governor meant to say last week. The committee could visit Wales, Northern Ireland and the regions of the United Kingdom, and see the impact that its deliberations have on our rural communities. I suggest that the committee visits Abergavenny on a Tuesday afternoon following market day to see the impact of its policies and deliberations on the farmers in my constituency.

I also urge the Treasury to look in more detail at the social and economic costs of a recession in farming. There is little discussion of that topic. When there is a crisis in manufacturing, there is considerable public debate about the problem. However, there is hardly any public debate about the crisis in the rural economy and hardly any consideration of the social, economic and financial costs to the rest of the community.

Mr. Jack: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Edwards: No, I will not. The right hon. Gentleman may wish to speak in the debate so I shall draw my comments to a close as quickly as possible.

We clearly need a new long-term strategy, which includes the overhaul of the common agricultural policy. This country cannot be paralysed by Europe. Like the Irish Government, the British Government must have more scope for determining agriculture policy. We have received some good news in Wales in the past few days as it is likely that we shall be eligible for objective 1 status. However, I make one suggestion about the use of those funds should they be secured by Wales.

The Welsh Grand Committee recommended that there be support for the construction in this country of a large-scale freezer facility for lamb. Apparently there is no such facility in the whole of the United Kingdom. I hope that the Government will consider using objective 1 funding to construct such a facility, to construct more and better slaughtering facilities, to improve infrastructure throughout Wales and to improve transport.

We have seen in Wales the amalgamation of the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales. My area of Wales was never within the sphere of the DBRW, but it will now be covered by the new, revised Welsh Development Agency. I hope that the agency will consider how it may invest in agriculture and in agricultural infrastructure in the same way that it has invested successfully in manufacturing in Wales.

Our universities and further education and agricultural colleges can clearly play a greater role in agriculture. People in the farming industry do not have the opportunities for retraining that are available in other areas of business. Our agricultural and further education colleges and business schools could do more to assist farmers in improving their basic skills and gaining business skills.

There is no doubt that farming is in crisis as a result of a combination of world market conditions, the substantial costs of the BSE crisis, the control of the supermarkets and the failure of long-term policy throughout the whole post-war period—apart from the immediate post-war period when there was a British agricultural policy. Governments of both political persuasions must take some of the blame for the lack of a long-term policy. The Government recently conducted a strategic defence review and they should establish a strategic agricultural review as well.

Farmers produce the food that makes our people healthy and they tend the beautiful countryside. However, they receive scant rewards for their efforts at present. Our farming community deserves a better deal and I urge the Government to do all in their power to respond to its great needs.

8.54 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): I listened to the speech by the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), but I am afraid that I did not hear him denounce the independence of the Bank of England, which led to the interest rate policy that has forced up sterling. That lies at the heart of the rural crisis on which this debate has touched so far. I did not hear the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) denounce that self-same policy in his intervention. I did not hear either of those hon. Gentlemen denounce the ban on beef on the bone. Labour Members are long on the rhetoric of denunciation when it comes to the previous Government's policies, but short on doing something tangible to benefit the farming communities whom they purport to represent.

I turn initially to the bizarre speech by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy). He is so interested in the debate that he has left the Chamber and is not here to face the music.

Mr. Tyler: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack: I shall make this point and then give way with pleasure to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness must think that he is still on the "Any Questions?" programme last week when he did his usual humorous turn. It appears that he forgot to switch off when he entered this Chamber to contribute to the debate. I listened carefully to his speech in the hope of hearing coherent Liberal Democrat policies on pigs, poultry, livestock prices, the Government interest rate policy, the issue of farm suicide, tertiary industries in agriculture, the calf processing aid scheme and the strength of sterling. However, the hon. Gentleman set out no such policies.

Mr. Tyler: I was going to point out that many of the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues left the Chamber when he rose to speak, but that would be uncharitable. I have two questions for the right hon. Gentleman. First, does he recall that the previous Conservative Minister of Agriculture, the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), supported the beef on the bone ban? Secondly, in view of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman appears to support our motion, will he give an undertaking to vote with us in the Lobby tonight?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Gentleman has illustrated how some hon. Members chose to oppose—as we did—the ban on beef on the bone. Other hon. Members talked at length about their support for farmers, but were short on acting to do something about it.

There was no constructive content in the speech by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness and I repeat my comment that I am disappointed that he is not present to listen to the rest of the debate. I believe that we are entitled to know the Liberal Democrats' views. If the motion is the product of constructive opposition, every constituency represented by a Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament knows that it has won absolutely nothing for its agricultural communities by voting Liberal Democrat.

There could be no finer illustration of that fact than a glance at the latest piece of paper produced by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In my mail today, I received a piece of paper that purported to come from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, headed "Agriculture Latest". It is so late that I have not received a copy until edition No. 12. It purports to come from the Minister, but is signed by his special adviser. In it we see a list—totalling some £145 million—of the aids that are supposed to have gone to farming.

It is remarkable how the Government put spin on everything. They forget the fact that they did not maintain HLCAs at the £160 million figure at which we left them, and they forget that that cost farming £35 million. They have completely forgotten the fact that, even now, when a quarter of a point has been taken off interest rates, farmers must pay very substantially more for their ever-increasing amounts of working capital, which wipes out, at a stroke, whatever help the Minister of State listed in his remarks.

There is even a difference between Labour Front-Bench and Back-Bench Members. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Monmouth. He was honest when he said that there was a crisis in agriculture, but I remind him of the way that Ministers describe it in the document "Agriculture Latest":

"Farmers are facing considerable difficulties".

That is the way in which the Ministry of Agriculture describes it—"considerable difficulties".

Ministers have variations on that theme. I wondered whether, during this period of learning and consulting with the farming industry, MAFF had come up with any constructive ideas. I looked at the titles of the MAFF October press releases. What do we find that Ministers are busy doing during this period of considerable difficulty? They are issuing press releases on "Changes to Licensing Arrangements for Killing or Taking of Bullfinches". It may be very important to bullfinches, but it is not exactly relevant to the crisis in British agriculture.

A MAFF study was published, which confirms that wild boar are in the countryside. Judging by the Minister of State's boring speech, I think that some have penetrated into the House of Commons tonight, because I find the way in which the Government are playing fast and loose with farmers' expectations totally unacceptable. When I read headlines like the one in Farmers Guardian for Friday 16 October—"Brown Gives Hint of Extra Aid for the Industry"—I realise that it is a case of fiddling while Rome burns. It appears that the Government completely fail to understand that, by and large, over the decades, politicians have formed the marketplace in which agriculture now exists. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that farmers turn to politicians for help when the going gets tough.

The detail is interesting. Earlier, the noble Lord Sewel was cited in debate. When there were difficulties in the pig industry in Scotland, he found £150,000 to help with marketing initiatives. The Minister of State has been silent tonight on whether pig producers in the rest of the United Kingdom can hope for help in any form. Likewise, he has been silent on the question whether, if the beef ban is lifted, there will be any help to rebuild markets. He talks about the need for it, but he offers farmers no substantial help.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food could do three things that would be of particular help to farmers. The Ministry used to run the marketing development scheme—a small, low-cost scheme, providing small-scale but much-needed help to improve the marketing of British-produced products. The Government removed it. My first suggestion is that the Minister should consider setting up such schemes. They do not cost much, but they boost farmers' confidence, and they represent something that the Minister could do now.

Secondly, not every farmer can afford an agronomist to help him farm better. The Minister might inquire into the possibility of small-scale consultancy schemes to help those who run smaller and medium-sized farms—the family farmers, the backbone of British farming—to find ways in which to farm better, and perhaps to farm their way out of some of the trouble.

[Mr. Jack]

Thirdly, I suggest an idea that would cost nothing. The Minister says that he will meet and talk to the British Retail Consortium. which is good, but why not bring all branches of the food industry around the same table? The Ministry is the sponsoring Ministry for agriculture, fisheries and food in this country. Why does not the Minister create a council or forum in which these matters can be thrashed out across the table to improve the understanding, communication and sense of partnership between British farming and the supermarkets? He could have done so already; yet, in August, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food disappeared completely from the scene, on so-called Foreign Office-arranged business. Perhaps he was visiting Chile—I know not why. Whatever he was doing, he was not here, and ever since then, he has tried to use that "Let me put my arm around the farmers and buy them a pint" approach, thinking to himself, "That will buy them off for another week, then another week, then another week"—and the situation in agriculture gets worse by the week.

There has been no new initiative since the new Minister took up his post. I am glad that he is listening—he may be getting the message. Even on the one token—totem, perhaps—of the state of British agriculture, the lifting of the beef ban, we seem to be getting further away from our objective than when the previous incumbent, the Minister for the Cabinet Office, the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), was in the job. If the beef ban were lifted, it would do a great deal psychologically to assist British farming.

Mr. Hayes: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jack: I must bring my remarks to a conclusion, as I know that other right hon. and hon. Members want to speak in the debate.

The Secretary of State for International Development encourages the consumption of fair trade coffee through her messages to commercial Britain. Perhaps the Minister should consider that.

I shall speak briefly about the situation relating to pigs. I wrote to every Secretary of State and Minister in the Cabinet asking what his or her Department was doing to help the consumption of British pigmeat. I received a telling letter signed "Yours sincerely, Nick" from the Minister of Agriculture. In that letter, he refers to the 14 MAFF canteens, which are all run by contracted caterers. The letter tells me that those are all profit-making companies—would not farmers like to be profit-making companies? The Minister states:

"it would be wrong for us to interfere in their profit making decisions."

Many farmers would like to make profit-making decisions. The letter continues:

"We cannot therefore specify to them how to source their products."

Nowhere does the Minister state in his letter that he has written to the companies and told them about the quality assured pork or British charter quality bacon and ham, or that he has written to draw their attention to the welfare issues that are vital to Britain's pork producers. There was no initiative in the Minister's letter on that subject. The situation is worse in the world of Labour-controlled local authorities.

I ask the Minister to look at part II of the Local Government Act 1988, section 17(5)(c). I discovered that that legislation effectively inhibits any local authority from intervening with its own suppliers of products such as pork, to help and guide them on all the arguments that we have deployed in the House about welfare standards and the quality of British pork, and other products. I hope that the Minister will have discussions with his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to see what can be done.

Farming is in a state of crisis. The Government look as though, like Nero, they are fiddling while Rome burns. I appeal to the Minister not to leave it too late before he acts.

9.7 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby): One of the most significant remarks during the debate was made by the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) when he was responding to an intervention from the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) about the effect on farm incomes of Britain joining EMU. He seemed to say that the effect on farming incomes would depend entirely on the rate at which we joined the single currency. It surprises me that the Opposition rule out joining the single currency over the next 10 years, if that depends entirely on the rate.

On the day of the first countryside rally, I was invited by a group of my local farmers in Selby to present the prizes at the first annual Selby horse ploughing competition. They said that it would be a unique experience for a politician to contemplate ploughing a straight furrow for a whole afternoon. There was plenty of time for contemplation that afternoon. One of the many attractions of horse ploughing as a spectator sport is that it makes indoor bowls, for example, look like a form of rapid activity.

As I was contemplating the state of British agriculture that afternoon, one of the local farmers showed me with some glee The Daily Telegraph of that day, which reported on its front page that my constituency, Selby, was one of the four most rural Labour marginal seats. Indeed it is. There are 5,000 people in my constituency who depend on farming, part-time or full-time. There are many more who supply the agriculture industry, or who run village shops and depend largely for their income on the wealth of farmers and their families. That community in my constituency and elsewhere—we have heard about Wales, for example—is going through extremely hard times. We have heard many reasons for that. My hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned Russia. Perhaps it is not the most crucial factor, but it is one of the most immediate. We are not talking about skins alone, because a third of European Union pigmeat went to Russia before the collapse of the economy. Much of that meat is now being diverted to the British market, especially Danish bacon.

There is a Chinese proverb that says that unless someone lives in the countryside he cannot really appreciate what hard times are. Perhaps that is pushing it a bit in the modern British economy, but the hard times that farmers are facing are different—not better or worse—from those that miners and steelworkers have faced in the past decade. At least miners and steelworkers have the strength of community that comes from living in a pit village or a steel town. Many farmers face their individual hard times very much individually. They have to shoot their own stock. If necessary, they themselves have tc go bankrupt.

The figures are stark. Net farming income only a couple of years ago was about £4 billion. The best estimates this year tell us that that income is about £1 billion. Net farming borrowing is up to £6.2 billion this year, which is a 10 per cent. increase. Pigmeat, to take one example, was selling for about £1.40 a kilo a couple of years ago at Selby market. The best price to be obtained tomorrow would be, perhaps, 60p.

Mr. Hayes: Judging from the tone of the hon. Gentleman's speech, I am sure that he will try to make a positive response to my intervention. We have heard much about Russia, China and many other places. We have heard also about cultural and long-term problems. What proportion of the blame for the crisis does the hon. Gentleman lay at the Government's door? As an honourable man, he must surely acknowledge that the Government have some responsibility. The Minister of State acknowledged none. What proportion does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge?

Mr. Grogan: I think that the Government are doing an extremely good job. I shall come on to various things that I think the Government should do, if the House will bear with me.

I shall quote a farmer who wrote to me only last week. He is one of my constituents, and a typical family farmer. He works with his son and employs one person on his mixed arable farm. He wrote to me as follows:

"Ours is a typical family farm and has been successful over many years. Last year, however, saw the start of our troubles as our profits plummeted to 36 per cent. of those of the previous year . . . This year so far has been a complete and utter disaster. Our barley harvest is showing a loss of £93 per acre . . . As for pigs, we are currently losing over £1,000 per week . . . I am now in the situation of seeing my life savings swiftly slipping away—£28,000 on pigs alone since April, according to my accounts . . . Please can you help? I spend long nights awake trying to find ways of keeping this business solvent but to no avail. I am faced with the prospect of putting a loyal worker and good friend on the dole, slaughtering all my stock and being unable to pass on a viable business to my son and his family."

That farmer is doing what many other farmers are doing and running down his savings. However, we must recognise that the mid-1990s were good years for farmers for many reasons, which were largely to do with the green pound. Deloitte and Touche found in its survey that the net incomes of arable farmers increased from £146 a hectare in 1990 to a peak of £354 in 1995. It fell to £129 in 1997.

In response to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), I think that there are four areas of hope for the farmer in my constituency whose letter I have quoted, and for others like him. First, we have heard much about supermarkets. The referral of British supermarkets to the Office of Fair Trading will be welcomed by those in the countryside, including farmers in my constituency. There seems a prima facie case that supermarkets are not passing on the fall in commodity and agricultural prices to the consumer.

British supermarkets make a third more in profits than their counterparts in Europe and America. A recent OECD survey, based on a common basket of groceries, revealed that British supermarket prices were near the top of the league in OECD countries. There are three supermarkets in Selby and supermarket staff have raised the issue of prices with me. They refer to the sourcing and pricing policies of their employers. They recognise that times have changed and that we now live in a stakeholder economy. Supermarkets cannot afford to opt merely for short-term profits for their shareholders; they are part of the wider community.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): My hon. Friend is introducing a valuable summary of how we feel that supermarkets could make more of an effort. Does he agree that they could tell the consumer about welfare standards? They could insist that the welfare standards that we are introducing in the United Kingdom should be the same, if they are to sell imports, in exporting countries.

Mr. Grogan: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. One of the great aspects of British agriculture is its high welfare standards. We should make more of that.

The second reason why British farmers have cause for hope is the development in tone and style of British agricultural policy since my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) took over as Minister of Agriculture. It is easy to mock such things, but they are important. He has shown a greater capacity to listen than any Minister of Agriculture in the past 20 years. That is much appreciated in the countryside. Although it has sometimes been a case of listening not to strong words softly spoken but to strong words strongly spoken and repeated, it has been valuable.

It is worth remembering that we put more money into agricultural support than into the rest of British industry. However, further steps are necessary to resolve the problems of hardship that British farmers face. For example, under the traceability scheme it was good that the capital and revenue costs were funded for the first year, but we must now start to think about the second year. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Minister is putting the case for more agrimonetary compensation to Cabinet Ministers. It is not easy, as there are many competing demands on resources. The community in Selby and I trust him to put that case forcefully in Cabinet.

The third reason for hope is the reform of the common agricultural policy and Agenda 2000. Any short-term extra help that we give farmers should not conflict with that aim, because that will be the salvation of British farming in the medium term. Agricultural support should be concentrated on paying farmers for countryside and environmental management. British agriculture at its most efficient is well able to compete in a more open and free market with its European Union competitors.

The fourth and final reason for hope is the attitude of farmers themselves. They realise that they must rebuild the bond of trust between themselves and the rest of the community—consumers and so on—because it has been weakened in recent years. British agriculture has high standards in terms of animal welfare and the environment, and must be marketed more aggressively.

Mr. Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that bond of trust has been broken largely by the Government's statements and their efforts to imply that producers are to blame? To that extent, does he agree that rebuilding that bond of trust requires investment by the Government as well as a charm offensive by farmers?

Mr. Grogan: There are many partners in rebuilding the bond of trust and the Government have a crucial role to play.

There are 5,000 farmers in my constituency. I do not know how many voted for me. By examining the number of posters on trees in farms at the election, I could see that I would certainly have lost if trees had the vote.

Ironically, previous Labour Governments have delivered for farmers far more than Conservative Governments, right back to the days of Attlee and the agricultural legislation of the 1940s, which was never challenged until we joined the European Union. I am sure that, once again, the Labour Government will do well by the British farming community.

9.17 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): First, I wish to focus on my constituency. It is a large, rural constituency which covers most of the Mid Devon district council area and a large chunk of east Devon. It comprises some 90 parishes, and farming and related industries are extremely important.

During the summer, two pieces of work have been done in the south-west which clearly identify the problems that farmers in my constituency and the rest of Devon face. The first was a study done by PROSPER, the Devon and Cornwall training and enterprise council, which has assessed the present position and reported how it sees the future for farmers in my area. It said:

"What makes this agricultural 'crisis' unique in modern times is that every sector has been affected."

In respect of our mixed farms, of which we have a lot in Devon, one sector may have been affected in previous crises, but cheques from another helped to balance the cash flow. Today, all sectors are affected. The industry's net income this year is forecast to be no more than £700 million, compared with £4.1 billion in 1996, and major banks suggest that about 70 per cent. of all farms in the south-west will make a loss this year.

In addition, a study by the university of Exeter makes startling reading. Its forecasts for the current financial year, which have been commissioned by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, put the average net farming income for lowland livestock farmers in the south-west at £100—down 99 per cent. on last year. The average dairy farming net income is estimated at £10,300—down 65 per cent. Hill farming incomes are estimated at £7,800—down 59 per cent. Arable farming incomes are down to £12,000 a year—a fall of 56 per cent. We have small arable farms; they are not like the large arable plains of East Anglia.

Those are statistics, but individuals are behind them. Already, they are coming to my surgery, asking, "How long have we got to hang on at these rates of income before we can see some light at the end of the tunnel?" That is the problem which the Government must now address.

I welcome the fact that the Minister said that he is considering a short-term package of help, because such measures are clearly needed urgently. As I went around my constituency during the summer recess, I noticed more and more farm sales. More and more farmers have decided that they cannot hang on and that they will not wait for the inevitable—they are putting their farms on the market.

At the moment, land prices in Devon are holding up. So long as they do so, I believe that the banks will continue to support the farming industry, but land prices will drop the moment that a glut of farms comes on to the market. That will affect not only those people whose farms are on the market at any given time, but those who want to stay in agriculture and continue farming. Land prices will drop, however, and collateral value against borrowings will become more vulnerable. Although banks in my area are hanging in there at the moment, that cannot be guaranteed for the longer term.

That is why I will support and welcome any short-term measures that the Minister can find to help the industry today and in the short term. The Ministry must look to the medium and long term, however, because the current crisis will not be brief.

I must declare an interest as a vice-president of the Devon young farmers, although some people might be surprised that I have been called a young farmer. [HON. MEMBERS: "Spring chicken."] Hon. Members are too kind. There is hope among the young farmers. They accept change, perhaps more readily than an older generation who have been used to a method of farming that clearly will not be sustained for ever. If those young people are to have a future, a long-term policy must be introduced.

I want to pick up on an issue that was mentioned by hon. Members on both sides of the House and was touched on briefly, although somewhat acerbically, by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), who mentioned the steel and coal industries during what he described as the Thatcher years. Should a number of farmers and farms go out of business, there will be a related fallout for other industries and jobs. If the medium to long-term fallout in the country or even in specific sectors of farming is comparable to that experienced by other industries in the 1980s, I hope that the Labour Government will follow the Conservative Government's example and recognise that they need to help certain communities, either by region or by sector. [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen are jeering, but the record speaks for itself. Money went to the iron and coal communities, and rightly so.

The hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), in his excellent speech, referred to the social exclusion unit. The Minister should take that recommendation seriously. Although farmers are not an organised group, they none the less represent an industry. If many small farmers in my constituency sell their farms or go bankrupt in the next four to five years, I shall put a strong case to the Minister, because that is a genuine example of an industry and of a geographic area that deserves to be considered for support, as other geographic areas were supported in the past.

The motion refers to sourcing British food. In the public sector, that is subject to competitive tendering. The Liberal Democrats are urging the Government to use their efforts to source British food. I hope that the Liberal Democrats, where they have responsibility, will show us that they are prepared to translate their words into action.

A month ago, I was informed by local butchers and farmers that, in the county of Devon, children who eat beef as part of their school meal no longer eat British beef. Under the new contract given to Devon Direct Services—the in-house contractor of Devon county council—a large catering company supplies Devon schools with Irish beef. In a letter to me last week, the chief education officer of Devon county council informed me that the majority of beef used in school meals in Devon is either

"minced or diced in a frozen free flow form"

and that

"the supply is of Irish origin."

I have written to the Liberal Democrat leader of Devon county council to ask him, in the light of his colleagues' wording of the motion before the House, to ensure that the council does all it can to restore to Devon farmers the opportunity to provide beef for schools in Devon, as they did just a few months ago. I particularly hope that Liberal Democrat Members who represent Devon constituencies, and who have some influence with Devon county council, will support that move.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to take part in this exceptionally important debate. We hear many protestations from the Conservative party about its commitment to the countryside. In my meetings with local farmers, I am often complimented on the fact that their Member of Parliament has deigned to speak to them. That shows that the Labour party is listening and is working in the countryside to address a monumentally serious problem. Let us make no bones about it: we have an appalling situation in the countryside.

That was recently brought home to me when I went to meet one farmer at his farm and found 12 farmers there: small farmers, sheep farmers, mixed farmers and dairy farmers. I met contractors and people who had been involved in agricultural contracting for many years. I saw despair at that meeting. I saw the faces of people who were confronted with the break-up of farms that had been farmed by their family for generations. I saw people who wanted to retire: they were tired and exhausted by the daily round of farming. They wanted and needed to get out of farming but were unable to do so. I heard stories about the basic animal husbandry of the countryside not being done on small farms. I heard stories about the basic environmental work of the countryside not being done.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dawson: I will.

Mr. Hoyle: I thank my hon. Friend. I do not think that every hon. Member who wished to speak will be able to do so, owing to the length of some of the speeches that have been made.

Does my hon. Friend agree that the north-west has suffered more than any other region, except one? I feel that there should be a special intervention to support farmers in the north-west.

Is my hon. Friend aware that, although some £25 billion is spent on catering in this country, only 50 per cent. of the product is produced by British farmers? Think of that: only 50 per cent. of all the food that we buy in restaurants throughout the country is provided by the British farmer. Here is a golden opportunity for people who are involved in hotel and restaurant chains to play their part by supporting British farmers—along with the supermarkets, which also neglect our farmers.

Mr. Dawson: I endorse my hon. Friend's north-west "patriotism".

The people about whom I am talking need help now. I do not accept the criticisms of the Government's policies that we have heard tonight. The Government have clearly aimed to secure extra help for hill farmers, and, indeed, to secure extra help for agriculture across the board, but more help is needed. We need a retirement package. We need support enabling farmers to diversify. We need support for local purchasing schemes. We need support for co-operatives. We need a new way of approaching work in the countryside.

We also need to put pressure on the supermarkets. Producers are in an intensely vulnerable position: their prices are being driven down. That is not reflected in the supermarkets. I see, hear and feel the frustration of my constituents who, having been to the markets, go into the major supermarkets in the towns and see the price of basic commodities rising, despite the prices that the producers are receiving.

Mr. Drew: May I return to my hon. Friend's earlier point? Does he agree that tenant farmers are especially vulnerable at present? One measure that would help them is a reduction in the price of land, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning); but it is particularly important to tenants that farm rents should not increase. Indeed, they could be lowered, to ensure that those tenants continue to produce.

Mr. Dawson: My hon. Friend is entirely right. My constituency contains a large proportion of tenant farmers, who, even during the best times, have operated on the margins of viability. They are clearly being hit very hard. I think that large landowners have a big responsibility, in terms not just of rents but of helping diversification, and helping to alter the way in which the rural economy operates.

I do not intend to take any more of the House's time. We have a monumentally serious situation on our hands, and we need the package that is, I hope, on its way. We need that package very quickly. Some farmers face destruction. The word "suicide" comes to mind: some farmers are extremely low.

This is a human issue. We have heard what happened to mining and steel communities in the 1980s. I know that there are hon. Members who will do everything possible to ensure that the communities we represent will never be in the same state.

9.34 pm

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I am happy to declare an interest. I am no longer directly concerned in agriculture, but I am a landlord of agricultural property.

Time and again in the debate, the Minister has been told by both sides of the House of the catastrophe that is visited on UK agriculture. Each of the agriculture sectors is on its knees. South-west agriculture, and agriculture generally, is greatly indebted to the PROSPER report, to which the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) referred: "The Hopes and Fears of South West Farmers".

[Mr. John Burnett]

That was published by PROSPER and the National Farmers Union two weeks ago. It was the result of a survey of NFU members throughout Devon, Cornwall, Somerset and Dorset. Ten thousand questionnaires were sent out and 2,854 replies were given.

I am happy to pay tribute to the Western Morning News and its agriculture editor, Carol Trewin, who asked PROSPER and the NFU to undertake that comprehensive survey. It was conducted from June to mid-August this year. I have a copy of the survey for the Minister. It makes bleak and depressing reading.

Morale is at rock bottom. Farmers are working longer hours for decreasing returns, coping with increasing red tape and regulations. The report highlights the dreadful state of agriculture, where last year net farm incomes dropped by 50 per cent. It is estimated that, this year, they will fall by a further 70 per cent.

As the House will know, the problem does not stop there. Agriculture is the prime industry of the rural economy and this agricultural recession has a domino effect on allied trades and services such as machinery, transport and livestock markets.

The sources of the immediate problem have been BSE, an over-valued currency and high interest rates. There are signs that the latter two problems are correcting themselves, but the industry has been knocked so hard that there must be some short-term relief to protect viable farm businesses from insolvency.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): In view of the point that the hon. Gentleman is making—I entirely accept the sincerity with which he is doing it—will he make representations to the Liberal Democrat leader of Devon county council, urging a rethink on the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) was making?

Mr. Burnett: I am grateful to the hon. Member for raising that point. I was going to address it in my speech, but I make it clear that British beef is best and that there is no reason why it cannot be fed to British schoolchildren.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman make representations?

Mr. Burnett: Of course I shall.

Some Ministers are inclined to preface any discussion about agriculture support by invoking the costs that the Treasury has to bear towards eradicating BSE. I must make it clear that that is not support. It is part-compensation—I emphasise, part-compensation—for gross negligence in the 1980s; it nowhere compensates for the loss.

The indictment that I make against this Government and the previous Government is that, other than the £85 million drawn down last December, both Governments have failed to draw down agrimoney compensation. As a result, UK agriculture has lost about £700 million.

It is not for this Government or their predecessor to plead the Fontainebleau problem and the clawback. The UK has saved hundreds of millions of pounds in its contributions to the European Union by virtue of the strength of sterling. UK taxpayers have subsidised and are subsidising agrimoney compensation drawn down by other EU countries. The House should be aware that all other EU countries that qualify draw down that compensation. Our industry should be treated fairly and put on the same footing as other competitor countries.

Because the money has not been claimed by the Government and the previous Government, the compensation is now worth only about £160 million. As I have said, we have lost £700 million. I hope that the Government will draw that remaining money down without delay. The Treasury should also allow a one-off opportunity to average farm incomes for income tax purposes over the past five years. That would go some way towards making good the immediate cash flow crisis for many farmers. The Minister will recall that it was a Labour Government in 1978 who introduced tax averaging over two years.

Others in the debate have highlighted unfair competition and what appears to be a cartel of the superstore operators. Will the Minister explain, for example, why, in the pigmeat sector in September 1995, the supermarkets' retail price was 242 per cent. above the producers' price, whereas by September this year it had risen to 462 per cent?

There was a report in yesterday's newspapers that an inquiry is about to be ordered into why the market is not allowed to operate in the meat sector. The price paid to farmers has plummeted, whereas the price paid by the consumer has remained the same. Will an inquiry be constituted into that extraordinary anomaly?

It seems that progress is being made in lifting the beef ban. I hope that the Minister will remind our European Union partners, first, that there was a ban on meat and bonemeal and that traceability was in place by 1 August 1996; and, secondly, that no bullock over 30 months can be sold for human consumption in the United Kingdom. There can therefore be no reason for any ban after 31 January 1999.

Although we all realise that there has to be a long-term strategy for agriculture, the crisis is now. We await the Government's response to it.

9.40 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I do not represent an agricultural constituency, and had planned to speak in this debate primarily about the food safety aspect of farming and the food industry. However, after listening to the debate, I feel compelled to examine some of the other issues in agriculture.

If I have one disagreement with my hon. Friend the Minister of State it is that he has been far too gentle in this debate in responding to Liberal Democrat Members. I am sure that he would not be quite so gentle in dealing with Conservative Members or with their failure to deal with the issues.

There can be no real doubt about the problem, which we have all witnessed. Although, as I said, I do not represent a farming community, I have spent much of the summer going around farms and speaking with farmers; I also saw parts of the food industry and spoke with food producers. There can no doubt about the problem facing farmers and food producers. Nevertheless, in this debate, we have not heard a possible solution from Opposition Members—[Interruption.] No, we have not. Although we heard much from Conservative Members about a fair deal for farmers, they seem to be caught in a real Conservative dilemma of advocating spending ever more money while not wanting to be the party of public spending.

Conservative Members have produced no options to deal with the long-term structural problems facing British agriculture which have been building up for a long time and which have now been compounded by a series of specific issues affecting crops and food prices. Conservative Members said nothing about problems of over-production, world prices or economies of scale in farming. However, we did hear a suggestion that the preservation of hunting might be part of the solution.

Liberal Democrat Members talked about solving farmers' problems by increasing agrimonetary compensation funds. Ministers have explained that they have targeted a series of measures, to the tune of £255 million, to deal with specific problems. It is especially ridiculous for Liberal Democrat Members—who belong to a party that everyone respects as being pro-European—to talk about agrimonetary compensation, as they really support, or say that they support, restructuring the common agricultural policy to change the way in which funds are provided to support farming.

Liberal Democrat Members have said also that CAP reform must not discriminate against British farmers. They overlook the point that the British Government, above all others, have been leading the argument for CAP reform. The issue is not whether we will get sufficient reform but whether we will get even the very diluted proposals being considered by Europe.

We have heard a great deal in this debate about the crisis in farming, which is being hit by the worst slump in prices since the 1930s. We have heard also various comments about the beef on the bone ban, which the Government are not only tackling but making great progress in resolving. It must be recognised that consumers also have an interest in farm prices and that measures that change the way in which CAP works have to be transparent to the public—they must not simply provide support for farmers in a discredited way.

It is understood that much remains to be done, and the Government have set out their proposals. Huge amounts of advice have been given to the Government, and my advice to them is to keep their nerve and to make sure that, in pursuing the interests of the farming community, we do not end up with short-term measures that do away with any real hope of providing a secure, long-term future for British farming and the British food industry.

9.45 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Liberal Democrat Members represent agricultural and livestock communities from Shetland to the Isles of Scilly, so it is entirely appropriate that a Scotsman should open the debate and that a Cornishman should wind up for the Liberal Democrats.

We face a national and a nationwide crisis. I was impressed by contributions from all parts of the House which clearly showed that the recess has been put to good use. I especially praise the contributions of the hon. Members for Selby (Mr. Grogan), who made an excellent speech, and for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). It was also a relief to hear a sober and careful analysis of the crisis from the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), in contrast to the absurd histrionics that we heard from another former Minister.

I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) for referring to the excellent report produced by the Western Morning News and based on a survey undertaken by PROSPER and the National Farmers Union, to which I shall refer again.

Two facts are unchallengeable. The first is that every sector of agriculture is now under severe threat. The old country saying, "Horn up, corn down; corn up, horn down" has been swept away in the 1990s. Secondly, everyone has to agree, even if it cannot be admitted in public, that the crisis did not begin on 2 May 1997.

There may have been a severe deterioration after the general election, but the situation was already deteriorating fast. Because they plan long and because they have long memories, farmers know perfectly well that that is the case. No farmer whom I have met in any part of the United Kingdom believes that the disastrous slide started as a result of the political change. The devastation built up over several months before the election and has continued since.

Both facts were eloquently underlined in the report to which I referred which was published by the Western Morning News. It emphasised the conclusions reflected in many speeches that we heard this evening. It states:

> "What makes this agricultural crisis unique in modern times is that every sector has been affected. The industry's net income this year is forecast to be no more than around £700 million, compared with £4.1 billion in 1996."

If one bears in mind the fact that many large agricultural businesses will still be profitable, it is clear that the average is going to be much worse. That means that many medium and smaller agricultural businesses will be firmly in the red. The Western Morning News also reports banks as saying that around 70 per cent. of all farms in the south-west will make a loss this year. That brings me to the second fact.

In a continuing series, the Western Morning News published an extremely interesting graph—I wish that I could use visual aids to greater effect in the House. The graph shows the difference between farmgate prices and the retail prices index. From 1987 to 1995, there was a steady rise in both. By 1995, the overall RPI had risen by nearly 50 per cent. and the food RPI by about 33 per cent. Farmgate prices has risen much less dramatically—they were up by 25 per cent.

In contrast to the views of the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), the collapse started in 1996—before the general election—not 1997. The collapse began when the total RPI went on increasing to nearly 60 per cent. last year and then levelled off. However, food prices collapsed back to 10 per cent. One has only to look at this graph, which I think the Minister can see, to realise that the deterioration started in 1996. By 1998, farm incomes will have fallen to below what they were a decade ago, while the cost of living will have increased by 70 per cent. or more.

The emergency package, to which we refer in our motion, to which the National Farmers Union referred and which was hinted at by the Minister of State, is extremely urgent. We need that rescue package now. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have reflected not just the consternation but the growing anger in the farming community at the discrepancy between farmgate prices and the prices in the shops. The fury that successive Governments have been so cowardly in the face of profiteering by the middle men is now all too apparent.

Last weekend, I spoke to about 80 farm households in my constituency. One farmer's wife told me that, in a week when they had sold a steer for less than it had cost them to produce it, the price of beef in the supermarket was simply beyond the means of her household. Farmers cannot afford supermarket prices for the very products that they are selling.

During the last Parliament, I urged on successive Agriculture Ministers the need to investigate the growing disparity between farmgate prices and the retail food prices. As has already been said, my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) produced an excellent report on the supermarkets and we welcome the fact that, not before time, the Government have now initiated an inquiry into their profitability and the way in which they have been treating producers.

The Independent today points out that the market share of the big four has increased from 25 per cent. in 1987 to more than 50 per cent. in 1997, yet the Conservative Government did nothing about the growing monopolistic tendencies during that period.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No.

Given the extent to which the supermarkets and the food processing giants have screwed down the prices that they pay to primary producers, we should not be surprised that the Conservative party has now appointed to central office the managing director of one of the largest supermarkets. The supermarkets and the giant food processors have bucked all the trends of the recession and have banked record profits.

The agriculture industry is in serious decline. There has also been a deterioration in public confidence in the quality and safety of British food. Therefore, it is essential that we proceed as fast possible to the Food Standards Agency that was promised in the Government's manifesto. I notice hon. Members on both sides of the House nodding in agreement. I hope that the Minister will take a leaf out of his predecessor's book and stand up to his colleagues in Cabinet and say that it is something that the British people are entitled to expect and that the consumer and the farmer need such a powerful weapon to ensure that, in future, the middle men do not dominate the market to the extent that they have in the recent past.

We need more transparency in food pricing to make sure that farmers get a fair crack of the whip and we need an end to the cosy relationship between some of the big boys of the food processing and retail industry and the Ministry.

Last week, it was said that the permanent secretary at MAFF had an unusually cosy relationship with Tesco's director of corporate affairs. That is scarcely surprising, because they are married to one another, so it should not be a matter for conjecture or criticism, but it highlights the fact that, at a time when serious issues are raised, the sensitivity of the relationship between MAFF and the industry is under the spotlight. The Government must take courage and bring forward the Bill as soon as possible.

The Minister may not have noticed that the Modernisation Committee has provided him with a weapon to take a short cut through the normal legislative jungle to ensure that the Bill reaches the statute book. Farmers and consumers now demand that there should be greater confidence in the way in which British food is produced and sold. We need the Food Standards Agency. We must give the British people back the confidence in their food that they should have, used to have and need to have again.

9.54 pm

Mr. Rooker rose—

Mr. Hayes: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that it is the normal protocol and courtesy of this House for the Secretary of State of the relevant Department to sum up in a debate of this kind when he is present.

Madam Speaker: It does not concern me which Minister is summing up. Does the House give leave to the Minister to speak again?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Rooker: I was about to ask the leave of the House to speak again. I am grateful for the opportunity to do so in the short time available. We have had an interesting debate. In many ways, it has been predictable, but I make no complaint about that. The comments of hon. Members on both sides, particularly Labour Members, have been useful for Ministers in our consideration of the points made by the food industry.

I have to disabuse the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) of a notion. I have found no evidence in the past 18 months of a cosy relationship between MAFF and the big supermarkets. There is no evidence of that in the functioning or attitudes of the Ministry. That does not mean that the difficulties of old MAFF are all out of the way; they are not. We have tried desperately in the past 18 months to change the culture of MAFF so that we put the consumer first and are not simply seen as the producers' Ministry. However, we are responsible for sponsoring the food industry and, until the Food Standards Agency is established, we are also responsible for the consumer side.

Criticism has been made of one of the first points that I made. I repeat, the cost of dealing with BSE—not all of it; I did not claim that—represents a contribution by the taxpayer to market support. There is no doubt about that. Under the over-30-months scheme, 2.5 million cattle—none with BSE—have been taken out of the food chain and slaughtered. Some 350,000 tonnes of meat and bonemeal are stored around the country as a result of the scheme, occupying more than 500,000 cu m. To give an idea of the volume, that is the equivalent of 44 Big Ben towers, all of which has to be burnt at public expense to destroy it under the terms of the Florence agreement. Removing 2.5 million cattle in that way has to be a contribution to market support.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) for his speech—the first speech from the Back Benches. He put the position very well for his constituents and those whom he had met at the market. My hon. Friends the Members for Selby (Mr. Grogan) and for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) also put the case. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) seemed to go out of her way to cause the Liberal Democrats to press for a Division. Nevertheless, as a member of the Select Committee, her comments have to be respected. I agree with the hon. Member for North Cornwall that the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), who is a former Minister, made a positive contribution, unlike some of her colleagues.

No one underestimates the current difficulties of the livestock industry. For the first time, all the difficulties that one could imagine have been brought together. It is a catastrophe for many who have been in the industry for a lifetime. It causes further problems for young people entering the industry. I have asked some of those at agricultural college why they are contemplating going into the industry. The reasons include the force of community, heritage and responsibility to the family and what has been left to them by parents and grandparents. They are full of foreboding for the future. However, to their credit, some young people are still seeking to enter the industry. We have to ensure that the conditions for the future are positive. Initially, we have to consider emergency, short-term aid, but that must not interfere with long-term plans in this country and the European Union for restructuring the food industry.

As I said, my right hon. Friend the Minister will meet representatives of the food industry, supermarkets and the British Retail Consortium next week. We cannot order them to do anything, but we shall put it to them in the strongest possible terms that there is a moral obligation not to impose conditions on British farmers then seek to buy abroad where those conditions are not applied. As I said, we know that some supermarkets are taking a wholly positive view in sourcing only from the same type of suppliers as in this country. We will report to the House as quickly as possible on the results of our consultation with industry and colleagues in government.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Hanson and
Mr. Mike Hall.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to the Order [this day], and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's strong commitment to the UK farming industry and to the wider rural economy; welcomes in particular the steps which the Government has taken since May 1997 to support the beef and sheep industry via EU agri-monetary compensation and relief from charges; acknowledges the steps taken specifically to help the sheep, pig and cereal sectors with targeted EU measures; and endorses the Government's intention to bring about a secure and viable future for the UK farming and food industries through a market-orientated reform of the Common Agricultural Policy.

Child Support Agency

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

10.13 pm

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): I am grateful to have the opportunity in this short Adjournment debate to raise the problem of the Child Support Agency and self-employed absent parents. I want briefly to discuss many general concerns that I and many others have about the way in which the CSA treats such parents and to refer to a specific case in my constituency, the details of which I gave my hon. Friend the Minister in advance.

I want to make two introductory points. First, I have no animosity towards the self-employed sector and would deprecate any attempt to suggest otherwise. My brother is self-employed, as was my father before he retired, and so are many of my friends. Secondly, it is in some ways a matter of profound regret that I must refer to the case of my constituent, Theresa West, not least because it was the subject of an Adjournment debate introduced by my predecessor, Mr. Hugh Dykes, on 31 January 1994—four years ago. I also note with interest that, after I was notified on 14 October of my success in securing this Adjournment debate, the first question to the Secretary of State for Social Security on Monday 19 October concerned precisely this subject matter: the CSA and the self-employed. I welcomed the response from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regarding that matter.

I turn briefly to the case of Theresa West. Theresa sought a maintenance variation order in 1993 and the CSA rather than the courts took on the case. I hasten to add that that was not of Theresa's choosing; she would rather have seen the matter stay with the courts. She had accepted £300 a month maintenance for her two children following her divorce in 1986. The CSA took nine months to determine an assessment and reduced her agreed maintenance to £200 a month. She naturally appealed against that assessment. While awaiting the outcome of the section 18 review, changes in the law meant a reassessment of her maintenance, which was reduced to £100 a month.

The overall review was completed by March 1994 and, as a result, Theresa's payments were reduced to nothing and she was ordered to repay overpayments. That assessment was based on her ex-husband's claim that his salary was only £14,393—a claim that the CSA happily accepted. However, Theresa knew differently. Theresa's ex-husband is a self-employed record producer of international repute. In 1993, he purchased a house worth more than £300,000 and stated clearly on his mortgage application to the Queen's bank, Coutts, that his joint income with his new wife was almost £200,000 a year—at the same time, he had declared his income as £14,000 to the CSA. He also explained that he could easily access and repatriate overseas funds to the value of £160,000. He owned a Porsche, two BMWs, his two children from his second marriage attended private schools and he employed a cleaner and a gardener. He also paid himself a £28,800 dividend through his own company—but forgot to tell the CSA about it.

We have this information only because Theresa would not accept that her ex-husband's bank had, in its words, "lost" his mortgage application. With perseverance and temerity, she obtained a copy of the application from the bank. To achieve that, she had to involve the Serious Fraud Office and the fraud manager of Coutts. At the tribunal hearing in July 1996—this is regarding the 1993 assessment—the CSA revised her assessment from nothing to £1,250 a month.

Her ex-husband appealed to the child support commissioner, who reported his determination on the July 1996 hearing of the 1993 assessment in August 1998. The ex-husband's appeal was refused and, in outlining the reasons, the commissioner stated:

"it appears to me that their"—

that is, the tribunal's—

"express finding that the applicant had over a long period failed to disclose the true level of his income was justified having regard to the evidence before them."

I remind hon. Members that that evidence existed only because of Theresa's own work, and not that of the CSA. The commissioner continued:

"In particular, the admitted and inadequately explained failure to disclose his £28,800 dividend from his company, the failure to disclose any overseas earnings or income at all through his tax return . . . and the inability to give any satisfactory information about the level of overseas or other income" justifies the tribunal's decision.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): In the scenario that my hon. Friend describes, was the Inland Revenue contacted? Its records should be available to the CSA too.

Mr. McNulty: They should be, but they are not; and when they are, the CSA constantly says that it is beyond its discretion to go beyond what each party gives it.

Therefore, five years after the CSA became involved, a final assessment of the 1993 maintenance level was arrived at—in 1998. The process of getting to that point involved a suitcase of paperwork, thousands of work hours by the CSA, the appeals tribunal, the child support commissioner and legal staff, seven tribunal hearings, three High Court subpoenas, the cost of legal aid for counsel's opinion and a written determination by the commissioner—all simply for the 1993 maintenance assessment.

Theresa made numerous requests to the CSA for the collection of the arrears for 1993–94—a total of more than £10,000—but the CSA refused to pursue that because of her ex-husband's appeal to the child support commissioner.

In 1996, the CSA requested information to complete the periodic review for 1994. The 1994 assessment reduced the maintenance to £380 a month, largely because Theresa's ex-husband claimed that his income for that year was only £34,000—a drop of more than £150,000 from the now accepted level of the previous year. However, although the CSA recognised that this was unusual, it said that, without her ex-husband's co-operation in producing additional evidence, it was bound to accept his accounts.

Again, Theresa asked for a section 18 appeal, reminding the CSA that evidence already produced to the July 1996 tribunal showed that her ex-husband's projected income for 1994 was between £190,000 and £230,000. The result of that appeal was that the £380 a month assessment was confirmed, as although the appeal tribunal directed that her ex-husband's liability be calculated on the basis of the projected income figure, the CSA said that it did not have the discretion to use the projected figure as verified income. Sadly, there was no mortgage application or similar document that could be used to find out his real income level.

By October 1998—let us bear in mind that this process started at the inception of the CSA, in 1993—the picture is that Theresa's ex-husband is to pay almost £800 a month regular maintenance and £413 a month toward arrears. You might think that justice was served at last. The sting in the tail, though, is that the CSA is dealing with an outstanding periodic review of the assessment of maintenance from October 1996 and a further review of the period up to October 1998—and has said that it has no discretion to use projected income figures as verification. It says, therefore, that "it is likely that"— the ex-husband's—

"liability will reduce."

It would seem that the projected income is appropriate for the child support commissioner and adequate for the Queen's bank to advance a £250,000 mortgage, but not enough for the CSA to put food on a child's table.

Theresa's ex-husband is now claiming that his income is again around £14,000—despite the fact that he now has a third child in private education and that there is documentary proof that his mortgage payments alone total £28,500 a year. If the CSA used that figure for the two outstanding periodic reviews, the assessment of maintenance would be reduced to about £40 a month and he would be able to argue, on the basis of the assessment, that he is unable to pay any of the arrears, which now total more than £30,000.

This is indeed a sorry tale, and one that is not yet complete. It shows vividly how the CSA has not been adequately equipped to deal with the complexities of dealing with absent parents who are self-employed and who, in some cases, to say the least are unco-operative, if not downright misleading in a wilful fashion.

As I have said, I welcome the Secretary of State's response at Social Security questions on Monday 19 October 1998, when he said that a special unit had been established within the CSA to deal with self-employed people. I welcome the overall approach of the Green Paper "Children First: a new approach to child support" and many of its suggestions for the future.

However, so that we may ensure that the self-employed are dealt with fairly and efficiently by the CSA—in a way that is fair to the continuing parent as well as the absent parent—I should like the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), and the Secretary of State to consider areas such as the following, some of which are in the Green Paper.

First, I should like Ministers to consider the use of projected income as well as the most recent year's taxable profit in maintenance assessments, and all reviews should be based on verified and complete accounts. Secondly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) said, the Inland Revenue should be fully used—it does not always happen—to verify income levels claimed by the self-employed absent parent, including, crucially, overseas income and resources.

Interest and compensation could be paid on overdue payments or arrears when determined. There could be a proper system of enforcement and collection of arrears, once initially determined, instead of the present constant to-ing and fro-ing round assorted areas of the legal or quasi-judicial system.

As the Green Paper says, there should be a firmed-up commitment that the giving of false or misleading information will be made an offence. I would go further and say that, where it has been proved that misinformation has been used, specifically in the case of the absent self-employed parent, the presumption should automatically then be based on projected income. Projected income is more often than not appropriate, and is used in normal commercial dealings; it is appropriate in other ways, and should be for the CSA as well.

If such a package is used, it will shift the burden of proving ability to pay fair maintenance on to the self-employed absent parent and eradicate the perverse incentives that litter the current system, especially for the self-employed. At present, it is in the interest of absent self-employed parents to play the system, avoid declaring real income and fail in their duties and responsibilities to their children. This package of measures, specifically geared towards the self-employed, is in tune with the spirit and ethos of the new Green Paper.

I formally request that the outstanding elements of Theresa's case are referred to and dealt with swiftly by the new CSA special unit on the self-employed. Clearly, that may not elicit an answer this evening. What my constituent has had to endure cannot be right or fair. The behaviour of her ex-husband has been deplorable. It is only her tenacity in the face of his mendacious behaviour that has meant progress for her case and ultimately for her children's welfare.

Five years after my constituent's dealings with the CSA began, the case still grinds on. That is not the fair, efficient and firmly enforced system of child support that our people need and that we seek. Currently, the CSA cannot adequately deal with the problem. I ask sincerely that, as part of our review, we sort out once and for all the way in which absent self-employed parents are dealt with.

It is a matter of profound regret that my constituent has had to endure this nightmare, but I know that she will agree that it will be made slightly more tolerable if lessons are learned from her case, and the scams, tricks and strokes pulled by some malevolent absent self-employed parents and their coteries of lawyers and accountants are curtailed because of her experiences. Sooner rather than later the welfare of the children must become paramount again.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Angela Eagle): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) on having the good fortune to secure this debate, which he has used to great effect. He has drawn the House's attention to an important issue: how to get adequate child support from self-employed non-resident parents. The case that he mentioned shows up in stark relief many of the failures of the current system, which has often let parents down. However, we must remember that the self-employed present some of the most difficult cases with which we have to deal.

Because we guarantee confidentiality when we take on an application for child support, I cannot go into the details of Mrs. West's case on the Floor of the House tonight, although I will of course be happy to meet my hon. Friend to discuss more privately the handling of Mrs. West's maintenance assessment. Tonight, I shall address some of the key matters of concern to my hon. Friend. Before I do so, it may be helpful if I briefly set the problem in the context of the Government's reforms of the welfare state, as my hon. Friend did.

We are determined to reshape the welfare state to meet the needs of the future. The proposals set out in our Green Paper on child support are one part of those reforms. Child support has a key part to play in our determination to tackle child poverty: 1.8 million children are living with a lone parent on income support or family credit and receive not a penny in maintenance from the non-resident parent. It cannot be right that the separation of parents takes away their responsibility to support their children financially and emotionally. A child support system that works with parents to enable them to provide the support that their children need can help many to escape poverty and dependence on benefit.

That is why we are seeking to renew the way in which child support is delivered. Our Green Paper sets out how we intend to address the many problems of the current scheme. The on-going consultation is open and is due to end on 30 November. We must create a child support system that is practical to administer, enjoys the support of our society and delivers effective help to children and parents with care. I shall take on board my hon. Friend's comments and suggestions for dealing with the self-employed, which I shall regard as part of the consultation procedure.

Child support liability is, sensibly, based on the amount that a parent can afford. That means that there will always be the problem of determining how much money a parent has available. The case that my hon. Friend mentioned appears to be a particularly severe example of the problem, with the child support liability varying widely according to differing accounts of the non-resident parent's income.

We all accept that the rules of the current scheme are far too complicated to be workable. In the case of many self-employed non-resident parents, the current system is also too easily manipulated by those who wish to minimise their liabilities. We shall try to simplify the system to minimise any chance of abuse, and we have proposed introducing penalties for those who lie about the money that is available to them in any income-based assessment. However, there are real difficulties with the self-employed, and changes in the child support rules, although they help, cannot entirely overcome them. In other words, the self-employed were always the most difficult cases to assess when the courts were responsible for child maintenance, and after the creation of the Child Support Agency that unfortunately did not change.

In order to establish the income available to pay maintenance, we cannot simply ask the self-employed for wage slips, as we can with most employees. Indeed, simply providing proper accounts is often difficult for many small traders. There are undoubtedly some self-employed people who will always seek to minimise their declared income. Those people present difficulties to all agencies charged with collecting money, including the Inland Revenue.

This is not a new problem or a problem particular to child support. However, it is worth bearing in mind the fact that one in five self-employed non-resident parents pay all the maintenance that is due. That means that 80 per cent. do not, so clearly we must try to create a more effective system.

The means available to the CSA to pursue queries over income declarations are not adequate. Steps have been taken to address that problem. A task force set up to deal with self-employed cases has been successfully piloted. Specialist teams have focused on working with the self-employed to encourage them to comply. This approach has proved very successful in the pilots, with substantial reductions in clearance times and significant improvements in compliance. These special units will therefore be implemented nationally by 1 March 1999.

We are also looking to see whether we can make any improvements to current legislation to widen the access that the CSA has to essential information collected by other agencies. That is something that my hon. Friend emphasised.

Experience has shown that tribunals are able to look at the earnings of the self-employed more in the round. They have reached assessments based on evidence that cannot currently be used by child support officers. Occasionally, tribunals have used their powers to summon witnesses, another avenue not available to the CSA.

As part of our reform of the child support scheme, we are seeking to build on the provisions that allow us to depart from the usual formula assessment. That would enable us to make greater use of the tribunals' broader scope. This scheme can allow a parent with care to apply for what is called a departure from the actual maintenance assessment on the basis that the level of income declared by the non-resident parent is inconsistent with his life style.

We are examining the possibility of making changes to the treatment of self-employed earners. We are considering a method of calculation that is more aligned with Inland Revenue provisions. In that way, non-resident parents could give the same information to the CSA that they give to the Inland Revenue.

That would make things much easier for parents, encouraging compliance as well as speeding up assessments. It would reduce the possibility of unscrupulous non-resident parents hiding the true level of their income, to the detriment of their children. Simplification of the rules would allow officials to spend more time enforcing maintenance and less time trying to work out the assessment.

Child support offers a real route out of poverty for many lone-parent families and particularly for children, many of whom currently live in needlessly difficult circumstances. To make child support work, we will ensure that we close the many loopholes that allow some parents to escape their responsibilities. We will make sure that the self-employed cannot hide from their duties to their children behind false accounts and administrative confusion.

This is why we have made the reform of child support a feature of our welfare reforms, and why we are pressing ahead in the meantime with the short-term improvements that I have outlined tonight, which I hope will begin to address the problems that have been raised by my hon. Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Visitors' Visas (Bombay)

1. Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): If he will make a statement on the issuing of visitors' visas in Bombay. [54285]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): In 1997, the visa section in the British deputy high commission in Bombay issued 43,318 visit visas. Up to 15 October this year, the visa section had issued 45,339 visit visas. Ninety-two per cent. of the straightforward visit visa applications are being issued within 24 hours. Currently, applicants are receiving their visas within two hours of presenting their application.

Mr. Vaz: Will the Minister pass on hon. Members' thanks to Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean for the changes that she introduced to the visa system to make it more efficient? However, as he must be aware, a large proportion of applications made in Bombay come from people who live in the Gujarat. Will he meet me and other interested colleagues to see whether visa facilities might be made available in Ahmadabad? Such facilities would greatly improve the position, lessening the pressure on Bombay and making the process much easier and much cheaper for applicants.

Mr. Fatchett: I shall certainly convey my hon. Friend's best wishes to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. She will be delighted to hear those words from my hon. Friend. I know that he keeps her busy on immigration and visa matters, so his words of support will be well received.

On the second point that my hon. Friend raised, I would be happy to meet him and his colleagues, although he must realise that, even to such a distinguished Member as himself, I cannot make a commitment at the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): If a visa application were made in Bombay by, let us say, a former dictator or former terrorist, would such an application be sympathetically considered by the Minister, and if it were granted, would it carry with it any immunity from rogue applications for extradition from this country?

Mr. Fatchett: Any visa application made at the deputy high commission in Bombay will be dealt with according to the immigration rules.

Sudan

2. Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): What progress has been made towards a permanent peaceful settlement in Sudan. [54286]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): The UK has long supported the Intergovernmental Authority on Development peace process as the best chance to bring an end to the civil war in Sudan through a negotiated settlement. With a mandate from the IGAD partners forum, I visited Nairobi and Khartoum from 13 to 16 July to discuss the possibilities of securing a break in the fighting in the areas most affected by the humanitarian crisis.

Subsequently, the Government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Army announced a three-month ceasefire in Bahr al Ghazal. Following further discussions on 9 and 12 October respectively, the SPLA and the Government of Sudan agreed to extend the ceasefire in Bahr al Ghazal by a further three months. We shall continue to be active in trying to find a long-term solution to the conflict.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Minister's response. He will be aware that, today, the aid organisations warned us that we might have a greater catastrophe than in Kosovo if something did not happen shortly to help people in Sudan. Is there any more recent information that would enable the Foreign Office to confirm the claims of the American State Department, corroborated by the Ministry of Defence, that the factory in Khartoum was a chemical factory—or does the Minister agree that the bombing of that factory may not have helped to advance the peace process in Sudan?

Mr. Fatchett: I very much respect the hon. Gentleman's interest in the issue of Sudan. He is right to say that the only way to deal with the long-term humanitarian problem is to achieve a political solution. That is one reason why I took a more active interest in the matter in the summer of this year. I hope that the United Kingdom, with others, can continue to play a more active role.

On chemical weapons in Sudan, the best way to verify the situation would be for Sudan to sign the chemical weapons convention.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): May I express my appreciation of the efforts that the Minister of State and the Secretary of State have made to bring about a settlement in Sudan? Our concerns are with the women and children in southern Sudan, who are suffering the most as a result of the conflict in their country; the recent bombing by America did not help the situation. However, will my hon. Friend assure the House that he will do all that he can to bring about a negotiated settlement to the problems in Sudan, so that we can be of more help to the people there who are suffering as a result of the conflict in their country?

Mr. Fatchett: Sadly, we are seeing a continuation of the civil war that has been going on for several decades. It is clear that the only way forward is to find a peaceful solution. There cannot be a military solution to the civil war in Sudan. We must encourage the parties to get to the negotiating table. That is why we support the IGAD process, and why the United Kingdom is keen to play any part we can to assist the negotiations and to help towards peace. As my hon. Friend says, that is the best way to give a long-term future to the people of Sudan, who have suffered too much and for too long.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): May I thank the Minister for the work that he has put into trying to find a solution to the civil war in Sudan? In view of the news that Sudan has resumed bombing in the south, and the fact that, other than at Bahr al Ghazal, the fighting has intensified in recent weeks, could he find a way to bring about the support of the United States and the United Nations for urgent action to prevent the continuation of the tragic starvation in that area?

Mr. Fatchett: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind comments about my role. It was important in July to look for a way to achieve a partial ceasefire. It is temporary and covers only part of Sudan, but, for the many thousands of people in that area, it gives slight relief and the possibility of a longer life. We must extend those principles to the whole of Sudan and get the parties together. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says about the United States and the United Nations. The entire international community has neglected Sudan for too long and we have a responsibility to do what we can.

Universal Declaration of Human Rights

3. Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): If he will make a statement on Government plans to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights. [54287]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): Five decades after the universal declaration of human rights was signed, it remains an inspiration and a common standard of achievement for all nations and all peoples.

We are celebrating the anniversary with other Governments, the United Nations Association and non-governmental organisations. On the occasion of the anniversary, we have introduced a series of measures to create a closer dialogue between the Foreign Office and NGOs on human rights.

Mr. Gapes: I welcome the action that the Government have taken so far. Does my hon. Friend agree that the universal declaration of human rights is just that: universal? It should therefore apply to all countries, including Malaysia, China, India and Pakistan and countries in Africa, Asia, Europe, Latin America and north America. [Interruption.] Will my hon. Friend reassure me that this Government, unlike their predecessor, will adopt universal standards of human rights and emphasise the importance of the United Nations and its institutions?

Mr. Lloyd: I am delighted to join my hon. Friend in doing that. I was rather sorry to hear some barracking from the Opposition Benches about the universal declaration. That highlights the difference between the present Government and their predecessors in their commitment to human rights issues. In every part of the world the universal declaration has played a significant role in improving observance of and respect for human rights, but in every part of the world there are still areas where improvements are needed. Perhaps the finest way in which we could mark the 50th anniversary would be to ensure that the universal declaration is indeed universal.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): When making his plans for the anniversary of the declaration of human rights, will the Minister recall that the last Conservative Government had an excellent record on human rights, and that last year and every year for the past 10 years the Conservative Government co-sponsored a UN resolution calling for an improvement in China's human rights situation? Can the Minister explain why his Government have failed to renew that resolution? Does that failure to renew not confirm the accusation by Wei Jingsheng, probably the most famous Chinese prisoner of conscience, that the present Foreign Secretary is two-faced, and show that Labour's supposedly ethical foreign policy is hypocritical and spineless? Will the Government support that resolution when it comes back to the next UN meeting?

Mr. Lloyd: That is a very good try, but it is a shame that the Conservatives must make human rights a matter of party politics. The reality is that, when the resolution went through, the European Union nations were split. The Conservatives know that. Under the present Government and the present Foreign Secretary, we have a united European Union position with respect to China. We have seen progress in China, and Mary Robinson and the Prime Minister recently visited that country. Unlike the situation under the previous Government, the human rights debate with China is now on-going.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Is my hon. Friend aware of newspaper reports today that suggest that the Foundation for Human Rights in the EU will close at the end of the year? That is worrying news for non-governmental organisations all over the world, including Redress Trust, the London-based charity that, among other things, deals with the victims of torture in Chile. That organisation is likely to lose up to half its funding. Will my hon. Friend act as a matter of urgency to ensure that that does not occur?

Mr. Lloyd: There can be no doubt that NGOs play an important role in maintaining respect for human rights worldwide. It is sad to see a threat to any legitimate organisation operating in that area. I do not know about the particular events leading to the situation that my hon. Friend describes, but I shall take her remarks on board and inquire as to the proper position and how the problem may be resolved.

Kosovo

4. Jackie Ballard (Taunton): If he will make a statement on the situation in Kosovo. [54288]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): Since my statement to the House last week, Britain has remained fully engaged in efforts to implement the Holbrooke package. At the weekend, after hours of intensive negotiation, President Milosevic gave a detailed commitment to reduce the levels of army, police and heavy weapons in Kosovo to their levels before the conflict. Diplomatic observers in Kosovo report that several thousand security troops have left over the past 24 hours.

There has been a significant return of refugees to settlements in the valleys, and the UN estimates that numbers on the hillsides have fallen from 50,000 to around 10,000.

President Milosevic has shown some progress towards meeting the demands of the Security Council, but there is a long way still to go before we secure a self-governing Kosovo with its own elected leadership and free from repression from Belgrade.

Jackie Ballard: I thank the Foreign Secretary for that reply. I am sure that everyone hopes that President Milosevic will continue to pull back from the brink. I am also pleased to hear that thousands of refugees are returning to the valleys. However, anxiety remains about what the international community intends to do to ensure safe and unrestricted access to Kosovo throughout the winter months in order to provide humanitarian aid to the refugees and prevent thousands of deaths from illness and starvation.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Lady is absolutely right to express concern about the position of the refugees. So many of their homes have been destroyed by the actions of the Serb security forces that, although returning from the hillsides may take them nearer to where they once lived, it will not necessarily provide them with shelter. The refugees are still at risk from cold, hunger and disease.

That is why we attach the highest importance to ensuring that humanitarian relief gets through to the refugees and why Britain, in particular, in the past week has provided grants to Care International for winter goods, to Oxfam for winter shelter and to Médecin sans Frontières for mobile clinics. We shall continue to play a leading role in the international effort.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor): Is the Foreign Secretary aware, that over the weekend, Alastair Campbell briefed the press in Austria? I have a transcript of that briefing, which said that the Prime Minister would tell the informal summit that "Kosovo showed us far too often to be dithering and disunited".

To ensure that the Government can no longer be accused of prolonging that dithering, will the Foreign Secretary inform the House for how long NATO forces will be maintained at their current and commendable state of readiness?

Mr. Cook: I assure the hon. Gentleman that Britain played a leading part in building unity both in NATO and in the contact group. If this country had not shown that leadership in securing agreement for the diplomatic track in the contact group—backed by a credible threat from NATO—we would not have made the progress that I have just reported to the House.

The North Atlantic Council is meeting to hear reports about progress on compliance, and I think that it is likely to conclude that Milosevic has made progress but has a long way to go yet. Therefore, I think that it is quite likely that we will resolve that we must keep our guard up. It is not yet the time to let that guard down.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North–East Fife): If, as appears possible, it may not now be necessary to use the attack aircraft of NATO's air forces, would it not make sense to use NATO's transport aircraft to help to meet the priorities already established by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees? Is it not the case that, in communities that were first razed to the ground and then looted, it is not only food and blankets that are required but medicines, equipment to restore essential services such as electricity and water, agricultural implements and building materials? If necessary, should we not have a Kosovo airlift to prevent the humanitarian disaster which we all dread?

Mr. Cook: I can certainly assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that, if the United Nations should approach us for support in the transport of goods to Kosovo, we would be very willing to consider that sympathetically because we would not want essential goods not to get through because of the lack of logistics. One of the reasons that we are anxious to get the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe verification mission up and running on the ground is precisely so that we can have those members of that team in every village and town, not merely to stand by and observe but robustly to intervene and make sure that they broker access to humanitarian goods and that the people of Kosovo are given the chance to come through this winter.

Chile

6. Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): If he will make a statement on the UK's relations with Chile. [54290]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): I met the Deputy Foreign Minister of Chile, Mr. Mariano Fernandez, on Saturday. I explained to the Minister that the Government of Britain had no power to intervene in the court proceedings concerning Senator Pinochet, and nor would it be proper for us to direct the police in the execution of a magistrate's warrant. I also stressed to Mr. Fernandez the determination of the Government to prevent these legal procedures from undermining our excellent relations with the democratic Government of Chile.

Mr. Pickles: Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in congratulating the people of Chile on the smooth transition from dictatorship to a robust democracy? Does he agree that one of the most remarkable features of that is that opponents of the former regime worked side by side with people who supported it, forswearing individual acts of violence, to build a strong and robust democracy in Chile? Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that that balance between opponent and supporter is a fine one and that outside influences are not welcome in that process? If he agrees with that, has he had an opportunity over the past fortnight to pass on that view to other members of the Government?

Mr. Cook: Of course there is a fine balance in direct conciliation and accommodation in Chile. That fine balance includes 14 current prosecutions outstanding against Senator Pinochet.

Of course we warmly welcome the progress of Chile and many other countries of Latin America towards democracy. One of the important founding stones of democracy is the rule of law and the clear principle that politicians should not decide who is arrested and who is not, and it is that principle that we are upholding in Britain.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I have never had tea and sympathy with General Pinochet, and, having visited Chile during the reign of terror in the early 1980s and seen the way in which the oldest and longest democracy in Latin America had had its democracy subverted, I would never seek to parley with that gentleman. However, our views are surely irrelevant: will my right hon. Friend confirm that, once a proper application had been made under the Extradition Act 1989, we had no option but to let due process proceed?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. One of the most curious features of the past few days and the comments on them is the idea that the Bow Street magistrates issuing a warrant and the Metropolitan police executing it somehow adds up to a left-wing conspiracy. The Government are clear: due process of law must be carried out and it must not be warped to fit anybody's political agenda.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Is it not correct that the handling of this arrest and the possible extradition of General Pinochet have been bedevilled by chaos and confusion throughout? Why have the Government still not established whether or not the Spanish Government, as opposed to one Spanish judge, are applying for his extradition? Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the Home Secretary had a discretion not to authorise the grant of a warrant and could at that point have taken into account many factors, including the implications of the arrest for the future of democracy in Chile?

Mr. Cook: The right hon. and learned Gentleman wrote to me last week saying that, if an extradition request were made, of course the normal processes and procedures should be followed. It is difficult to see that sentiment in the question that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has just put to me. Of course we have had no contact on the question with the Spanish Government. It would be deeply improper to do so. The extradition request has been processed by entirely competent legal authority in Spain. It is for the Spanish authorities to decide whether they wish to withdraw it, not for us to decide whether we should ignore it. The Home Secretary was entirely proper in allowing the due process of law to proceed. There was a time when the Conservative party would have prided itself on being the party of the rule of law. It is rather sad that it has now departed from that principle of our constitution.

Mr. Howard: Does the Foreign Secretary not appreciate that the rule of law in this matter includes a discretion for the Home Secretary to take into account factors such as those that I mentioned, before authorising a warrant? On what conceivable basis does the Foreign Secretary allege that it would be improper to ask the Spanish Government whether they, as opposed to one judge, want General Pinochet to be extradited?

Mr. Cook: It is a matter for the Spanish legal authorities to decide whether to proceed with this, just as it is a matter for the British courts to decide how to proceed on it. Of course, areas of discretion are available to the Home Secretary after due process and after the matter has been before the courts. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is really saying that there were occasions when, in secret, he squashed a warrant for extradition, he should tell the House when it was.

European Union Enlargement

7. Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): What progress has been made in simplifying the process for those countries seeking to join the European Union. [54291]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): The European Union agreed a clear and inclusive enlargement process at Luxembourg last year. Britain has played a key role in pushing forward that process, which was launched during our presidency. It remains on track, and will bring the applicant countries into the Union as soon as they are ready for the demands and the obligations of membership.

On 9 November, the Commission will report on the progress made by all the countries seeking to join. The following day, substantive talks are due to start with the six applicants already in accession negotiations.

Dr. Naysmith: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Following the Foreign Secretary's recent visit to Bulgaria and Romania, is there any progress to be reported on their meeting the criteria for membership?

Ms Quin: Yes, indeed. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had a useful visit, which included Bulgaria and Romania, and there is no doubt that the prospect of EU membership is a great stimulus in those countries to produce reforms. We welcome some of the progress that they have already made and look forward to further progress in due course.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Does the Minister accept that part of the process towards enlargement necessarily involves questions of democracy? Does she further accept that the whole process of proportional representation, as expressed by a leading politician in The Times on 16 October, clearly shows that proportional representation is regarded by those in the Czech Republic as unhealthy, inequitable and leading to the blackmail of the larger parties by the smaller parties, as in Israel, and to dissatisfaction, as exists in New Zealand? Will the Minister therefore accept that, whether with regard to the Westminster system of democracy in Britain or the process of European elections, the whole concept in principle of proportional representation is objectionable, for the reasons that I gave?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I have forgotten what the hon. Gentleman said.

Ms Quin: It certainly was an elaborate supplementary which took us some way away from the enlargement process. Despite that, however, I agree that democracy is a tremendously important—indeed, essential—part of the candidacy of any country for accession to the EU. But with regard to election systems, existing EU members have a variety of systems, and nothing in the enlargement process would alter that.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Has the Minister had an opportunity to consider the impact of the recent elections and referendum in Latvia and the general election in Slovakia? Does she agree that they justify including those countries in the fast-track process of enlargement, especially given that the Latvian impediment was its relationship with the Russian minority, which has been resolved by the consequences of the referendum result?

Ms Quin: The application of each country needs to be regarded on its merits. Like my hon. Friend, I very much welcome the result of the referendum that took place in Latvia and the recent encouraging signs in the Slovakian election results. They show that coming closer to the European Union can stimulate democracy and respect for human rights and ethnic minorities. I very much welcome that.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Is the Minister aware of the news that, during the past week, Greece has placed fighter planes in Cyprus for the first time ever, and that, in January, the Greek Cypriot Government intend to bring in Russian missiles manned by Russian personnel? Is the European Union wise to absorb those problems into the Union before a settlement in Cyprus?

Ms Quin: We regard the accession process in Cyprus as an important factor in applying pressure for a settlement of the Cypriot problem and uniting the island. That is tremendously important. However, we do not want a build-up of weapons in a volatile part of the world, which is why we have expressed serious reservations about missiles in Cyprus.

Agenda 2000

8. Mr. Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough): When he last met his European counterparts to discuss Agenda 2000 and enlargement. [54292]

15. Ms Rosie Winterton (Doncaster, Central): When he last met his European counterparts to discuss Agenda 2000 in relation to enlargement. [54299]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): I last met my European counterparts to discuss Agenda 2000 issues at yesterday's General Affairs Council in Luxembourg.

Mr. Ennis: I thank the Minister for her reply. Is she aware that the current gross domestic product per capita in South Yorkshire is only 75 per cent. of the European average? Is she further aware that in my constituency that figure falls to 65 per cent? Does she agree that, if this country is successfully to regenerate the most economically deprived regions, it must negotiate extremely hard to try to maximise the amount of European regional assistance that comes to this country under Agenda 2000?

Ms Quin: I very much support my hon. Friend's comments. We generally support the criterion of 75 per cent. of GDP as the threshold for European regional assistance. European funds have already been used to effect in regenerating certain areas of the British economy. We are keen to see that process continue, as it rebounds on the efforts of those regions to the credit of both Britain and the European Union.

Ms Rosie Winterton: Is my hon. Friend aware that the rail port in my constituency of Doncaster provides rail freight services from the north of England to Europe? Does she agree that, to protect the environment and regenerate areas like South Yorkshire, the development of European rail links should be a high priority in any discussions on Agenda 2000 and European Union enlargement?

Ms Quin: I very much agree with my hon. Friend that transport infrastructure is a vital part of the economic development of a region. European transport links make a great deal of sense in the context of the European Union's structural funds and European efforts generally to promote economic development.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the Minister tell the House why so little progress is being made on the financial and other reforms which will be essential if the European Union is to be successfully enlarged? Is it because her Government, and other centre left Governments within the EU, are still obsessed with yesterday's backward-looking agenda of a Europe which is uniform, not diverse; rigid, not flexible; and deeper, not wider?

Ms Quin: The basic premise of the hon. Gentleman's question is simply incorrect. Good progress is being made towards the Agenda 2000 timetable, as was evident from our discussions in Luxembourg yesterday, which ranged over all the issues involved in the negotiations, including financial and budgetary ones.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Does the Minister think that assurances given during enlargement negotiations can be kept to? I have in mind the assurances made by Spain, when it joined the European Union, about its treatment of Gibraltar. Spain is now attacking Gibraltar's fishing rights as well as its border rights, as always. Can she assure us that she takes these matters into account in the discussions on enlargement, and that the Spanish Government will be told, yet again, that they should keep to their assurances over Gibraltar?

Ms Quin: It is certainly important that, in enlargement negotiations, undertakings that are given are implemented in practice. Indeed, a range of mechanisms has been put in place to make sure that the progress of existing applicants can be monitored through all the different chapters of the accession negotiations. In respect of Gibraltar, the hon. Gentleman might like to know that we recently protested strongly about increased delays at the border. As a result, those delays have been greatly reduced.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): When my hon. Friend last met her European counterparts to discuss enlargement, was any attention given to the question of Cyprus being admitted to the European Union as an occupied country, in light of the view held by some of our EU partners that the idea of EU membership as a catalyst to a peace settlement appears to have failed?

Ms Quin: In the General Affairs Council, we have said clearly that we believe that the accession negotiations regarding Cyprus remain an important pressure on reaching a settlement and reunifying the island. That is our view, and we have put it forward strongly. We believe that the accession negotiations represent a real opportunity to make progress, however difficult the problems are.

European Union Enlargement

9. Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): If he will make a statement on progress in the EU enlargement process. [54293]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): Britain negotiated the launch of the enlargement process during our presidency, and progress in the accession talks has been good. We expect that next month, we can move from the screening process to substantive negotiations with six of the candidate countries.

Last week, I visited two other candidate countries—Bulgaria and Romania—whose Governments both expressed their warm appreciation of Britain's support for the enlargement of the European Union.

Mr. Boswell: Enlargement in due course is clearly essential for the applicant countries, and much in the interests of this country and of existing member states.

Mr. Cook indicated assent.

Mr. Boswell: I am pleased to have the Foreign Secretary's acknowledgement of that. Would he resist firmly any further moves towards gratuitous deepening of the Community, on the ground that, if applicant countries already have enough difficulty keeping their footing through the existing acquis communautaire, any further impositions might put them out of their depth altogether?

Mr. Cook: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point that we should remember that enlargement is also in the interest of the existing member states. It will make the European Union larger, give it greater potential for prosperity and greater clout in world trade talks, and enable us to deal with cross-border problems, such as the environment and cross-border crime. This is not simply a matter of altruism towards the applicant countries—it is in our interest, too—but it is not the case that the applicant countries would oppose what the hon. Gentleman referred to as further deepening. They want to become members of a full, strong Europe, with integration where necessary and decentralisation wherever possible.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, South): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the five eastern European accession countries, with 63 million people and a gross domestic product of about 400 billion ecu, represent a major addition to the European Union economy and a major opportunity for British companies to extend their home markets? Will he, in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Industry, review the substantial information that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has on markets and market opportunities in those countries, and ensure that it is available to British businesses, especially small and medium-sized enterprises, because too few of them are approaching the FCO about such opportunities at the moment?

Mr. Cook: I have just returned from Bulgaria and Romania. I was struck not only by the opportunity for investment and trade in those countries, but by their desperate need for that investment and trade. Enlargement offers us an economic opportunity, but we must recognise that we cannot maintain a Europe that, although no longer divided by an iron curtain, is divided into the rich nations of the European Union and the poor countries at our gates. That is not sustainable, and we shall suffer from the pressures from illegal migration, the drugs trade and other problems that come from poverty. It is in our interests to assist those countries to achieve our prosperity.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Does the Foreign Secretary really believe that deepening integration, increasing spending and moving towards tax harmonisation and a European army—all of which were agreed in Austria last weekend—will help the enlargement process? Is it not clear that there can be deepening or widening of the European Union, but not both? Does he accept that his statement in August that seems even more ludicrous now than it did then?

"Maastricht was a high water mark of integration"

Mr. Cook: The right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot complain about the response in Kosovo and yet refuse to apply that lesson for Europe's security. That is exactly what the Prime Minister was drawing to the attention of the leaders of Europe when they met in Pörtschach.

I am not sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to achieve any kind of Europe, but if he wants to build a Europe that is decentralised and that observes the principle of subsidiarity, he should welcome the fact that the debate on the future of Europe was started by Britain. We are focusing on achieving the right balance between decisions on cross-border issues that must be taken in Brussels and decisions on issues that are better taken within member states. The Government are promoting a balance between integration where necessary and decentralisation where possible.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I welcome the Foreign Secretary's comments on enlargement. What assessment has been made of the challenges and opportunities that enlargement will bring, and of the adequacy of existing EU structural funds? Decisions may need to be taken about extending the scope of such funds.

Mr. Cook: There are substantial programmes to assist countries that are preparing for membership. The pre-accession funds are generous. Yesterday, in the General Affairs Council, we agreed on re-allocation as applicant countries become full members. Structural funds will be available to them as full members. That is why it is important that we proceed with the reform of not just the structural funds, but the common agricultural policy to ensure that we can afford enlargement and that the resources of the European Union go where they can best be used.

Dubai

11. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): If he will make a statement about UK relations with Dubai. [54295]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): Our relations with Dubai are good. As an indicator of that, our trade statistics with Dubai show that in 1997, United Kingdom exports were worth more than £900 million.

Mr. Swayne: The trade with Dubai affords tremendous opportunities for British business based on our expertise, experience and the competitiveness of our tenders. Does the Minister agree that our relations with Dubai stand to be damaged by the continued detention of George Atkinson? What representations will the Minister make to the Government of Dubai consequent on the decision by the United Nations working group on arbitrary detention to describe Mr. Atkinson's detention as "arbitrary"?

Mr. Fatchett: I welcome the first part of the hon. Gentleman's comments, particularly his reference to the competitiveness of British exports in the middle east. It is good to hear him talking in those terms, unlike many of his colleagues, and I welcome his comments.

We continue to make representations on Mr. Atkinson's behalf. The hon. Gentleman has been vigilant in his support for his constituent. We shall continue to liaise with him, with Mr. Atkinson's family and with the authorities in Dubai, and we shall take up the points that have been made about Mr. Atkinson's detention.

Biological and Chemical Weapons

12. Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead): What representations he has made to his United States counterpart to try to achieve that country's agreement to ensure compliance with biological and chemical weapons treaties. [54296]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): We are in regular dialogue with the United States on all aspects of the implementation of the biological and chemical weapons conventions. I am pleased to report that the United States has passed legislation to implement the chemical weapons convention.

Mr. Cohen: That is news to me.

Is the Minister aware of the danger that will be posed to the international regime against chemical weapons if the United States drags its feet in implementing legislation? Is he saying that call inspections will now be possible in factories where chemicals are handled? I understand that the lack of such inspections is blocking call inspections in other countries.

Can the Minister tell us something about the biological treaty negotiations in Geneva? Hopefully, the United States will not drag its feet in that regard.

Mr. Lloyd: I am pleased to say that the United States Congress recently ratified legislation allowing precisely the type of challenge inspection that my hon. Friend has described. There is now no possibility that other countries can hide behind the supposed reluctance of the United States, which is now complying with the chemical weapons convention. We welcome that, having played our part by making our views known to the United States Government and Congress.

I remind the House that, in his new year message and more recently at the United Nations, President Clinton spoke in favour of the biological weapons convention. That is a positive sign. The United States is already a signatory. What we are all working towards now—at least, those of us who are working with good will—is the certainty that the same challenge regime exists for biological as for chemical weapons. That would be a signal achievement for the world. We have already banned a whole class of chemical weapons of mass destruction, legally at least. If we can do the same in regard to biological weapons, and implement the ban, we shall have taken a significant step for all mankind.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Was it not a piece of barefaced cheek for the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) to point the finger of accusation at the United States in relation to treaties banning biological weapons? The United States, like this country, signed the treaty to ban biological weapons in 1972, and President Yeltsin admitted in 1992 that for 20 years—as we in the west had suspected—the Soviet Union had been flagrantly breaching the treaty. If accusations of that kind are to be made, should not the hon. Gentleman direct them at the Russians, who, even now, have not cleaned up their act in this respect?

Mr. Lloyd: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like me to go a little beyond party political rhetoric, and stick to the substance of his question. He is right: the United States was one of the signatories of the 1972 treaty, which was an important step forward. Britain's record is good in this regard, and I must pay tribute to what the previous Government did in respect of chemical weapons, although perhaps they did less in respect of biological weapons. As a House and as a country, we should hold firmly to the view that all nations should sign and ratify both treaties.

Kashmir

13. Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): What recent discussions Her Majesty's Government have had with representatives of the Indian and Pakistani Governments, regarding Kashmir. [54297]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): We have had a number of discussions with representatives of India and Pakistan on regional security issues, including the question of Kashmir.

Mr. Pike: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is understandable that there is worldwide concern about the increasing tension between Pakistan and India over the Kashmir problem, especially following the nuclear tests carried out by both countries earlier this year? Does he hope that the talks that started last week, which will be resumed in the new year, will lead to an end to the problem? That is in the interests of people on both sides in Kashmir, and in the interests of India and Pakistan. Will my hon. Friend make it clear to both sides that, while there is a problem for those countries to solve, we will do all that we can to assist the achieving of that objective?

Mr. Fatchett: I agree with all that my hon. Friend has said. It is crucial that India and Pakistan are able to establish a sensible, constructive and peaceful bilateral relationship. We wish the talks well that started last week and had been preceded by discussions between the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan in New York. We hope that those discussions lead to measures that relate not just to Kashmir, but to other confidence-building issues and broader economic and security issues—but my hon. Friend is right. The south Asian sub-continent is a volatile area, and the question of Kashmir makes it that much more volatile. Hence the need for the discussions to be successful.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): Does the Minister of State recall that today is the 51st anniversary of the occupation of large parts of Kashmir by Indian forces? Therefore, does he not think that it would be a good day to confirm the United Kingdom's determination to bring Kashmir back on to the agenda of the United Nations Security Council, bearing in mind that there were resolutions from the Security Council in 1948, 1949 and 1957 calling for a plebiscite of the Kashmiri people on their future? Does he not think that that should be pressed for by Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. Fatchett: The international community is naturally concerned about the developments in relation to Kashmir and the threats that those pose for regional stability and security. The best current approach is through the bilateral talks between India and Pakistan. We wish those well. The obvious parties to resolve these difficulties are the two Governments. If they can come to an understanding, that is the best way for the peace of the area and for the people of Kashmir.

Argentina

14. Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): What plans he has to meet the President of Argentina to discuss UK-Argentine relations. [54298]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): The President of Argentina arrives on an official visit today. He will hold talks with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and me. He will address the City of London and the Confederation of British Industry, and lay a wreath in commemoration of those who fell in the Falklands war. This is the first visit to Britain by the President of Argentina since it became a modern democracy, and a welcome demonstration of the growing strength of relations between our two countries.

Mr. Foster: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is time to rebuild Britain's relationship with the new Government of Argentina? Will the Government use President Menem's visit to take forward our growing ties in trade and industry for the benefit of both our nations?

Mr. Cook: I assure my hon. Friend that we expect this visit to provide a further boost to the excellent commercial relationships that Britain and Argentina enjoy. President Menem will bring with him 100 leading Argentine business men and the contact with the CBI and the City will, I am sure, deepen those commercial ties.

It is also appropriate that we should recall that President Menem played no part in the Government of Argentina with whom we were at war two decades ago. At the time, he was in prison, where he was held for five years and tortured under that same regime. The fact that he is the President of Argentina shows how far it has come.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): In welcoming President Menem, personifying as he does the process of reconciliation and compassion in his country, will the right hon. Gentleman take heed of President Menem's wise counsel with regard to relations between both Argentina and the United Kingdom and Argentina and its neighbouring states? Therefore, could the right hon. Gentleman do nothing that will prejudice democracy within a state neighbouring Argentina, which had a very tense relationship with that country?

Mr. Cook: If I were to pursue the line of thinking in the hon. Gentleman's question, President Menem might justifiably be rather confused as to which country I thought he came from. First, however, I entirely endorse the hon. Gentleman's welcome for the reconciliation, which has been welcomed by most of the veterans of the Falklands war; secondly, of course, we will do nothing to undermine democracy in either Argentina or Chile; nor will we do anything to undermine the rule of law in Britain.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will my right hon. Friend tell President Menem of this country's undoubted good will towards Argentina now that it is a democracy, but make it clear that he should understand that it is important to allow the due process of law to take place regarding General Pinochet? That very process of law, I am glad to say, is being carried out in Argentina.

There should be an understanding that there can be no amnesty and no safe haven for mass murderers such as Pinochet.

Hon. Members: What about China?

Madam Speaker: Order. The question is about Argentina. I shall have something to say on these matters a little later. Does the Foreign Secretary want to make any response?

Mr. Cook indicated dissent.

Madam Speaker: I thought not.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The Foreign Secretary will be aware of the close links between Wales and Patagonia—links that came under considerable strain during the Falklands war—and that there is a well of good will in Argentina towards the United Kingdom and a desire to forge much closer relationships. Does he agree that the best safeguard for the Falklands is for such links to blossom and grow constructively?

Mr. Cook: I am well aware of those links. It is worth recalling that we have a deep and wide relationship with Argentina. For instance, British service men are currently working alongside Argentine service men to maintain the peace on the green line in Cyprus. If our service men can achieve that partnership, our politicians should seek to do so too. I fully agree that a healthy understanding between our two countries must be good for the Falkland Islanders in the long run.

Germany

16. Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): If he will make a statement on the impact of the German general election result on British–German relations. [54300]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): The United Kingdom has excellent relations with Germany and we look forward to developing them further with the new German Government. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I will meet the new German Minister for Foreign Affairs, Joschka Fischer, for discussions both tomorrow and on Thursday.

Mr. Bradshaw: Does my hon. Friend believe that the election of a fellow centre left Government in Bonn will help in our Government's task of repairing our damaged relations with Germany—relations that suffered so badly under the previous Government—and that the election result shows that it is entirely possible to have decisive political change under a system of proportional representation?

Ms Quin: As the German SPD belongs to our political family, we are, of course, pleased that it has won such support from the German electorate. We look forward to working closely with the new Government, and it is satisfying to note that the centre left seems to be so popular with European electorates. Perhaps Conservative Members would like to reflect on that trend.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): The Minister will be aware that the new German Government have already imposed a moratorium on an important joint arms programme, for the multi-role armoured vehicle. Defence relations are obviously an essential part of our relations. What is the new German Government's response to the Prime Minister's proposals for a change of policy on defence in Europe, which the House has not had the opportunity to hear?

Ms Quin: Chancellor Schröder complimented the Prime Minister on his contribution at Pörtschach, and felt that his proposals were a good basis for future discussions on that part of European policy. The Prime Minister's statement was welcomed generally as an important contribution to the debate of the heads of state.

Lockerbie

17. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): If he will make a statement on the progress of negotiations to resolve Lockerbie-related problems. [54301]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): Last August, I announced agreements with the Governments of the Netherlands and of the United States on the conditions under which we could hold a trial of the two accused in a Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands. The agreement has been endorsed in a unanimous resolution of the Security Council, and the Secretary-General of the United Nations is in discussion with Libya on the arrangements for the handover of the two accused.

We have been able since to respond positively to all the concerns raised by the Libyan legal team, with the exception of the demand that, if convicted, the two accused should not serve their sentence in a Scottish prison. If they are found guilty, we can see no valid reason why they should not serve sentence in the jurisdiction of Scotland, where the mass murder took place.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it not a matter of record that the Libyan Government have constantly said that it is up to the defence team to decide, from its point of view, the locus of serving a sentence, if there is one? Does he not therefore take encouragement from the fact that, as far as most of us know, the defence lawyers have not objected to the locus of Scotland in terms of a sentence, if any sentence is passed?

Mr. Cook: It is, indeed, the case that the defence lawyers have not expressed any view on where the accused should be held in prison. However, I should tell my hon. Friend that, before we made our offer last August, there was no statement from the Government of Libya expressing any concern about imprisonment in Scotland. That concern surfaced only after we had met their demand for a trial under Scottish law in a third country. We now expect Libya to oblige the Security Council resolution by surrendering the two accused for trial on exactly the same basis as that for which Libya itself has lobbied for a long time.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): As the Government of Libya have indicated in writing that they agree to the proposals, subject to some amendments, and as the British Government have said that there will be no amendments, is it not rather insulting to the House that the draft order setting out the proposals for the trial and the expenditure has been dealt with under a procedure entailing that the order cannot be discussed in the House? Does not the Foreign Secretary think that it would be appropriate for the House to debate the order and to be able to express a view on it? Does he not also agree that there is a case for quiet private discussions and flexibility, and that the issue could well be resolved very speedily?

Mr. Cook: The draft was passed by an Order in Council under the standard procedures for Orders in Council, and gives effect to a Security Council resolution, which has standing in international law. As for flexibility, the Libyan defence team has come up with no concern on which we have not been able to reassure it, except for the one matter of it wishing to dictate where the two accused might serve their sentence if convicted.

There is nothing to stop any hon. Member debating the issue. I rather wish that we were dealing with a regime that would allow the Libyan people to discuss it in the same open way.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I seek your guidance on a point of order of which I have given you notice? As you know, we have asked the Home Secretary to come to the House to make a statement on the position of General Pinochet. There are important questions to be asked, ranging from the handling of the case to the condition of General Pinochet himself.

The Home Secretary may feel himself inhibited in making such a statement by the proceedings currently taking place in the divisional court, which I understand will soon be completed. I think that it is important that the House should be able to hear a full statement on the case, given that it is being extensively reported in the media, not only in the United Kingdom but around the world. Could you confirm that, once the proceedings in the divisional court are concluded, there will be nothing to prevent the Home Secretary from coming to the House to make a statement?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Sir Norman. I know that Mrs. Clwyd has a similar point of order, which I shall take now.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Thank you, Madam Speaker. Further to that point of order, although I know that we have had a few little differences in the past, I was very surprised last night to receive from the Table Office a letter informing me that my early-day motion—which was signed by 75 of my colleagues, and expressed the opinion that we were pleased at Senator Pinochet's detention in Britain—had been suspended from the Order Paper. I am a little confused because, during Foreign Office Question Time, we have had quite an open discussion of the matter.

Why is it possible to express an opinion on the matter, one way or the other, during Question Time, whereas it is not possible to express an opinion on the Order Paper? I know that many more of my colleagues wanted to sign that particular early-day motion. I should therefore be glad if you could throw some light on the matter.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I should like to add to the observations expressed by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), in as much as I tabled an amendment to her early-day motion, to express the view that the Senator should be allowed to return to Chile to recuperate, and perhaps to receive there the extradition request from the Spanish authorities. I too received notice from the Table Office that my amendment had to be withdrawn.

You will recall that I sought to raise private notice questions on Monday and Thursday of last week on the Senator Pinochet affair. When the divisional court proceedings are over, will it be possible for hon. Members to table private notice questions on matters relating to the senator if there are important developments that require the House's urgent attention?

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: How many more points of order before I can respond?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. It should not be thought that it is only Opposition Members who would like the opportunity, if the rules permitted it, to discuss the Pinochet affair. As you may or may not know, I have been keen for such a debate to be held on the Floor of the House. The reason that I want it debated at the earliest opportunity, although I recognise the limitations set by our rules, is that many of us want to explain that Pinochet is a murderer and should be—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am dealing with a point of order. If the hon. Gentleman is expressing an opinion, I have no time for that at this moment. This is a serious matter.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose—

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that I have the feeling of the House about this matter. I have been in the House for some 25 years; I am very sensitive to its needs, and I try to respond.

I know that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) is concerned that he is inhibited from commenting in the House on matters that he has been widely asked to comment on outside. I know too that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) is frustrated, as other hon. Members no doubt are, that her early-day motion and those of others, along with amendments to them, relating to Senator Pinochet have been withdrawn from the Order Paper because the matter is now sub judice. I fully understand Members' concerns, but I must have regard to the rules of the House. I do not make the rules of the House; I simply carry them out until they are changed.

Our sub judice resolutions, which can be found in the Standing Orders of the House, require that there should be no comment on matters awaiting jurisdiction in the courts. A hearing is currently being held relating to the legality of the senator's arrest and, in due course, a court may have to decide whether the evidence against the senator is sufficient to warrant his trial in Spain. Hon. Members must therefore take care not to offend against the rule, which exists to avoid conflict between Parliament and the courts and to ensure that the judiciary and the courts remain, and are seen to be, free from political pressure.

I shall of course ensure that hon. Members are able to raise with Ministers in the House any matters relating to this issue as soon as it is in order to do so. I shall watch proceedings carefully and ensure that, when the proceedings in relation to the arrest and the extradition request are completed, the early-day motions are restored to the Order Paper. I can say no more at this stage.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: No. There are no further points of order on this. That is a very clear ruling. I shall take no further points of order on the matter.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. We were just told During Foreign Office questions by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), the reaction of Chancellor Schröder to the Prime Minister's proposals on European defence, proposals that Philip Webster of The Times has heard but which the House has not. Have you had any notice of a statement by the Prime Minister, the Foreign Office or, indeed, the Ministry of Defence on this matter?

Madam Speaker: No, I have had no indication that any statement is going to be made by any Minister on that matter today.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Of course, if it is on a different matter.

Mr. Howarth: May I just ask you—

Madam Speaker: Order. I have given a very clear ruling. I shall take no further points of order on this matter.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): On a fresh point of order, Madam Speaker. The weekend summit in Austria was described as informal, but it is nevertheless of considerable interest to the House. As it is a House of Commons matter, has there been any approach to you to suggest that there will be a statement by the Prime Minister on what took place? It has already been mentioned in a partisan manner by the shadow Foreign Secretary, who linked it with Chile. However, will the matter be separately debated by the House?

Madam Speaker: It is not a matter for me whether time is available for such a statement. If the Prime Minister or any Minister wishes to make a statement, I shall ensure that he or she can do so. In answer to the hon. Gentleman's question, I have had requests from other hon. Members for such a statement, but none has been forthcoming.

Adoption (League Tables)

3.39 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require local authorities to publish annual totals of numbers of children in care, numbers of children adopted and numbers of parents available to undertake adoptions; to require local authorities to provide the Secretary of State annually with a list of children in care, together with the length of time each child has been in care; and to require the Secretary of State to publish league tables of local authorities based on that information.

I am privileged to have support for the Bill from hon. Members on both sides of the House, including the members of the all-party children group; the chairman of the child abduction group; the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), who generously gave up his slot for this Bill, and the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

As we read today of young lives ruined by physical and sexual abuse, drug-taking and prostitution, many of us think, "Thank God that our children are not involved"; but surely all children matter. Perhaps the worst feature are the horrific statistics relating to children taken into care—those for whom the state has taken responsibility. We owe a special responsibility to them because they have no voice of their own.

Since my earlier ten-minute Bill on adoption, there has been another horrifying report to the House on the vicious abuse of children in another state-run children's home. Many workers in children's homes work intensely hard to do their best for very damaged children, but the overall statistics are extremely bleak. Children leaving care are 50 times as likely as other children to end up in adult prison. They are far more likely to be drug abusers. Perhaps most horrifyingly, girls in care have a one in four chance of being pregnant at some point during their time in so-called care. The evidence is that the rate of abuse of boys is almost the same.

We are failing the most vulnerable and defenceless members of our community, but there is one underrated institution that has a remarkable success rate—adoption. Studies from all over the world show how successful adoption is. Children from care who are adopted do much better not only than those who remain in care but than those returned from care to their natural parents. Incredibly, children adopted from care, including badly damaged children, out-perform even those who remain with certain categories of natural family.

Numerically speaking, however, adoption has collapsed. Only 6,000 children were adopted in 1995, compared with 22,000 a generation ago. The most scandalous figure is that, last year, fewer than 2,000 children were adopted from care, out of more than 50,000 currently in care. The number of children in care has started to rise again, while the number of those adopted from care continues to fall year after year. There are many families who would love to give those children a loving home.

In an earlier ten-minute Bill, I proposed legally forcing local authorities to give priority to adoption in certain circumstances, and to give assistance to couples adopting. I greatly regret that there is not to be an adoption Bill, although I welcome the fact that the Under–Secretary of State for Health has taken the trouble to come and listen to my speech.

In August, a circular from the Department of Health called on local authorities to be more open to adoption. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides would endorse the circular, but it is no substitute for legislation. I fear that many local authorities will ignore it, as they did a similar circular from the Minister's predecessor, John Bowis, who was then the hon. Member for Battersea, leaving the most vulnerable children in our society as the losers.

My previous Bill was given a First Reading without a vote. I am grateful for the all-party support for this more modest measure. The aim of the Bill is to turn the aspirations of successive Ministers and of hon. Members on both sides into clear reality. By ensuring the compilation of more statistics, the Bill would expose those local authorities that are holding children back from adoption for ideological reasons. It would require local authorities to furnish the Secretary of State with a list of every child in care, saying how long it has been in care. Incredibly, despite the clear legal requirement, many such children have not even been furnished with proper care plans.

The Bill would further require the Department to publish, by local authority, not just the total number of children in care, but how long they have been in care, the total number deemed suitable for adoption, the number who have been adopted and the number of parents cleared by the local authority as suitable for adoption. According to the Government's recent circular, all that information should be provided to elected councillors. By forcing local authorities to provide it in a standard format to the Government—and hence to Parliament—the Government, Parliament and the public will be able to see which local authorities are dragging their feet. Lest there be any doubt that some local authorities are dragging their feet, I remind hon. Members that last year 50 local authorities had 10 or fewer children adopted from care. Indeed, a few did not have any children adopted from care in the most recent accounting period.

The Bill would help to expose the unnecessary suffering of children trapped in the care system when there are loving families who would love to give them a home. In my earlier measure, I sought to give the Secretary of State the power to intervene with local authorities that did not appear to be acting in the best interests of the children concerned and to hand over their adoption responsibilities to voluntary organisations. This Bill would at least make the information public, showing which were the local authorities concerned.

We have a large and growing number of children slipping through the cracks from care into crime, drug taking and child prostitution. We must move the emphasis from long periods in children's homes—and in the case of some local authorities, politically correct experiments in placements, some of which are transitory—to a higher proportion of adoption, which should be effected by married couples, in my opinion. That would offer thousands of children who are lost in and by the care system the prospect of a decent home and a better life.

The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) has courteously written to tell me that he intends to oppose the Bill, but does not intend to put the matter to a vote. I should like him to answer two questions. First, does he accept that some local authorities are actively opposing adoption? Secondly, if he does not accept that, how does he explain why some had no children adopted out of care last year and many others had so few—and how does he explain the continuing fall in the national total? The system is unsatisfactory. We all want a Bill to facilitate adoption, but in the meantime, does the hon. Gentleman believe that it is all the system's fault? If he wants to oppose the Bill, I ask him to give the House the opportunity to vote on it.

3.49 pm

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): I should like to oppose the Bill. In doing so, I commend the commitment of the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and applaud him for bringing the important subject of adoption to the House. He asked me two direct questions, which I shall try to answer. I would be surprised if any local authority were actively opposing adoption. Some individuals—perhaps influential individuals—may have got themselves into a position where such events have resulted.

Sometimes, as I want to explain, adoption has fallen by default. The situation in adoption services is very serious. Like the hon. Gentleman, I want them to improve and develop; I just do not think that this Bill is the proper way to achieve that. I do not want to press the matter to a vote at this stage, because the subject is very important and it is vital instead that we have a proper debate.

One of my worries about the Bill arises from the fact that adoption is not the only proper way of looking after children in care—or necessarily the best way. The majority of children who are looked after in care are returned home—many very successfully. Some children remain quite appropriately in long-term foster care, and some remain quite appropriately in long-term residential care. As has been said, it seems that, under the Bill, local authorities could be criticised for not having children adopted, even when a good assessment, a well worked care plan and the wishes and feelings of the children indicate some other solution.

I commend the desire for information, which we of course need. As has been acknowledged, much of the information that would be required under the Bill is routinely collected or is on its way to being collected. If we want to improve and develop adoption as a profoundly important way in which to help children in care—I think that both the hon. Member for Canterbury and I do—we need to collect more sophisticated information about needs and resources throughout the care system and evaluate outcomes for care-leavers, including those who were adopted, rather than take up the ideological position of thinking that it is always or invariably best to adopt. We need to empower young people to tell us what it is really like for them in care.

We need fundamental reform of the care system. I am so pleased that the Government have introduced the "quality protects" initiative. I also look forward to the response to the Utting report. The importance of this debate is that it helps to draw attention to the problems in adoption. I agree with the figures that have been quoted. Recent research by the British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering shows that the use of adoption has fallen from 2,800 instances in 1992 to 2,300 in 1996, and that adoption is primarily an outcome for very young children. Indeed, 90 per cent. of those adopted in 1996 were aged five or under. The research reports terrible delays in finding placements and between making those placements and achieving the adoption.

[Mr. Hilton Dawson]

The Government are addressing those issues. They have taken sensible steps in "Adoption: achieving the right balance" to reinforce what I, as a former practitioner, would regard as good practice: recognising the benefits of adoption while taking account of the significance of race, culture, religion and language, so as to ensure that children are not denied adoptive placements on such grounds; accounting sensitively for age, health and smoking factors; and giving priority to long-term planning and a regular review of services.

I was worried by the fact that the hon. Member for Canterbury allowed comments about ideology and about political correctness to creep into his speech. Such thinking is not prevalent in social services departments.

Although local authorities should be accountable, league tables are wholly inappropriate for a complex, subtle, highly professional process, carefully assessing the individual child, balancing the needs of siblings, trying to keep families together, weighing the importance of contact with birth families, matching needs with the perceived qualities, abilities and experience of prospective adoptive families and, above all, trying to look into the future and work out how things will develop, perhaps a decade ahead. It may be a controversial view in the House, but I believe that there are a great many excellent social workers; they need to be encouraged and supported in good practice in complex and difficult human situations instead of being hit over the head with crude and misleading league tables.

The hon. Member for Canterbury referred to the lack of an adoption Bill; I entirely agree that one is needed. I am sorry that other aspects of his proposal today missed their opportunities. I should like to push the Government a little more. On Tuesday 20 October, in the House, the British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering launched their adoption action plan. It is very good stuff. Some of it has been around for a very long time. We need a new Adoption Act. In 1996, a draft Bill on adoption received support from both sides of the House. A new Act could clarify the status of adoption in line with the Children Act 1989, in England and Wales. Other parts of Great Britain have already done so.

We need national standards for adoption services, to help improve practice across the board. We need performance indicators. We need ethnic monitoring of children in care and the adoption opportunities available to them. We need a national register of prospective adopters, so that people in one part of the country need not wait ages when children from another part might easily and properly be placed with them.

We need paid adoption leave for adoptive parents. That is so important in forming that vital bond early. We need adoption allowances, so that couples who are fostering children successfully are not financially penalised if they make the greater commitment to adopt them. Crucially, support services need to be provided for adoptive families after adoption.

Although the Bill is well meaning, it misses fundamental points. In the past 12 months, there have been signs that the Government have the potential to be a great reforming Government for children in care. Some good steps were taken in the recent Adoption Agencies and Children (Arrangements for Placement and Reviews)(Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1997, but the Government can do more. We could all do more, so let us do it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Julian Brazier, Mrs. Llin Golding, Mr. David Davis, Mr. Bill Olner, Sir Sydney Chapman, Mr. Malcolm Wicks, Mr. Andrew Rowe, Mr. Frank Field, Mr. Laurence Robertson, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Mr. John Burnett and Mr. Christopher Fraser.

ADOPTION (LEAGUE TABLES)

Mr. Julian Brazier accordingly presented a Bill to require local authorities to publish annual totals of numbers of children in care, numbers of children adopted and numbers of parents available to undertake adoptions; to require local authorities to provide the Secretary of State annually with a list of children in care, together with the length of time each child has been in care; and to require the Secretary of State to publish league tables of local authorities based on that information: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 249].

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

NUMBER OF MEPs, ELECTORAL REGIONS AND ELECTORAL SYSTEM

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 1, leave out ("a registered party, or").

3.59 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, That this House does disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 4.

Mr. Straw: As the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) and I have said many times, it is the Government's fundamental belief that an electoral system should be appropriate to the nature and function of the body that it is electing. In the case of the European Parliament, the Government believe that the simple regional list system—some people call it the closed list system—is the most appropriate way for the voters of Great Britain to elect their Members of the European Parliament.

I shall not, unless tempted—this is a serious warning to my hon. Friends—go over much old ground on the pros and cons of proportional representation, multi-Member regions, or the size and composition of those regions. [Interruption.] I believe in regions. I am strongly committed to regions.

I am pleased to see the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) in his place. Since he debated the issue with me—there is no linkage here—the scope of the debate has narrowed. Over the course of almost a year, this House and the other place have agreed that the next elections to the European Parliament should take place under a regional list system. What we are now considering is the fascinating and important question of what kind of regional system should be used.

You, Madam Speaker, are one of the experts on electoral systems. You will know, as others may not, that there are basically three types of list system—closed, semi-open and open. As originally drafted, the Bill provided for the first of these—a closed list system.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): Semi-open.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) mutters from the Front Bench, but I have a feeling that he did not want to hand over the baton as shadow Home Secretary until after we had debated the merits of the semi-open list—namely, the Belgian list.

Sir Norman Fowler: We have got that.

Mr. Straw: Very good. I shall deal with the Belgian list in a moment, even if not tempted.

When I first presented the Bill to the House, it contained the proposal for a closed list system. The amendments that have been made in the other place provide for the last of those three systems—a fully open system. I shall explain, especially to hon. Members who support the open system, how it would work. Sometimes, as is said in the Guinness advertisements, things are not always as they appear.

For a party which, I am told, is united on first past the post, if it is united on nothing else, I must explain that the result of its proposal will be eccentric in the extreme, and will not lead to the horses that get first past the post actually winning the seats. Indeed, some of the old nags who saw the vet the previous day and who are way behind the first in the field will win the seats in the European Parliament. I wonder whether that was the intended result. I shall explain how that will arise, then I shall be happy to take questions.

Under the open list system, an elector casts his vote for a particular candidate on a party's list, or for an independent candidate. What the voter cannot do is cast his or her vote for the party's list as a whole.

With the regional list system, we are not dealing with a standard first-past-the-post multiple vacancy system of the kind that Labour Members knew and loved during the 18 years of opposition, which was called the shadow Cabinet electoral system. That also produced some eccentric results, of which I suppose I am an example, but the one thing that it did not produce, except in respect of those four women's places, was an outcome where someone who received more votes did not get elected and someone who received fewer votes did get elected. That will be the result of the proposed system.

The voter will have one vote and may cast it for an independent candidate or for one of, say, the 10 or 11 Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat candidates on the list. What the voter cannot do is to cast his vote for the party as a whole. The hybrid semi-open system is the Belgian system, which we debated at some length and which is not before the House today. However, I shall elaborate on that system if I am asked to do so.

The votes received by each candidate on a party list are first added together to give the party's total number of votes. That figure is used to determine how many seats a party has won. I do not need to remind the House that the method used to determine how many seats a party has won by was devised by our old friend, that famous Belgian Victor d'Hondt.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): Whatever happened to him?

Mr. Straw: I think that he died—he went the way of all flesh. By the way, I have a feeling that "d'hondt" means "dog" in Flemish. Some might say that we have been dogged by the d'Hondt divisors.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): It is obvious that Mr. d'Hondt's name drove him to an untimely demise—and it will no doubt do the same to us. According to the Home Secretary's comments, under the open list system, a person votes for only one candidate, and that gives rise to all sorts of peculiarities. Would it not be possible to arrange that, if a person votes for a particular candidate, that is also his or her preference within the party? That would give the candidate an added vote in the final count, and would allow a person to vote for the list. That is surely not beyond the wit of man.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is entirely correct in saying that that is not beyond the wit of man or woman. In fact, it is, roughly speaking, the Belgian system. The only problem is that that is not the system before the House for which the other place voted. The other place voted for a wholly open system—

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The Finnish system.

Mr. Straw: I rest my case. Finland is a wonderful place, but a third of Finns do not understand the Finnish language.

The other place voted for the open list system, which produces slightly odd results. Under that system, one aggregates all the votes cast for candidates of a particular party. Therefore, one adds up all the votes cast for Conservative, Labour and Liberal Democrat candidates and so on. That produces the total number of votes cast for the parties and one then uses a d'Hondt divisor to calculate how many of the 10 or 11 vacancies in the region will go to each party.

The seats are allocated in the order of the votes received. That means that, if a party wins three seats in a region, those seats will be allocated to the three candidates who won the most votes among candidates of their party. However, this is where the system becomes slightly eccentric. For example, there may be one very strong candidate on a party list—I shall pick at random the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield. There may also be several unknown candidates on the party list. I choose, by way of further example—there will be complete approbation on this point—the Whips, who are faceless, who never speak and whose constituencies I have forgotten. That applies on both sides of the House.

So there is one strong, very well-known party candidate on the list and several other candidates who are not known at all—as they say, they are not even household names in their own households. Let us suppose that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield receives 100,000 votes in that region.

Mr. John M. Taylor: He would get more than that.

Mr. Straw: His hon. Friend, the speechless Whip, says that the right hon. Gentleman would get more votes than that. For the sake of argument, we shall say that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield receives 1 million votes—I think that that is reasonable in the circumstances. Let us assume—I do not want my example to get too complicated, Madam Speaker—that there are just five vacancies in that region, and the other four candidates each receive 200,000 votes. It will be quickly realised that the Conservative party has received 2 million votes, and, in this region in my entirely hypothetical example, has done better than the other parties. Therefore, it wins three out of the five vacancies, because the other parties received fewer than 2 million votes.

Then we allocate the three seats to the three Conservatives. It has happened that, as well as one Conservative getting 1 million votes and the others getting 200,000 each—my arithmetic was wrong, because there would have to be six candidates if there were to be 2 million votes altogether. By the way, this is a simple system. It is the simple closed system. It happens that there are some medium-strong candidates on our side, the Labour side. The obvious such candidate is my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who I suggest gets 800,000 votes. The process would go on, with another of my hon. Friends getting 500,000 votes and the rest getting fewer than 200,000.

Under this system, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield fairly gets elected and gets one of the seats. However, the next two seats are not awarded to the candidates who in the round have more votes than the faceless Whips. The seats go to a couple of candidates who each secured 200,000 votes. There are others who have 400,000 or 500,000 votes who do not get elected. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow is elected, and someone else who gets 600,000 votes is elected. There are the other three who get fewer votes—say, 300,000 each. The aggregate of those comes to fewer than 2 million votes.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Straw: Of course I will. I will give way shortly.

The electors will say, "This is rather odd." By the way, I agree that it is rather odd. I modestly suggest that the electors will say—I understand that the Conservative party is backing this arrangement—"This is particularly odd for a party which otherwise has been consistently in favour of first past the post."

I have excited a little interest, and at this stage I will give way to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh).

Miss McIntosh: I hope that on this occasion I can assist the Home Secretary and avoid the scenario of dog eating dog that is pervading the Chamber. Missing from the right hon. Gentleman's scenario—he has spoken eloquently, and we have all enjoyed hearing it—is the electors' choice. Does the right hon. Gentleman not share my concern that the greatest handicap of changing the system on 10 June next year is that, for the first time ever, the elector will be prevented from voting for a mainstream candidate from one of the major parties in the election system as we know it? This will lead to massive confusion, and possibly a record number of spoilt ballot papers.

Mr. Straw: I shall answer that point seriously, because I think that it deserves a serious answer. My judgment is that we end up with less voter choice, paradoxically, under the open system than under the closed system.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): What?

Mr. Straw: If what the Conservative party were putting forward—[Interruption.] I shall give way, but I should like to develop this point.

If it were being proposed that there were as many votes as there were vacancies, the hon. Member for Vale of York would be right, and the open system would be the appropriate one. We can argue then about the problem of proportionality if we have the first-past-the-post system in a multi-Member constituency. We can argue whether there should be ranking in order or in some other way, but the hon. Lady would be right. If each voter was allowed to vote for every person on the list, there would for sure be greater voter choice. We would also end up with the situation in which the candidates getting the most votes would win. I happen to think that that is rather an important principle, which we have to stick by.

Under the closed list system, I think that there will be a good degree of choice. It is the choice of a party. When I stand in Blackburn, I stand as the Labour candidate. If people want to vote Labour, they must vote for me. Let none of us believe that, if we stood simply as the J. Straw party, we would get the same number of votes. That has been tried once or twice. I remember S. O. Davis, who was a legend in his lifetime—[Interruption.] I shall give way in a moment. S. O. Davies tried it, as have many others. The truth is that we get to this place because of our party backing. If that were taken away, most of us would not be here. That would almost certainly include me. The closed list system gives clarity and a degree of fairness.

We are debating not the merits of various systems but the proposition that came to the House from the other place, which I am trying to point out has serious defects from the point of view of the principles which the Conservative party holds dear.

4.15 pm

With one vote, voters must plump for one of, say, in larger regions, 10 candidates. Either they will go for the person who is top of the list alphabetically—that discriminates heavily against those of us who are at the bottom of the list, which is always my explanation of how I came near the bottom in the shadow Cabinet elections; another explanation was the well-informed electorate, and a third was the fact that I could not properly explain the regional list system—or, and this is much more important and a good deal of research evidence shows it in multi-member wards in local elections, they vote for the white male, and they certainly do not vote for anyone whose name sounds foreign and may be Asian.

The truth is that most of the candidates in most of these regions—it was also true for the European elections under the single-Member constituencies—are known to only a small minority of their electorate. We know that to be the case, and there will be no change between the new and the old systems, because the number of MEPs, however good they are, who could conceivably develop a connection with their electorate so that they could have a personal vote, is tiny.

It is not true that voters will be informed about the relative merits of the candidates. What they are informed about is the relative merits of the parties.

Dr. Marek: My right hon. Friend got to the truth of the problem when he said that it was a choice for the party. In the case of Labour, it has been a choice for the Labour party centrally. Does he know that in Wales a candidate was put on the list who ordinary Labour party members did not know was in contention and who was not being considered, and it was a complete surprise to all of us in north Wales when the list was produced? It is difficult to find any Labour party member in north Wales who will help in the European Parliament election next June. That is the problem with the closed list.

Mr. Straw: I am aware of the case. I have just been briefed. I have refreshed my memory. Actually, I do now remember the case. We are debating a system which should apply by law for voters. We are not debating, although I am happy to do so if you, Madam Speaker allow me, the merits or otherwise of the Labour party's internal system.

I simply say that, because of our unrivalled act of generosity in putting forward this system of proportional representation, which will be put into effect next June—never before in Britain's history has a party voluntarily given up quite a large number of seats to its erstwhile opponents, but we are doing so—we have more MEPs than, even with the kind of result that we had at the last election, could be elected under the new system. That has meant some personnel management as we downsized the cadre. That, in turn, has created difficulties.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The principal factor in the scenario that the Home Secretary has painted is not the openness of the list but the operation of the d'Hondt formula. That formula is coincidental to the amendment, but is at the heart of the system that he proposes. To take the right hon. Gentleman back to his opening remarks that the electoral system must be appropriate to the body that is being elected, is he suggesting that, because the European Parliament is not really a Parliament, we can afford a barking electoral system to elect it? If so, those on this Bench might find it attractive.

Mr. Straw: If we are to have multi-Member constituencies, we must work out a way of dividing the vacancies among the parties. One way of proceeding is to give electors as many votes as there are vacancies. Electors vote either by marking a cross or by choosing a number between one and, say, five, and the computer does the rest. However, that is not what we are discussing here today. I doubt whether that kind of proportional representation would be acceptable to the Conservative party.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Straw: I shall in a second.

If there are fewer votes than vacancies, one must use some form of mathematical divisor, whether it is an open list, a semi-closed or an entirely closed system. That is not directly relevant to the merits of the case that we are discussing today. My comradely advice to the Conservative party about its future self-interest is that it is well served by the d'Hondt system. Indeed, that is the only reason that I proposed it.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Would the Home Secretary be kind enough to remind the House of the content of the excellent document that he once wrote for the national executive of the Labour party, in which he criticised not only the closed system of PR but every other system?

Will the Home Secretary now respond to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek)? There seem to be two problems. Under the closed system, those who decide who the Members of the European Parliament will be are not the electorate but a small panel within each individual party. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham said, that problem is made even worse within the Labour party, because those who decide on the candidates are not the members, through one person, one vote, but a panel of about a dozen people. My predecessors, Aneurin Bevan and Michael Foot, would not have been acceptable, because their views would have been too radical and too socialist, and because they were too dissenting.

Mr. Straw: As far as I recall, the excellent tract that I wrote applied to the Westminster Parliament. We are dealing with horses for courses.

Mr. Llew Smith rose—

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend has asked a series of questions, and I wish to deal with them. He asked how each party decides on the make-up of its list. That is not this House's responsibility.

Mr. Smith: The Home Secretary raised the issue.

Mr. Straw: As I said, it is not a matter for the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) asked what had happened in the Labour party system, and I have sought to respond.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham asked about internal party democracy only in response to the point which the Home Secretary raised on that very matter.

Mr. Straw: I think that the record will show otherwise.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall allow my hon. Friend to intervene, and then I shall get on with my speech.

Mr. Prentice: I do not want to labour the point, but, as the Home Secretary acknowledges, under the closed list system, real power transfers to the party. If we are to have a closed list system, we need a completely transparent system of inner-party democracy so that Labour party members realise why a candidate has been selected to represent the party at the European elections.

It is invidious to name names, but I shall do so. My Member of the European Parliament, Mark Hendrick, whom the Home Secretary knows well, is sixth on the list in the north-west. We will win that sixth seat only if the result in next year's European parliamentary elections replicates the good result that we had in the north-west in the general election last year, when Labour took 54 per cent. of the vote.

Mr. Straw: I know that my hon. Friend will work hard for that result, as will the rest of us.

If we have a regional list system, we must have a system for establishing the ranking for each party. I appreciate some of the concerns of my hon. Friends about the way that the arrangements have worked out within the Labour party, but they have worked out in that way—I do not make a joke of this at all—principally because of the circumstance in which we have had to manage difficult change. We are—as I have said, it is an act of most extraordinary generosity—in practice handing over to other parties seats which we would otherwise win, to support this principle of proportional representation.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): Does the Home Secretary accept that the electoral choice is purely at the margin in the system that he proposes? Of the 87 MEPs to be selected to represent the United Kingdom, about 70 or 75 will know whether they will be elected or not before the election even gets under way. Therefore, it is at the margin—at No. 3 or No. 4 on a list of seven, or at No. 6 or No. 7 on a list of 11—where the only choice is to be made. The rest might just as well pack off and have an early holiday, or investigate the good restaurants in Strasbourg, whether they will be elected or not, and leave the handful who will be at the margin—on the cusp—of that choice to be selected by the electorate.

Mr. Straw: Things will not work like that, which is my point. Far from the open list system leading to serious voter choice, it will lead to completely arbitrary circumstances. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when I said this, but I do not believe for a second that the electorate will stand for circumstances in which candidate X, who gets 500,000 votes, is not elected, and candidate Y, who gets 300,000 votes, is elected. No one will understand that. The idea that we will give the best voter choice in circumstances in which the candidates are not known, and everyone accepts that, seems unreal to me.

There are other results. Not only regional-list-based elections for the European Parliament are determined at the margin; all elections are determined at the margin, always. Although the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) knew that his party was facing disaster, I guess that he assumed that, whatever happened, he would get elected. The same thing happened on our side in 1983. All elections are determined at the margin, but the open list system would also lead to candidates in a party competing not against the other party, but against one another.

Mr. Curry: My criticism was of the closed list system, which the Home Secretary is advocating. His point about the open list is that the other place has not changed it sufficiently, so we are locked into a system. He persistently talks about systems as if this Parliament were not competent to choose its own system.

May I take the Home Secretary's mind back to when this entire debate started, and we began the catalogue of what seems to be a protracted Belgian joke? He was urged to introduce a system under which there was genuinely open choice, but he declined to do so—after much hesitation, which was to his credit. We have now got ourselves stuck where he says that we have a choice between a cataclysm and a catastrophe. It seems that, whichever way the vote in the House goes, we will end up with an inexplicable system.

In the light of the Prime Minister's commitment to what I understand is supposed to be a Europe more relevant to its citizens, it is curious, if that is the Government's priority, that they have chosen the particular system that they have.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Before the Home Secretary replies, may I say to hon. Members on both sides of the House that interventions are starting to become extremely long? It would assist the debate if they were brief and to the point.

Mr. Straw: May I deal with the right hon. Gentleman's last point? He is generally supportive of matters European. The system we propose is used by the majority of European countries and the majority of European voters. That may not make it right, but it makes it more usual.

Mr. Swayne: The Government's system is as eccentric as those in the amendments.

Mr. Straw: The suggestion is that the proposed system is somehow eccentric, or an aberration. It is not: it is commonly used in the rest of Europe.

Dr. Godman rose—

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall give way to my two hon. Friends, and then I shall get on with my speech.

4.30 pm

Dr. Godman: May I correct what the Home Secretary said a few moments ago? He referred to this unparalleled act of generosity. He and his ministerial colleagues could argue that they were just as generous for the elections to the Scottish Parliament. Come next May, as a Scottish elector I shall have two votes: one for a candidate and one for a party. Reservations about the closed system similar to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) have been voiced in the west and south of Scotland.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is right. We have, to a slightly lesser extent—at least, I hope and pray so—been generous in the arrangements for Scotland, which will have an additional member system, as is proposed for Wales. We were committed to the regional list system: that was in our manifesto. For reasons which I need not go into now, we fought and won the election on that proposal. After the election, we brought forward the time for that change, and made it earlier. That was not fully anticipated in our manifesto.

Mr. Barnes: My right hon. Friend has so far produced two arguments against the amendments. He may have others, but he has been prevented from putting them, as there have been many interventions. One of the arguments is about members of the same party fighting against one another in a contest. That is the problem with the single transferable vote in a multi-Member constituency. The other argument is that, if three people are elected for a party, the person who finishes second or third may have fewer votes than a person who is not elected. The person who finishes bottom under the amended system may have been placed top on the central party list.

Mr. Straw: With an open list, it would be possible for someone to be elected who did not have the unanimous support of the politburo of the Conservative party, the Labour party or the Liberal Democrat party.

Dr. Godman: Or the Scottish National party.

Mr. Straw: Or the SNP.

The point about an open list is that it is not a ranked list: it is simply a list of candidates who have equality on the ballot paper—they are in alphabetical order—and it is supposed to be for the voters to put them in order. However, there is a fundamental problem. Some elected candidates may have fewer votes than candidates who are not elected, and it will unquestionably discriminate against women and people with foreign-sounding names—particularly Asian or Afro-Caribbean.

It has been accepted that I have given way a great deal. I should like to close my remarks.

Miss McIntosh: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on a point to correct his information?

Mr. Straw: No. The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East, says that there is no such thing as a point of information, but I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that I am giving loads of information.

The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) referred to my consideration of the Belgian list proposal. I said that I would think about it. We were criticised for thinking about it for too long, but it was important to think about it for a long time before coming to a view one way or another. Our judgment was finely balanced, and we came down against it.

Miss McIntosh: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: For the last time, and it really must be the last time.

Miss McIntosh: The Home Secretary will correct me if I am wrong, but my distinct understanding is that nine member states have open lists. I am at a loss to understand why we do not want to be with the majority and go for an open list.

Mr. Straw: I do not think that that is correct. If the Under-Secretary catches your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we will give full information, but I am sorry to say that I am tolerably certain that the hon. Lady is wrong. I refer her to the Library's briefing paper, which has a big chart at the back.

Under a closed list system, there is no prospect of an anomalous result. Nothing is hidden from the voter. When voters cast their vote for the party of their choice, they can see the order in which that party's candidates will win seats, and they vote with that knowledge. The open list system provided for by the amendments—we are not discussing perfect systems; we are discussing the amendment—is much more of a lottery for the voter. His vote will have two functions: to win seats for the party as a whole, and to win a seat for the particular candidate for whom he has voted. An elector who has voted for a candidate who is not elected may feel that he has wasted half his vote.

Under the closed list system, if the elector intensely dislikes candidates high on the list, he can do what can be done, in extremis, in any ordinary parliamentary election. If he really does not like the person who is standing as his party's candidate, he need not vote for that person. At the margin, we all have something of a personal vote, although I think that in only a few cases has that personal vote swung the result.

As has been said many times—this point should be noted by Opposition Members, and by certain of my right hon. and hon. Friends—the closed list system is essentially a first-past-the-post system, and first past the post is essentially a closed list system with a list of one. The closed list system has the great benefit of simplicity, which is a consideration that we should not ignore.

Let me quote from an academic source beloved of the Liberal Democrats, and one or two of my expert friends in the official Opposition. Professor Patrick Dunleavy and Dr. Simon Hix of the London school of economics, and Dr. Helen Margetts of Birkbeck college, said:

"Open list ballot papers are more complicated. The ballot paper will be much longer because all the candidates will have to be listed with ticked boxes. People may feel obliged to look over all the names, a lengthy business in the South East region where with 11 seats there could be 40 or more candidates . . . some people such as the elderly, those who have difficulty reading, first time voters, and people who are just attached to the existing way of doing things, may dislike the ballot paper or find it confusing".

I think that they will definitely find it confusing.

The document continues:

"A major study of voting systems carried out just after the 1997 general election (the Democratic Audit report, Making Votes Count) provided good survey evidence that British voters do not like complicated ballot papers with multiple names and tick boxes and strongly prefer simple short ballot papers."

All parties have been making, or indeed have made, arrangements to contest the next European parliamentary elections on the basis of a closed list system. Some of my hon. Friends have famously celebrated those new arrangements. Candidates for every party have already been selected, and are starting to campaign on that basis. I doubt that each party now wants to overturn all the arrangements, and start again with a different system.

No electoral system is perfect; all we can do is match the most appropriate electoral system to the body that it is being used to elect. We believe that, with the closed list system that was originally in the Bill, we have found the best match. I am not saying that it is the best system; I am merely saying that it is the best match. It is no coincidence that voters in Germany, France, Spain, Greece and Portugal use it to elect their MEPs.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): They follow a tyranny of the party list.

Mr. Straw: They constitute the majority of voters in Europe, and the majority will be even larger when we adopt the system. The hon. Gentleman seems to think that voters in Luxembourg should carry the same weight as voters in Germany. That is an interesting proposition.

Of course, the fact that the closed list system is used in those countries is not a reason in itself for us to adopt it, but it shows that we are not embarking on some constitutional innovation.

Mr. Cash: Does the Home Secretary remember a recent article in which Mr. George Jones of The Daily Telegraph disclosed some of the leaks from the Jenkins commission, which will report on Thursday? They revealed that, during a series of consultation exercises around the country, Lord Jenkins had been taken aback by the hostility towards the idea that introducing some form of proportional representation based on a list system—any list system—would increase party control. The people have shown that they do not like the party list system in any circumstances, be it open or closed.

Mr. Straw: It is dangerous for the hon. Gentleman to insinuate that the opinion of those who turn up to an open meeting of Lord Jenkins is somehow representative of the public as a whole. The hon. Gentleman could be hoist on a very large petard if he goes down that track. The British public have not had any experience of this system. It is not yet law; it is still a matter for Parliament to decide. Their experience will no doubt be informative, and will help to inform the wider debate on proportional representation.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: No. I must finish.

The Conservative party is coming to the House in support of an open list system, but I do not believe that it understands the consequences of that system for its party. Moreover, I hope that we are not going to have too many high-blown phrases about how the open list system is morally superior to a closed list system. I remind the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield, the shadow Home Secretary, that the closed list system was the one chosen by the government of which he was a member for the elections to the Northern Ireland forum.

The right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), then Prime Minister, said of the closed list system, which the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996 provided for:

"I believe that this is a fair and balanced system that will produce a representative outcome."—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 498.]

That was good enough for him when he was arguing for a closed list system, and it is good enough for us. Of the systems available, the closed list system will produce a fair and balanced system, and a representative outcome. I therefore commend to the House our motion to disagree with the Lords amendment.

Sir Norman Fowler: I do not think that that was one of the Home Secretary's more convincing performances. At one point, when about 20 Labour Members were here, it was a matter not so much of his trying to convince us as of his trying to convince them. He was obviously totally unsuccessful. Most of them have now fled, and I am not surprised. Even the Under–Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), looked rather doubtful by the end of the Home Secretary's speech. [Interruption.] He probably much prefers sitting through his master's speech half asleep—as he obviously is—to being woken up.

I will say this as a compliment to the Home Secretary: it is always interesting to hear a politician make a case in which he does not believe. It is clear that he did not have his heart in what he said. I am trying to be kind to him. It would be much worse if he believed all the stuff he was saying. If he does believe it, there is no excuse for the dismal case that he made.

As he waded through his script, the Home Secretary did establish one thing: he would not make a good returning officer. He set out his belief in the regions, but the House did not notice the same underlying belief in proportional representation. Nor am I remotely mollified by my endorsement as a popular Conservative candidate, which the right hon. Gentleman threw in halfway through.

Once more, the House of Lords has done us a service in allowing us to think again on a fundamental issue regarding next year's European elections. The Government have decreed that those elections will be carried out on the basis of a list system based on the regions. That is not the system that my party wants. I am a strong supporter of the first-past-the-post system and of the constituency base—and as far as I understand his position, so, frankly, is the Home Secretary—but that is not the choice that the House has before of it today.

The choice that we must make today is whether to support a closed list system where the party ranks the candidates in order of preference and the electors' only choice is which party to vote for, or an open list system, where the electorate have the opportunity to choose which candidates they want to elect.

Mr. Robathan: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Home Secretary, in his defence towards the end of his speech, said that he wanted to go back to the closed list for the convenience of the parties and, I suggest, the power of the parties? He did not like the fact that the party might lose power and be a bit inconvenienced through this amendment.

4.45 pm

Sir Norman Fowler: That is entirely the basis on which the argument is advanced—this is for the convenience of the party. What hon. Members on both sides of the House have to decide is what is convenient for, and the desire of, the public. The electorate matter most.

Given the choice before us—between the closed system and the open list system—I have no hesitation in saying that the House of Lords was entirely right to vote for the open list system. The alternative was put frankly—although it was not put as frankly by the Home Secretary—by the Minister in the other place, Lord Williams of Mostyn, who said:

"What we are doing here is offering to the voters a list of party supporters in a way which has been determined by internal party choice."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 20 October 1998; Vol. 593, c. 1329.]

That is on the record. Given that description, I am not surprised that the Lords voted as they did. Lord Williams of Mostyn was entirely accurate in his description, however: the list system as proposed by the Government leaves the electorate voting for the party, while the candidates are determined by internal party choice.

Mr. Cash: Does my right hon. Friend recall that the Leader of the Opposition, in a brilliant speech at the Centre for Policy Studies on 24 February, said:

"of all the dangerous and destructive constitutional reforms currently on the table, perhaps the most dangerous and the most destructive is proportional representation"?

Does my right hon. Friend accept that, whether we are talking about Westminster or the European elections, this is an issue of principle, and that there is a substantial difference between the position that we should adopt and that which was adopted by the House of Lords?

Sir Norman Fowler: It is certainly an issue of principle. What the Leader of the Opposition said is absolutely correct, but let me give an example of what the system that the Government appear to want so much can mean.

On 23 September, The Birmingham Post reported that the existing Labour Member of the European Parliament, Christine Oddy, had been displaced as the Labour candidate by a former "EastEnders" actor, Mr. Cashman. Asked what Mr. Cashman knew about the west midlands—and I quote from the report—

"Labour bosses defended his record in the region saying he acted in 'The Rocky Horror Show' at the Birmingham Rep earlier this year."

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) knows that this is exactly what the Labour party said at the time.

The case got worse and worse. Miss Oddy told a Cuban solidarity campaign meeting at the Labour party conference:

"Tony Blair came to Strasbourg in July and he kindly agreed to a five-minute audience with officers from the European Parliamentary Labour Party.

You can imagine my astonishment when I was kissed on the cheek. I wonder if it was the kiss of the mafia when you see what has happened to me now."

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): The right hon. Gentleman is correct to draw attention to some disquiet in the Labour party about the way in which the list has been put together, but, unfortunately, we do not have any opportunity to change that today: it is not what we are debating.

Sir Norman Fowler: That was a remarkably diplomatic intervention. Following the precedent of Mr. Cashman, the Home Secretary's wet night in King's Lynn would put him on the party's European list for East Anglia.

Why should the public have candidates foisted on them? The Labour party's selection system has few pretensions to democracy. The Conservative party has one member, one vote, meetings to select, and the Liberal

[Sir Norman Fowler]

Democrats have a postal ballot. However the candidates are selected, they remain party candidates; why should not the electorate be able to make their own choice?

Mr. Straw: Who selected the right hon. Gentleman?

Sir Norman Fowler: I was selected by my constituency association.

Mr. Straw: By the party.

Sir Norman Fowler: Certainly by the party, but at each election I appear on the ballot paper as a named candidate and people know precisely who I am. People in Sutton Coldfield are not asked to vote for Labour, Conservative or—

Mr. Straw rose—

Sir Norman Fowler: The Home Secretary spoke—not very illuminatingly—for about 45 minutes. He can wait a few seconds.

Our ballot papers at the general election did not say simply "Conservative", "Labour" or "Liberal Democrat"; the names were there. However we dress up the proposed system, the choice will be simply a party choice. Choosing the party will often not be enough. As an example, imagine that the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) and Lord Shore were on the same ticket; despite being in the same party, they stand for completely different positions on Europe. Those positions are well understood, and I do not want to argue about which is right.

I mention Lord Shore because he is one of the Labour peers who voted against the Government on the issue, so he is partly responsible for our discussing this matter again today. Incidentally, another of those who voted against the Government was the Bishop of Blackburn, as the Home Secretary will doubtless be aware.

Mr. Straw: Whatever the bishop's private view, he is not a Labour peer.

Sir Norman Fowler: No, but Lord Shore is.

The choice may be made not on doctrinal grounds but on personal preferences regarding two candidates on the same ticket. For example, if the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry were on the same ticket—they might find it bad enough being in the same Cabinet—the charm and elector appeal of the latter might win through; or it could be the other way round.

At one stage, some of these arguments appeared to be influencing the emerging view—that is the politest way of putting it—of the Home Secretary, who said on Second Reading:

"I am prepared to listen to the arguments for adopting a Belgian-type system and to give them careful consideration . . . we are a party and a Government who listen to argument."—[Official Report, 25 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 814.]

They may listen, but when they have done so they do what they intended to do in the first place.

Those who have followed the Government's contortions on this issue have come up with alternative explanations for why we are where we are today, none of which, frankly, does the Government much credit. In its parliamentary bulletin, Charter 88 said:

"The decision came as a surprise to those who followed the debate. All contact with Government gave the impression that adopting the open list was a formality. This included Labour MEPs who were collectively briefed two days before the announcement that the new system would indeed include open lists. The swiftness of the reversal and the lack of a convincing explanation of the decision has led many to believe that it was taken by Tony Blair rather than Jack Straw."

That is the nearest that the Home Secretary has got to a compliment on his handling of the issue.

The Home Secretary placed in the Library a description of the Belgian system, then pondered how he could gauge public opinion. Of course, he did what one would expect any fully paid-up member of new Labour to do: he set up some focus groups. He probably set up focus groups to determine whether he should make the concession in the first place.

It is usual, and not only among Conservative Members, to be offensive about focus groups, and I will not disappoint the House, but in one respect NOP showed a remarkable touch of good taste: it positioned three of its mini-groups in a constituency renowned for its good electoral sense over the past 25 years: Sutton Coldfield. It would be comforting to report that the member of the focus group who said, "There's nothing nicer than knowing your MP", came from my constituency but, sadly, he came from the other place where the discussions took place: the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Sir A. Hamilton).

There was little doubt about the focus groups' immediate response to the closed list. The conclusion was:

"Parties appear to be depriving voters of their right to select individuals . . . party selection begs the question for some as to whether party loyalty will precede constituency loyalty."

I agree with those comments, but I contest the so-called considered response on the closed list, in which NOP says:

"Precisely because voters can feel the European Parliament to be remote and dislocated from their own lives and experience, they can be relieved to devolve responsibility to parties to select candidates for them."

I do not believe that that is a sensible summary of public opinion. People do not say, "All this looks very complex; we will leave it to the parties to decide." That is nonsense. It is not my experience; nor is it remotely in our democratic traditions. It is a patrician view that would put even Lord Jenkins in the shade.

Mr. Swayne: Is it not grotesque that, having been thrown out by the voters and lost his own seat in the German election, Chancellor Kohl appeared within minutes as a representative in the Parliament, as a consequence of the closed list? Does not the system give rise to the possibility that voters will be represented by candidates who are unpopular?

Sir Norman Fowler: To be fair, it is a different system, but the principle is the same, and on that my hon. Friend is entirely correct.

Mr. Straw: I want to put to the right hon. Gentleman a point that none of his colleagues picked up during my speech: precisely what the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) fears will happen under the closed list system and claims to have happened under the German additional member system will happen under the open list system. Some of the least popular candidates with the fewest votes will get elected under the open list, in preference to candidates with more votes. Where is the democracy in that?

Sir Norman Fowler: I shall come to that point. That argument does not invalidate the whole argument about the open and closed lists. There is a broad principle that the Home Secretary, untypically, did not appear to address in the whole of his lengthy speech: the public have a right to be able to choose named candidates within a party. Even with the defect that he pointed out—I do not consider it fundamental—the alternative is far less damaging than anything that he has proposed. The open list system is essentially more democratic, because it gives the public greater choice. I am not persuaded that the rather laborious list of practical difficulties with the open system given by the Home Secretary invalidated that argument.

One point that I find somewhat puzzling—for once, it has nothing to do with the Home Secretary—was raised in our debate in Committee, on 12 March 1998, when the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan), speaking on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, said:

"The arguments in support of open lists are overwhelming".—[Official Report, 12 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 771.]

When it came to the vote, however, the Liberal Democrats voted with the Government.

The same thing happened in the other place, when Lord McNally—who was once a Labour Member but now speaks for the Liberal Democrats—conceded that the Liberal Democrats had argued for an open list but had intended to vote for the closed list.

Once again, therefore, we hold our breath to learn the attitude of the Liberal Democrats, who have proved yet again that they are the party of the "don't knows" and the chronically undecided.

5 pm

Mr. Allan: If I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman will not have to hold his breath for too long. For the moment, I should point out to the right hon. Gentleman that we strongly believe that this group of Lords amendments has been tabled with the intention of stopping the Bill's passage completely. Our voting behaviour has been predicated on that assumption.

Sir Norman Fowler: That is a pretty weak excuse. Either the hon. Gentleman is in favour of the open list system or he is not in favour of it. I should have thought that he and other Liberal Democrats Members might have the courage to vote in support of their beliefs. Nevertheless, I shall listen—or at least my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) will listen—to the hon. Gentleman's arguments when he is called to speak, as he undoubtedly will be.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said—it is a very important point—we are debating the issue of list systems only 48 hours before Lord Jenkins's commission reports on proportional representation for Westminster elections. That report will set off an enormous debate in the United Kingdom. After our debates on clause 3, it will be very interesting to discover whether an open list system is proposed for use with any top-up system that the Jenkins commission may propose. If one is proposed, it will well and truly torpedo the case made by the Government in today's debate.

Mr. Bermingham: The right hon. Gentleman may recall the first intervention that I made in this debate, during the speech of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, when I asked a question about d'Hondt. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that—as the choice is simply between an open and a closed system; we have no other choice—opting for the open system would give rise to a nightmare of possibilities and complications with independent candidates?

Sir Norman Fowler: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the decision is between open list and closed list systems. However, for all the reasons that I have given, I believe that the open system is the more democratic one.

On the general issue of proportional representation, my position and the Home Secretary's are probably much closer. He supports the first-past-the-post system, and, like me, he also supports the constituency base. It is therefore a mystery why the Government have started this process of electoral change. I tell the right hon. Gentleman quite seriously, however, that, in the coming months, the Opposition will relish the fight that he is beginning.

Mr. Cash rose—

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his comments on the fight in which we will be engaged in the next few months. He said that the Government's case would be torpedoed if Lord Jenkins's report on Thursday proves to be in favour of some form of open list system—although my right hon. Friend and I agree that the Government's case has already been torpedoed.

I should not like Opposition Front Benchers to give credence to anything that Lord Jenkins says about PR on Thursday. The report will be a stitched-up deal between the Prime Minister—who believes in openness and transparency, except when it comes to what he does and wants—the Liberal Democrats and Lord Jenkins. My right hon. Friend has a hugely important role to play in the fight, in which we shall have to become engaged, for the first-past-the-post system.

Sir Norman Fowler: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend, and I agree with every word he said. My point was that the Government will be self-destructing—which is perhaps a better description of what will happen than "torpedoed"—even if their own terms are met.

Mr. Cash: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the Conservative party is in principle against the idea of proportional representation? I entirely agree with him that it would be an enormous own goal for the Government if Lord Jenkins reported in favour of a form of open list. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as the Conservative party is against proportional representation, it would be far better for us to come clean on that and simply go for it by saying, "We are against the idea of open or closed lists"—and to leave it at that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are now straying outside the scope of Lords amendment No. 1, which—as the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) stated a moment ago—deals with a closed or open list system for the European parliamentary elections. I hope that he will remember his own observation.

Sir Norman Fowler: You make it quite difficult for me not to remember it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Nevertheless—if I may say it in a few words—I agree with my hon. Friend's comments.

I do not want a regional list system, but if we are to have one, I believe that an open list system will be intrinsically more democratic and a better choice than the one proposed by the Government. Such a system would give the electorate the opportunity to decide who will serve them and not leave that decision in the hands of political parties. It would also prevent any political party from exercising even more centralised power. Above all, I believe that it is what the public would prefer. I therefore believe that we should reject the Home Secretary's advice and agree with the Lords amendments.

Mr. Bermingham: I do not propose to detain the House for long. I spoke in the debate on Second Reading and said that I did not like the proposed system. I said that I thought that that system was bad because it divorced the elected from the electors, and I stand by that view. I make it very clear that, if Lord Jenkins suggests anything other than our current constituency system, he will have my undying opposition. I say that openly.

As I told the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) a few moments ago, today's debate is about a choice between a closed list and an open one. I do not like closed lists, but nor am I very enamoured of open ones. However—if one is to be utterly realistic about the mess in which we will find ourselves next summer—unfortunately, we will have to go with the closed list system, for the following reasons.

The first reason is based on the participation of independent candidates. If we use an open list system in, for example, the north-west region, which will have nine or 11 candidates—

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): There will be 10 candidates.

Mr. Bermingham: Yes. If we use an open list in the north-west, and candidate No. 6, for example, wins a vote, the other nine candidates—of whichever party, whether Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat—will receive no vote.

I stand to be corrected if I have misunderstood the Home Secretary's explanation of the system, but I seem to have got it right. I must admit that the first thought that came into my head when the Home Secretary said that "d'hondt" is Flemish for "dog" was the advertisement for toilet paper in which the puppy runs away with the expanding toilet roll. The Home Secretary's explanation seemed to be going the same way. Ultimately, the mess will certainly be the same.

If the explanations given to the House in this debate are right, the candidates from the major parties—I equate all three parties as the same in English constituencies—will find themselves at a disadvantage. It will only take someone in the north-west—Fitzsimons McGibben, for example—to decide to run as an independent. Under the open list system, that person will receive a vote that none of the major parties will receive. Which seat is that candidate going after? How many votes does he get? What is their value? That is the problem if we go with the open list system. Currently, with the closed list system, that problem does not arise, because his vote is of the same value as a Labour, Conservative or Liberal Democrat vote. He will take his place under the d'Hondt system in the totality of votes when it comes to the allocation of places.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the Home Secretary—this sums up the argument—that the closed proportional representation system provides for a simple ballot paper and that the open list system provides for name recognition but too complicated a ballot paper, but that the beauty and virtue of the first-past-the-post system is that it provides for name recognition on a simple ballot paper?

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Gentleman and I are totally ad idem. The closed system is simple. Whether we like it or not, in the north-west an open list system would mean 33 major candidates listed on the ballot paper and goodness knows how many independents. The elector would have to select, which would be very complicated. We know from studies that have been undertaken that, when faced with over complex voting papers, people get fed up and do not want to vote.

We also know that, when voters cannot identify with a candidate, they are reluctant to vote. The turnout in June will be absolutely fascinating. I suspect that it will be disastrous.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): It was disastrous last time.

Mr. Bermingham: I agree, but I suspect that this time it will be even more disastrous. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would agree, in that event, that any form of proportional representation is more disastrous than non-proportional representation. No doubt he will reflect that intelligence in the way he votes in future.

I should like the Home Secretary to consider one point. Next June will certainly be experimental in terms of the voting system. Could we also consider experimenting with the voting day? The rest of Europe will vote on a Sunday; why do we not do likewise? It might be a useful opportunity to try two experiments at once. I have an open mind as to whether Thursday or Sunday is best, but if we are to have an election with a low turnout, as I fear we are, we could at least try changing the day.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Why does the hon. Gentleman say that the rest of Europe votes on a Sunday when some countries do not?

Mr. Bermingham: I entirely forgot about my homeland, and I apologise immediately. Not all countries vote on Sunday, but the majority of Europe does—with two notable and remarkable exceptions.

In all seriousness, I suggest to the Home Secretary that next June might be an opportunity to experiment with the voting day. What has worried me in the past 15 years has been the decline in local government election turnouts, which is becoming disastrous in some areas. In my area, it was pathetic this year. The general election turnout also began to slip away—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman probably anticipates what I am about to say. He has embroidered his argument a little too much and is dealing with matters that are outside the strict terms of the amendment.

Mr. Bermingham: Your tolerance in allowing me to go so far was much appreciated, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that I have made my point, and I shall return to the fundamental issue.

My respectful view is that it is too late to turn back the clock. It is sad that I should have to say that, but that is the reality of life today.

Mr. Allan: The electorate can take heart from the fact that no single political party is entirely happy with the European election system. The fact that we all have a problem with it may mean that it is fairer than one that was welcomed with open arms by one of the three major parties and disapproved of by the others.

My party's position remains consistent. Our preferred option is neither a Belgian nor a Finnish model, but one closer to home—the Northern Irish model of the single transferable vote. That system is not on the agenda, and we now have to choose between the Finnish system, which has appeared at this very late stage in an amendment supported by the Conservative Members in another place, and the closed list system, which was agreed at an earlier stage of the Bill's proceedings.

The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) challenged my party's record. I feel that we had a good record in seeking an open list system. We proposed the Belgian list system at earlier and appropriate stages of the Bill. Indeed, there was a vote on it in another place in June this year, which we lost by only 15. Remarkably, the Conservatives in another place did not support us at that time. They have failed to vote consistently throughout the passage of the Bill when the Home Secretary, to his credit, was considering opening the list system. We are now up against the end of the Session, and they have at this late stage sent the Bill, amended, back to this place.

My colleagues in another place were unable to support the amendment because, as many Conservatives confessed, the clear intention behind the amendment was to wreck the Bill and have no proportional system at all.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman has studied the transcript, so he must know perfectly well that what he has just said is simply not the case. Three Liberal Democrats supported the open list system. I may not agree with it, but the hon. Gentleman cannot get away with his assertion that all Liberal Democrats in the House of Lords took a different view.

5.15 pm

Mr. Allan: I should point out that five Liberal Democrats supported the amendment and 32 voted the other way. Our Members are lightly whipped—that is part of the tradition of our party, especially in another place where whipping is often less effective than in this place. We did not support anything that would wreck the Bill.

The important thing at this stage is to complete the process and pass the Bill. The choice is not between an open and a closed list, but between the first-past-the-post system and a fair vote system. We have worked consistently for a fair vote system. We had an agreement with the party that is now in government, which was declared and open before the election. There was no secrecy about the fact that we wanted to embark on a joint constitutional programme for reform, and that the reform of the European voting system was an essential part of that. That agreement spelled out a regional list system. We have stuck by our part of the bargain against our first choice because, in all constitutional reforms, it is important to achieve a glass that is half full, if that is all that is on the table, rather than one that is completely empty. Negotiations require some compromise.

At this stage, the priority is not to have the first-past-the-post system, which the Home Secretary, more eloquently than I have ever heard him before, today described as a closed list system of one. He made some telling points, especially about a conceit sometimes held by politicians that they are elected solely on a personal basis, whereas when one knocks on doors during the election, people say that they are voting for that Tony Blair, that Paddy Ashdown or that William Hague. The priority for many electors is to vote on a party basis. That is especially so at the European level, when many voters vote not for an individual, but for a party.

We want more openness in the selection for the list system. If we are to move towards elections on this basis, there is a need to debate the nature of our primary system, which is effectively what we are developing. Our party chose to conduct that debate on a one member, one vote basis. The Conservatives, to their credit, did likewise. We shall not go into the debates that are taking place within the Labour party, but there is clearly some concern that there is no common basis on which people are selected for important positions. We hope that we shall return to that issue when we consider electoral systems in future.

We should like to think that, after the coming European election, we can reconsider the closed versus the open list, but the pressure of time means that we have to decide whether we go forward with a deal that offers a fair vote system for next year, so that we can avoid what happened in 1994, when the Labour party ended up with something like three quarters of the seats on less than half the vote. That is not only bad for democracy in this country, but destabilises the entire European parliamentary process. People are unhappy about returning inappropriate numbers of Members who will form into larger groups, all of which are elected under different systems.

[Mr. Allan]

We want to reconsider the Northern Irish system, which we believe to be excellent, and open and closed lists, but we do not intend to support a wrecking amendment on behalf of a party that wants to retain first past the post. If that party continues in its present vain, it will do much to depress the vote at the next European elections, as its members continually talk down the system that we have chosen, saying how poor it is and how difficult it will be to operate. A system under which three or four party names and independent candidates are listed will be perfectly simple to operate. Electors will be able to use it if only we can get them to the polling stations. We should concentrate on getting people to vote rather than on the detail of the ballot papers and other such matters with which people are not overly concerned.

We do not agree with the amendment. We shall stick with the Bill and aim for its implementation at the earliest opportunity. As we have done throughout the proceedings on the Bill, we shall consistently argue our case without seeking to obstruct the Bill's implementation.

Mr. Cash: I agree, for all the reasons given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), that we should oppose the closed list system of proportional representation in the Bill. I was delighted that, at the end of his speech, he revealed that he agreed with my case, which I shall now develop, that we should oppose proportional representation in principle.

We object to the closed list system because, by having massive electorates of 6 million, it destroys the link between the Member of the European Parliament and the voter, and it is the progenitor of European regions, which are all part and parcel of the creation of a federal Europe, divided into provinces. The Jenkins commission, which will report on Thursday, has been left in no doubt during its sittings about the hostility of the British people to proportional representation because of the extent to which it increases party control.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman to focus on the content of the debate. He has declared his opinion on a particular matter, but that cannot be debated within the context of the amendment.

Mr. Cash: Far be it from me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as a long-standing colleague of yours on the Select Committee on European Legislation and many other bodies, to doubt your judgment on these matters. However, the amendment proposes an open list system, whereas the Bill proposes a closed list system. It is therefore imperative that we have a proper discussion about their relative merits and, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) pointed out, the principle of proportional representation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's interpretation. If he wishes to remain in order, he will confine himself to a discussion of open and closed list systems. He cannot use the debate to open up a discussion on the principle of proportional representation.

Mr. Cash: I am simply making a point about the Lords amendment. I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield, that as the amendment is unnecessary, Conservative Members must ask ourselves whether we would be prepared to take our argument to its logical conclusion.

We shall not win the vote on the amendment today, but the Bill will return to the other place and there will be to-ing and fro-ing between the two Houses. The key question will be whether we are prepared to invoke the Parliament Act 1911 on a question of principle for an unnecessary amendment. I very much doubt that that will happen. I am therefore distinctly cynical about the reasons why we have decided that we shall support the Lords in this venture. The amendment is a Trojan horse, and in supporting an open list system, the Lords and the Conservative party are hiding inside that horse only two days before it will be opened by Lord Jenkins.

As the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), said in an excellent speech on 24 February 1998:

"Of all the dangerous and destructive constitutional reforms currently on the table, perhaps the most dangerous and the most destructive is proportional representation."

He went on:

"It is a profoundly undemocratic measure masquerading under the banner of democracy and the Conservative party I lead will have no truck with it."

He continued:

"We most resolutely reject proportional representation itself."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman has not been trapped by his notes into ignoring my ruling. I do not want to hear argument on the principle of proportional representation.

Mr. Cash: I do not need to argue on the principle, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the open list system is proportional and based on a list, and the fact that voters might change the order of names on the list does not alter that one jot.

On 26 February, only two days after the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks, we were given a three-line Whip on an amendment similar, if not identical, to the one that we are now considering, which was in favour of a variant of proportional representation. The open list system of proportional representation, which guarantees proportionality in relation to the parties because they receive the total vote cast for the candidates, gives only a minor say to the electorate, who might want to vote for someone who is not on the party list, so there is no great merit in us supporting the open list system. I abstained on that occasion, as I shall tonight. I wrote to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and discussed the matter with him.

As I said at the time, all we needed to do in February was vote against Labour's closed list system and press for the current method—first past the post—which is simple and well understood, and was agreed to by a Labour Government in 1977. Article 190 of the Amsterdam treaty, in the arrangements for the treaty on European Union, allows for a system which is a democratic system, such as first past the post.

On 26 February, the Government got their vote. There has been much opposition in the other place to student grants and transport measures, and defeats for the Government on fundamental issues. We might therefore reasonably have expected that on a form of proportional representation that, to quote my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks again, is "perhaps the most dangerous and the most destructive",

we should have encouraged the Lords to amend the Bill to first past the post and have a battle on that important issue. That was emphatically not a manifesto question.

The Lords, by 445 to 176 votes, refused to amend the Maastricht treaty, and refused to allow a national referendum. They returned the Amsterdam treaty this year with a mouse of an amendment that was probably ultra vires. They now propose a system of proportional representation to which I take great exception because an open system is of no value to us whatsoever. What other explanation can there be? Why are we faced with the amendment?

I am reminded of Disraeli's great novel, "Coningsby", in which, after the Tamworth manifesto, he so clearly set out his position on the state of the Conservative party. He said:

"There was indeed considerable shouting about what they called Conservative principles; but the awkward question naturally arose, what will you conserve?"

Before the Jenkins report is published, I ask the House and my party, do we regard PR, which includes the open and closed list systems, as dangerous and destructive or do we not? Do we regard PR as profoundly undemocratic or do we not? Will we have truck with it or will we not?

I read the speech of our spokesman in the House of Lords, as I heard my right hon. Friend today. Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish said:

"The amendment does not damage the Bill. My view is that it improves the Bill because it improves the PR method being used."

He went on:

"But we are not arguing for or against PR; we are arguing inside the PR system."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 20 October 1998; Vol. 593, c. 1332.]

That is a Trojan horse indeed. We are arguing inside the PR system. You will be glad to hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this is not just a question of principle; it is also a matter of practicality.

It is unnecessary for us to adopt the open list system. We could have opposed it, demanded first past the post and insisted on it in the House of Lords. If we were going to lose the vote eventually, going against our principles would make no difference. Why do we have this hostage to fortune? There is no party advantage for us in an open list system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been very tolerant of the hon. Gentleman, but he is developing a point that should have been developed—indeed, probably was developed—on Second Reading. We are debating a Lords amendment that deals with two forms of proportional representation. I remind him for the final time to confine his remarks to that argument.

5.30 pm

Mr. Cash: What I was just saying is directly relevant to the open list system. There is no electoral party advantage for us in an open list system. That what I said when you intervened, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is no evidence that we would gain any more seats by adopting it. That is relevant to the consequences of adopting an open list system. Given the poor turnout in our selection process, which, as I understand it, was only 1 per cent. in the west midlands, and the number of candidates with a proven track record in favour of monetary union and federalism, I cannot say that the open or closed list system has done us any favours.

The Liberals would be the main beneficiaries of the open list system, as they would be of a closed list system, for the reasons just given by the hon. Member for Hallam. He knows that this is part of a process that gives the Liberals an advantage because they want a fair votes system. Another objection on the grounds of practicality is that the Labour party is deeply divided and unhappy about proportional representation, closed or open. Why take the pressure off Labour? As one Member of the European Parliament has said:

"It is much easier to represent a percentage than a constituency. You don't get any letters from a per cent."

Apart from the issue of principle, there are deep flaws in the open list system. The ballot paper is horribly complicated and has a wide range of boxes and permutations. In the South-east, there would be at least 40 candidates' names and tick boxes, not to mention an accumulation of minor parties. The voters would be faced with confusing alternatives: to vote for a party or to vote for particular candidates. That would make it difficult for first time voters and for the elderly. A recent study by the Democratic Audit Report showed, as did George Jones's article in The Daily Telegraph, that British voters do not like complicated ballot papers. They do not care whether the system is open or closed; they do not like it. Already, only 36 per cent. vote in European elections in this country. The complications inherent in an open or closed system will simply drive voters away.

The example of proportional representation in other countries is not good, as New Zealand or the dreadful experience of the Weimar republic in the 1930s show. Such systems lead to the manipulation of the party system by the tyranny of the party list. Politicians elected in that way represent no one. The list system sucks the democratic system dry, and drains away real argument and debate. That is the case against the open list system as much as against the closed list system. The Conservatives should have nothing to do with it, whatever the House of Lords may propose. After all, we are the elected Chamber. For real Conservatives, accepting such arrangements for the House of Commons or for the European Parliament would undermine the democratic process.

I conclude with the famous words of John Dewey in his book "Freedom and Culture":

"The serious threat to our democracy is not the existence of foreign totalitarian states. It is the existence within our own personal attitudes and within our own institutions of conditions which have given a victory to external authority, discipline, uniformity and dependence upon the leader in foreign countries. The battlefield is accordingly here"—

I would say, in this House—

"within ourselves and our institutions."

I agree. I shall abstain on the amendment for those reasons and I urge as many of my colleagues as possible to do so as well.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): I should like to go back to one of the Home Secretary's first remarks.

[Mr. David Curry]

It is easy for the debate to become a cabaret—a sort of "Fawlty Towers"—in Westminster, but it merits serious attention. We may occasionally think that foreigners sometimes listen to the debate and draw conclusions from it. The Home Secretary said that we needed an electoral system that was appropriate to the institution. The Government seem to think that the appropriate electoral system for the European Parliament is one that maximises anonymity. That is not a good judgment.

People may or may not like the European Parliament. I have served in it, and my feeling is that despite all its efforts to fail, it is condemned to succeed. It is acquiring an increasing number of functions that affect people's ordinary lives. In a mature democracy, people need to be able to understand and develop a relationship with the institutions that govern them. That is true of institutions here and overseas. The forging of that identity should be one of the criteria leading to a judgment of what is a sensible electoral system. The Government's proposals will not achieve such a system.

Any list system is defective. The Home Secretary was right when he almost challenged the legitimacy of all of us, on the ground that somebody at some stage nominates us to go before the electorate. If we apply such an absolutist rule, none of us is popularly elected in the abstract sense. However, it is more important to try to establish an identity for the European Parliament that will work. It has had problems with its identity because it does not develop or support a Government, so the choice of the people is not easily reflected in policy differentials.

Where people stand on a list is a secondary issue. Who chooses the list is crucial, because those people set the framework within which the democratic rules will play. If I have understood the Home Secretary's words, the objection to the open list is based on the requirement to total all the votes cast for all the candidates of one party and use that as the basis for a division. It is possible that a candidate for party A who may have ridden on the coat tails of a popular candidate would be elected with fewer votes than a candidate for party B who had been less successful in riding on coat tails. We have to take that risk, because it will mitigate the power of the apparatchiks to make the choice. That is what people are most allergic to.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I accept the right hon. Gentleman's arguments, but they would have been more convincing if they had been brought forward on Second Reading. I do not remember any Conservatives arguing for the open list system on Second Reading.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my remarks on Second Reading. He will remember that, at that stage, the Home Secretary was still in an open frame of mind about what electoral system he would finally choose. We tried to urge him to opt for some variant of the open system.

It is dangerous to say that people need crutches when they vote—that we must not make the process too complicated because they will not understand it. We must trust people to be able to make their own choices and, if they have a determination to vote, to be able to understand the ballot paper. After all, some of the questions that have accumulated on the ballot paper in the United States could not be much more complicated and, as has been said, nine member states of the European Union operate some form of open system. Despite the sympathy for foreigners with which I am sometimes reproached in my party, I believe that, on the whole, the British are just as capable of fathoming a ballot paper, making a choice and demonstrating as great a determination to vote as anybody else when they think that something important is at stake.

Something important is at stake. The importance of an open system is that it mitigates the apparatchik role, which all parties have, in a sense, experienced. The Liberal Democrats conducted a postal vote—democratically. All members of the Conservative party, as long as they had been members for some time, were able to take part in a vote. Although taking part in all-day sessions to choose European candidates is a fairly grisly incentive to join the party, no doubt some people joined for that purpose none the less. The Labour party conducted a very closed committee system, which no doubt produces a finely tuned, perfectly balanced result by gender, race and everything else—except, I suspect, affinity for the Prime Minister. I doubt that a great deal of diversity of choice has been permitted in that list. All that means that the electorate's choice is being narrowly framed.

Mr. Allan: On complexity of ballot papers, which I have heard some people raise in opposition to any of the systems that we are discussing, it is worth bearing in mind that the Northern Irish electorate has, for many years, happily used several different systems and, under the single transferable vote system, very complex ballot papers.

Mr. Curry: I agree with the hon. Gentleman; it is dangerous to say that people cannot understand. That is but one stage away from wondering why we should bother giving them a choice at all in case it is misused.

People should be given a choice; they should be given a chance to overturn the apparatchiks' work. Let us take the Conservative party. As members, we voted through a series of regional assemblies, which has produced a list of candidates placed in order. Some of those candidates give me not the slightest inconvenience, and I shall vote cheerfully for them. Indeed, in Yorkshire and Humber, where I shall be voting, I am delighted with the candidates on our list.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) will, however, understand if I say that my enthusiasm for one or two of them is slightly muted. As someone who lives in the regions, I would want to be able to make my own choice. I would say, "Why can't I decide which Conservatives I want on the list?" That applies equally to a Labour man or a Liberal Democrat. There are different, but all perfectly legitimate, strands of the parties; I do not question the legitimacy of any of them. Why should not I be able to choose which candidate I want to fly my flag in the elections?

It comes down to a system in which, despite the Home Secretary's reflections on the way in which we in this House are selected, there is an election at the absolute margin. One is faced with a list and votes for a party. Candidates at the head of the list know that they will be Members of the European Parliament. Unless there is some electoral earthquake, we know pretty well who will be in and who will be out. A handful of places in the middle of the list are worth disputing. The situation is worse if there is a national list, such as in France, where only two or three candidates need stay in the country to fight the election because it is not worth the others' time to do so. We are inviting the electorate to endorse a candidate, not to make a choice. Even the open list is a form of endorsement, because the number of candidates and their names are chosen elsewhere—although at least it allows backroom wisdom to be overthrown, which is essential.

The risk of having identikit candidates chosen by apparatchiks will do nothing to help the European Parliament. As I have said before, the European Parliament, whether we like it or not—I quite do, as a matter of fact—fulfils a democratic role that is unlikely to be fulfilled by national parliaments. The need is for national parliaments and the European Parliament to work together more effectively so that real accountability may be achieved. You are glaring at me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with a somewhat baleful expression. I fear that I may have strayed rather wide of the mark.

The key is ensuring that the electoral system for the European Parliament tries to reinforce the legitimacy of a parliament that is enshrined in a treaty, which plays an increasing role in people's lives, which is subject to increasing lobbying, which is increasingly part of a balance of institutions, and which is likely to increase in its authority—in co-operation, I hope, with national parliaments. If we choose a system that makes the European Parliament an anonymous institution and people cast an anonymous vote, we shall not be helping the processes of democracy. If we seek at least to give people an element of choice, enabling them to pick a name, we shall be adding to accountability in the European Union, where the burning question is the effectiveness of such accountability. If we do that, we shall have achieved just a little revolt, which will serve the principles of democracy.

5.45 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): It is a great pity that, towards the end of debates on this Bill, we are debating closed and open lists. When one constructs an electoral system, that is the first point that one needs to decide. Everything determined afterwards is interlinked. The size of regions and what sort of link one wants between constituents and areas are pretty critical.

Our biggest problem today is that we have heard from the Home Secretary, whose arguments I found persuasive, that the Bill is so bad that it is unamendable—the regions are so large. It is true that, if we had an open list, 20, 30, or 40 members could be on it. It is also true that it is unlikely that, unless the candidate happens to be an actor from "EastEnders", he will be known in any household. That is a great indictment of the Government. We are trying to discuss how best electors can influence their representatives yet, at the end of a long Session, we have a Bill that is almost unamendable, and we cannot give electors a real choice in whom they want to represent them.

The Government's principal argument is that the proposed electoral system will work only if the decision on who will be No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4 or No. 5 on the list is taken by political parties. They say that to try to work an open list system would cause a great deal of difficulty. The system's construction is such that, in effect, it will work only if a centralised party structure determines the choices and then puts them before the electorate. That is the biggest difficulty with this legislation.

How one wants electors to influence choice should be the first point of debate, not the last. This debate relates to every other clause of the Bill. I shall vote with my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench—although I have some sympathy with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash)—simply because this is such a bad Bill that I feel like voting at every opportunity against the Government. The Bill is not unamendable. As the Home Secretary pointed out, parties have already chosen their candidates. We are coming to the end of the Session, and implementing change at this stage would cause chaos and difficulty.

Any list system has many disadvantages. Indeed, because the way in which the list is constructed, we could just as easily have a national list and be voting for 87 people. I got the impression that, as we worked through the Bill, the Government decided that they would proceed on a regional basis. If we want to influence voters' choice, we must have geographical areas or subdivisions of the country in which people are able to make informed choices.

The difficulty is that the Bill has been so badly constructed—even from day one—that only a party-controlled list system, such as France's, will work with it. I shall join my colleagues in the Lobby because I believe that I ought to register my protest that the Bill will not make a good Act. As an opponent of proportional representation, I think that its only saving grace is that, when people find that they have a choice of voting only Labour, Liberal Democrat, Conservative or independent, it will do the cause of those who support PR no good. I take some comfort from that.

Miss McIntosh: The treaty of Maastricht allows for a uniform electoral system to be set up throughout the European Union. I record my regret that the House has not taken advantage of the opportunity to introduce first past the post as just such a system, under the treaty, because there is great merit in that system and it would have won much support throughout the European Union.

Mr. Beith: Is the hon. Lady seriously suggesting that the member countries of the European Union that have used proportional systems for decades—in some cases almost 100 years—would be prepared to adopt first past the post for European elections?

Miss McIntosh: I am persuaded by the Government's arguments that they are going not by a majority of member states who use an open list, but by the majority of populations in those member states; and I am reliably informed that 49 per cent. of people eligible to vote in the world use first past the post. If one has the best electoral system in the world, it is ripe for export. I am sure that, given time, we would have obtained the support of the majority of those—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Lady has finished with that point. She heard my previous rulings.

Miss McIntosh: Thank you for your help, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

[Miss McIntosh]

There are no compelling arguments to reject an open list system—quite the contrary. Given that we have lost the argument on first past the post for elections to the European Parliament, the arguments in favour of an open list are very compelling indeed.

At the time we previously visited the Bill, the Government made a firm commitment to conduct an apolitical campaign throughout the country on the merits of the system that they are proposing. I have not seen much evidence of information about that system; that worries me. I wonder whether the Government are praying in aid the idea that they may have an open mind on changing the system to an open list. The Home Secretary felt that there would be no support among the political parties for moving at this stage to an open list. I should like to think that Conservative Members continue to keep an open mind on these matters, and that we might keep the candidates that have been adopted on our list, and simply move from a closed to an open list system.

The Home Secretary did not manage to persuade me of the reasons why he and other Labour Members do not want an open list. Usually, there are more abstentions in a European Parliament election than in any other election. In the most recent European elections, we reached the giddy heights of a 38 per cent. turnout. I am not sure of the figures for spoilt ballot papers.

I should not like to disparage the electors by suggesting that they cannot cope with the number of disparate ballot papers, but I wonder what the Home Secretary will do to dispel confusion about the many different electoral systems that will be used in the United Kingdom in the coming months.

In May 1999, in England and Wales, local elections will be held under the first-past-the-post system. In Scotland and Wales, there will be the first elections to the Parliament for Scotland and a Welsh Assembly, under a different system, using proportional representation. In June, in mainland Great Britain, in the European Parliament elections, we shall vote under the system that we are debating this afternoon. However, in Northern Ireland there will be a different system for elections to the European Parliament. I gather that yet another system of proportional representation is being considered for elections to regional assemblies—the next stage of constitutional developments.

I think that I should be hard put—I put it no higher—to cope with five different proportional representation systems. It worries me that, at this late stage, we have not seen any evidence of the Government's informing the voting public as to how we are to proceed. We ran what might be called—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is again straying on to a much wider point. We are discussing whether, in the European parliamentary elections, there should be an open or a closed list system. I ask her to confine her remarks to that point.

Miss McIntosh: On that point, I have yet to find a member of the voting public who is familiar enough with the ballot paper on which they will be asked to vote, under an open or a closed list system. We must persuade members of the voting public to go out and vote, by persuading them that, under an open list system, they will have some choice in the matter. In local government elections and European Parliament elections, our biggest hurdle is getting the vote out. I do not believe that Labour Members would argue with that. Usually, turnout is 70 per cent. at general elections and as low as 35 per cent. to 38 per cent. in local government and European Parliament elections.

I am persuaded that an open list is the answer because this will be the first time, in my experience, that an elector will be unable to vote for an individual candidate, but must vote for a slate of candidates. I have taken up the matter with returning officers in at least three parts of the country who will be called on to police the new system for the first time. There is great concern that there will be confusion among the electorate, especially among first-time voters who will vote one way in May and another in June, but also among older voters who tend to prefer the use of a single system in all elections.

There is very great anxiety—on which I should like some satisfaction from the Government this afternoon—that there will be not only a lower turnout but in all probability a record number of spoilt ballot papers, because the voters will not understand that they must vote for a slate of candidates. The Bill says that, if any other mark is entered on the list of main party candidates—Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat—that paper must be treated as a spoilt ballot paper. Another possibility is that there will be a great surge of voting for independent candidates—for a television personality, for example—because, by doing so, voters can vote for a single name on the ballot paper.

There are extremely compelling arguments in favour of an open list system. It is not too late to change from a closed list to an open list. An open list will enable the electorate to vote for an actual candidate and, following the election, it will maintain a democratic link between the elector and the elected Member of the European Parliament. I therefore commend the open list system to the House; I hope that we obtain a majority in its support.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): I wish to support my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), but I have much sympathy with the comments of hon. Friends who have said that this is a rotten Bill—a Bill which introduces proportional representation, which is wholly undesirable. However, I shall not try your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The question of closed list versus open list goes to the heart of an important constitutional principle, which my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) touched on twice—the principle that the individual elector should have the right to choose an individual Member of Parliament or Member of the European Parliament. For the first time in modern democracy in this country, the voter will be denied that right.

This is not just an arcane debate. The power that will be concentrated in party headquarters, not merely in the case of the Labour party but in the case of the Liberal Democrats and the Conservative party, is profoundly unhealthy. After a term of Parliament, there may be electors who are not happy about the MEP, whether he is a Labour, Liberal Democrat or Conservative MEP, who is top of the list. Under the proposed arrangements, if a sitting MEP wants to be readopted by his party, he is more likely to be reselected if he has toed the party line. That will inevitably lead to slavishness on the part of those at the top of the list under a closed list system.

Those concerns are not expressed on a party political basis. Lord Shore of Stepney observed in another place that such a system would lead to cronyism. Lord Bruce of Donington argued in incendiary terms that it would not be dissimilar to communism and central party committee control.

The democratic right of an individual elector in Britain to remove an elected Member of Parliament who has not done the job or who may have put party before constituency will be denied by the closed party list. I know that the Minister and the Home Secretary take seriously such matters of principle. I should like to hear the Minister's response not to arcane arguments about closed and open lists, but to that issue of democratic principle.

I take issue with a point raised by the Home Secretary. He slipped into the convenient jargon describing first past the post as equivalent to a closed list of one. That is not entirely correct. Under a first-past-the-post system, when a Member of Parliament is not to the liking of a voter for whatever reason—possibly because of his views on abortion or on euthanasia—the voter can choose not to vote for that Member of Parliament. If, for similar reasons, a voter does not like an MEP at the top of a closed list and does not vote for him, he will also deny his vote to the second, third and fourth person on that list. There is therefore no equivalence between a closed list of one, allegedly, under the first-past-the-post system, and a closed list under the arrangements proposed in the Bill.

Mr. Beith: There is a straightforward equivalence. In both cases, if a voter withholds his or her vote from the candidate or the list because of some disagreement with a candidate, he denies that vote to the party. Under both systems, a voter cannot express an individual choice without, in effect, giving aid and comfort to another party. That is a dilemma that voters face under our present system.

Mr. Ruffley: The vote will be denied to more than one candidate under the system proposed to us in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman and I are both right.

The Home Secretary adduced some deeply unconvincing arguments in support of the closed list system, echoing some of the unpersuasive arguments presented by the Minister in another place, Lord Williams of Mostyn. Some of the arguments in favour of the closed list were incredible. The noble Lord said that we were not living in an Athenian democracy. The implication was that it did not matter who the individual candidate was, because in any case people vote for a party.

At the margin, that is certainly not true. An MEP may have been voted in and have performed abysmally, or proved to be a scoundrel, but there is no possibility of removing a named individual. I raised that matter earlier, and I should like to hear the Minister's response.

One of the other arguments enlisted in another place and hinted at by the Home Secretary today was that the ballot paper would become too long and difficult to understand. However, if the amendment were accepted, the open list proposals would involve minimal changes to the ballot paper.

It is ludicrous of a Minister in another place to suggest that, if an open list system were adopted, it would take too long for a voter to make up his or her mind: voters would be in the polling booth for too long. I find those lines of argument from Ministers in support of the closed list system deeply unsatisfactory. I am shocked and amazed that the democratic process, which is subtle and sometimes complex, should be criticised on the basis that voters might spend too long in the polling booth.

I take issue with the interpretation that the Home Secretary placed on some of the focus group evidence that is in the public domain. I am not one of those Conservative Members who attack "focus group fascism". There may well be a role for focus groups for political parties. The formulation of policy may be assisted or modified by the use of such groups.

The evidence from NOP, and the ICM evidence which, I believe, the Democratic Audit has used and on which Charter 88 has done some work, suggests that voters resent the fact that their right to choose individual candidates would be taken away by a closed list system. In a Democratic Audit poll, 40 per cent. of voters resented the fact that they would not have an individual choice of candidate. The Home Secretary glossed over such evidence, but I hope that the Minister will respond. The evidence points towards more support for an open list system.

This is a rotten Bill. The arguments deployed by Ministers have been unconvincing and unpersuasive. By accepting the amendment, the damage might be limited. The entire Bill goes against the grain of constitutional principle, and grievously diminishes democracy in this country. In that spirit of constructive opposition, I hope that the Minister will answer the questions I have posed.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): First, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I apologise. I had other duties in the House; otherwise I should have been present for most of the debate.

I find it a little strange to hear Conservative Members lecturing us about democracy, considering the lack of democracy until recently in their party.

I am not in favour of the closed list system. I did not vote for it on Second Reading, and I do not intend to vote for it tonight. However, it can be said to the credit of my party in government that I do not remember the last time any Government introduced an electoral system that could substantially reduce the number of their own elected representatives. Given the present number of Labour MEPs, one can speculate that there would be fewer as a result of a change in the electoral system. I hope that that will not happen, but no Conservative Member could challenge that possibility. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was right to say that the Government were being generous.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, whether we have an open list or a closed list, that will not alter the number of Members elected by each party—it will merely determine who they are as individuals?

Mr. Winnick: Yes. However, I am talking about the basic change in the system that will be applied next year instead of the present first-past-the-post system.

[Mr. Winnick]

It could be argued that the system that operates in my party and in the other two main political parties will provide greater opportunities for candidates in terms of gender and race. When drawing up panels, attention is given to ethnic minority candidates and to women, who are not fully represented by any means under the present system. However, I have certain reservations about the system under debate, and I find it difficult to support.

It is vital that everything be above board when drawing up a panel. There should be no question of people's internal party political opinions being taken into account or of someone being considered to be something of a rebel. Nevertheless, the suspicion will remain that those who cannot be relied upon 100 per cent. to support the party line will be excluded. That is why I believe that there is a lot to be said for the open system. If we are to use proportional representation for European elections, it would be better to choose the open rather than the closed system.

I hope that this problem will not arise. I am talking not about the two Labour MEPs who were rightly expelled from the party but about MEPs who have been totally loyal to their party throughout their political lives and intend to remain so, but who do not necessarily agree with every dot and comma of party policy. They may dissent from time to time and may be described in the press as members of the awkward squad. I believe that we should not exclude such people in a democracy. If people perform a proper service, the fact that they might rebel occasionally should not be a cause for exclusion.

I am not saying that that has occurred. However, the system that we are considering today involves the operation of a panel of, I hope, fair-minded people who must decide which candidates will be ranked No. 1, 2, 3 and 4. It will take a lot to persuade me that someone who falls into the category that I have described will be ranked among the first three or four candidates. For those reasons, I have reservations about the measure. I did not vote for it previously, and I shall not do so tonight.

There will be no change in policy for next year's European elections. However, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends who decide these matters and make their recommendations to the House will consider this issue carefully. It is right and proper that the Conservative view should be taken into account, but I am sure that Conservative Members will not misunderstand me when I say that I hope that, when it comes to deciding this matter for future European elections, my right hon. and hon. Friends will take my party's reservations seriously as well. I hope that I speak as a totally loyal member of my party, although I disagree with it on certain occasions—such as tonight. I must confess that I have wondered where I would be ranked if I were to stand for pre-selection as a Member of the European Parliament.

I believe that this has been a good debate, although I have missed a great deal of it. [Interruption.] The Assistant Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall), appears to disagree. What I have heard of the debate has been very useful—I hope that I have qualified my remarks to his satisfaction. I heard a great deal of the Home Secretary's speech, and I have been in the Chamber for the past 10 or 15 minutes.

It is undoubtedly true that the debate has raised matters that are very important to the democratic process. It is right and proper that we should debate those issues and, although I am a critic of the Lords, I believe that, on this occasion, they were right to reconsider the measure and return it to this place.

6.15 pm

Mr. Swayne: The principal difficulty faced by the European Parliament is its perceived lack of democratic legitimacy, in that the people do not consider it their Parliament. We make that problem considerably worse when we rob that Parliament of what little legitimacy it has by introducing a system that ensures that candidates may be elected despite the fact that they have not received the specific votes of any electors. The amendment has certain weaknesses, but at least it addresses that difficulty.

The Secretary of State painted a scenario that I found persuasive in many respects. He said that, under the amendment, certain candidates could be elected having secured fewer votes than other candidates who were not elected. However, I suspect that the Government's principal difficulty is precisely that which I raised in earlier intervention—the overall numbers for each party will not change as a consequence of the amendment. It will merely change the candidates who would be elected rather than the number of candidates elected from either side. In that respect, the amendment addresses one of the elements of the current system that many people have found so distasteful.

We are effectively talking about a dialogue within the parties. Labour Members have complained that the selection system is not transparent. I also have some reservations about the system of candidate selection on my side. I had great difficulty persuading 3,500 members of my party to travel from the New Forest to docklands to spend a sunny day selecting candidates. I acknowledge that I failed in that task, as I managed to fill only one coach. However, at least we made the effort—although the same cannot be said for the Labour party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The terms of the amendments are very tight, and the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) is straying from them.

Mr. Swayne: The point that I am attempting to make is that the amendment offers the prospect of a primary election to members or supporters of a political party. That is vital. I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), who said that the amendment has come too late because the parties have made their selections and stitched it up.

Mr. Bermingham: Earlier in the debate, I said that the problem with the Lords amendment is that it is an either/or amendment. If we were to opt for the open system, as the Lords suggest, we would disadvantage the major party candidates and the independent candidates. In the case of a vote for the party candidate named, the party still records a vote. However, a vote for the independent candidate is a vote only for that candidate, and no vote is recorded for a party. Therefore, the position of the independent candidate would upset the fairness that exists between all members of the same party within the list system.

Mr. Swayne: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, and it is a persuasive one. However, our experience in this country is that there are often not many independent candidates in these contests. That does not alter the principle of the matter but, given the number of options available to us, the open list is perhaps the best, and certainly the best available this evening.

As I was saying, my hon. Friend the Member for Poole said that it was too late to open up this issue. The advantage of the amendment is that it draws attention to what people clearly perceive as a stitch-up by political parties. That is important. Although some may find this hard to believe, there is great diversity of view within political parties, and that should be aired in the election.

It may be extraordinary, but there are members of the Liberal Democrat party who are not content with the pace of European integration and voted against the Maastricht treaty. That is not reflected in the party line of the Liberal Democrat party. There is a broad spectrum of view within the Conservative party and the Labour party. It is appropriate that that spectrum should be represented to the voters by names on the ballot paper so that they can select the candidate who represents their views most appropriately.

It is all very well for the Home Secretary to say, "Ah, but the people don't know. They have no idea who the candidate is, let alone what he stands for." I accept that that may be true, but there are ways of remedying that, and that is the purpose, to a large extent, of political parties. Their purpose is to register their voters and turn out their supporters. That has historically been the position. However, the effect of the substantive Bill rather than that of the amendment is that that will never happen. That is defeatism. It is turning away from the justified and proper effort to educate our people about the great issues of the day. It is for that reason, among others, that I support the amendment.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I shall speak briefly. Earlier in the debate I had not intended to speak; however, having listened to it, it seemed to me that there were one or two points additional to those made in the debate in another place on this subject.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has spoken, and I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) had some sympathy with his argument about not suddenly giving way to the Trojan horse of proportional representation. We are setting out to debate the different system that the other place has brought forward—a different system of PR—and not whether there should be a PR system as such. On that basis, those in another place were appropriately engaging in their role as a revising Chamber, and did so in an estimable fashion. It is incumbent upon us to consider the merits of the argument that they presented, not to return to an earlier debate of principle about whether there should be a PR or first-past-the-post system for elections to the European Parliament.

Within those confines I think that the other place, by means of the amendment, has shown that it is a useful adjunct to this debate in the sense of being free of control of government and has highlighted that it is free of control of party. At the heart of the amendment is a diminution of the power of party systems over the choice of candidate and who is to go forward to the European Parliament.

It may be at the margin but I suspect that it will be a significant margin, of difference if those who are put forward for the European Union parliamentary elections are to be aware that their own appeal to the electorate will be significant in determining the overall result for their party and potentially the result for themselves as compared with other candidates.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I am obviously reluctant to intrude on the grief of the Labour party, but my hon. Friend makes a good point. In the west midlands—the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is a west midlands Member—the person who is at the top of the Labour party list is someone who we have never heard of in the area, unless we happen to be addicts of the soap opera "EastEnders."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's intervention is far too long. The amendment refers to the open list and the closed list and not to candidates.

Mr. Lansley: I think that my hon. Friend makes a relevant point in the sense that we might find under an open list system that a candidate who heads a list—for example, the Labour party's list in the west midlands—is the sort of candidate who might lose votes by comparison with others. It will become obvious by virtue of an open list system that that is the sort of candidate who is not supported.

The argument was presented in the debate in another place that the Labour party might be helped out of a certain difficulty in Wales over its candidate selection by the open list system. I suspect, although I am not privy to all the internal details of the Labour party's machinations—I rely upon the debate in another place—that a closed list system suits the Labour party in many respects. It has suited the Labour party in its ability to control the selection of candidates. I think that it suits it in the ranking of those candidates in the same way. From that point of view, my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) has usefully assisted my argument.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): Will my hon. Friend ask this question of himself? If the Labour party is so keen on focus groups to tell the Government how they should run their policy, would not this system be a convenient sort of focus group so that they could see by the candidates who did best; the sort of policies and attitudes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The amendment is far too narrow to enable us to get into these matters.

Mr. Lansley: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) takes me on to my next point. My first point was that the amendment creates a greater sense of accountability to electors rather than to party. As it happens—my right hon. Friend no doubt knew this and led me helpfully on to the point—the Labour Government went down the path of consulting focus groups on whether an open or closed list would be desirable. They found that the public took a negative view of a closed list and preferred an open list system.

In another place the Minister responding for the Government said, "Ah, but there is a significant difference in the response that you get to this question if you explain the issues and the respective systems to the voters."

[Mr. Lansley]

That may be true, but it will not change the result finally. I suspect—here is the key point—that the public will not go into the polling booths on 10 June next year having examined the system of election minutely. They will go into the polling booths either dimly aware or not aware at all of the electoral system that is to be used, and they will be presented with a closed list system.

To me, and I imagine to many in the House, the list system is an alien one in the sense that voters repeatedly ask, "May I see who the candidate is?" I know that that is true for literature, for canvassing and for elections generally. Voters wish to know who the candidate is. They may be able to cross the bridge of the idea that they are being offered several different candidates, each of whom is related to the same party. However, to be divorced wholly, in effect, from the ability to choose a candidate is a very undesirable situation at which to arrive.

I wish to make two further points arising from the debate. First, I listened with care to the arguments presented about the perverse potential result that might arise, where under the proposed system referred to in the Lords amendment someone is not elected who had a greater number of express preference votes—personal votes—than someone who was elected. However, I think that the Government mislead themselves if they think that that is the key reason for resisting the amendment. It happens to be a transparent perversity that might occur under an open list system. Under a closed list system, many candidates might be elected who would be much less preferred by the electorate than those who are not elected.

The simple fact is that the closed list system denies us that knowledge. It denies us the ability to determine the personal preferences of the electorate when faced with the candidates. It denies that choice.

The Home Secretary was at pains to tell us that in Blackburn, with the parliamentary system that is employed for elections to this place, if someone wishes to vote for the Labour party he has to vote for the Home Secretary. That is true, but what the Home Secretary did not refer to—I wonder why he did not take this opportunity to think about it—is that there may be people in Blackburn who wish to vote for the Home Secretary without thinking that it was their preference to vote for the Labour party. That is the point. In the European elections, people may be swayed by the character of the candidate more than they are swayed by that candidate's party allegiance. It is important that we give vent for that. Voters demand it, the other place was right to ask for it, and I hope that the House will support it.

6.30 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): This has been an interesting and even-tempered debate, in which there has been a wide measure of agreement across the House. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) that the other place has done the House and the country a signal service in passing the amendments. It has fulfilled its constitutional function as an adjunct of this place and has given us an opportunity to think again about voter choice and the difference between open and closed lists. For all the complexity that has arisen in certain quarters, the issue is simply whether voters have a choice about individual party candidates. The other place has given us a useful opportunity to explore why voters should be given such a choice.

I say that there has been a wide measure of agreement across the House on this because, apart from the Home Secretary's noble attempt to explain the d'Hondt system and all the rest—his contribution was perhaps not one of the simplest that he has made to the House—few voices have been raised on either side of the House in favour of the closed list system. The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) made it clear that he did not like either system. He is a well-known champion of the first-past-the-post system, and he gave the House a good account of his views on that.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) made it clear that he was opposed to the closed list system. On that basis, he made an honourable contribution. He said that, even if everything was above board and there was no question of any MEP's political opinions being taken into account or held against him in the selection process, an open list system would still be better, because it would be obvious that that was not happening. That was a fair point to make. Certainly in the case of the Labour party, whether any MEP's political opinions have been taken into account in the selection process has not been entirely self-evident in what has happened.

The strongest support for the Government came from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan). Not for the first time, I am a little perplexed by the Liberal Democrats' attitude on this. When the matter came before the House on 12 March on Report, the hon. Gentleman argued in favour of the open list system, and said that it would maximise voter choice. That was the first time that the matter came back to the House after the Home Secretary had been considering it. The Liberal Democrats then voted with the Government in favour of closed lists.

Mr. Allan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: I shall give way in a moment.

Today, the hon. Gentleman said that it is now far too late for any changes to be made and that they should have been made earlie, but on 12 March, he said:

"We hope that the Home Secretary and his team will return to the issue as the Bill proceeds through Parliament, give further consideration to the objective of maximising voter choice and, having listened to the arguments so eloquently made by hon. Members on both sides of the House, produce an open list system that will at least enact the spirit of our amendments, if they cannot accept them today."—[Official Report, 12 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 777.]

The Liberal Democrats have been given such an opportunity today, but now they say it is too late, despite having argued for more time earlier. I give way to the hon. Gentleman to explain briefly all those contradictions.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for quoting my words back at me. As the hon. Gentleman will discover if he looks at the record, between March and June this year we consistently argued the case for open lists, culminating in a vote in June in the other place in which my colleagues voted for that, and lost the vote by 15 votes with no support from the hon. Gentleman's noble Friends. At that point we decided that the argument had been lost, and that the important thing was to get the Bill through.

Mr. Clappison: That sounds like a good each-way bet.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) made a highly principled speech which reflected his devotion to the first-past-the-post system, the case for which he put robustly.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) made an excellent speech with the advantage and experience of being an ex-MEP. He was firm that we were wrong to choose a closed list system. As he said, the Government seem determined to choose a system which maximises MEPs' anonymity. Surely, now that it is even more difficult for MEPs to make themselves known to their electorate and to form the sort of relationship with the elector which we would all want to see, because the constituencies are even bigger than they used to be having become part of these large regions, it is more important than ever that MEPs be given an opportunity to establish an individual relationship with groups within the electorate and, if possible, with individual electors. My right hon. Friend struck the right note when he said that we should be able to trust the people, and that people should be given a choice. The Government are denying people that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) made another excellent speech. He said that this is not a good Bill and that this issue goes to its heart.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who also speaks with experience of the European Parliament, had serious concerns about the system's effect on turnout. As she rightly said, this is the first time in the experience of the British electorate that an elector will go into the polling booth and have to vote for a party or slate, not for an individual. That is alien to our political traditions. The House will also have noted my hon. Friend's comments about the difficulties which returning officers may face as a result of the system chosen by the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) made the important point, to which I shall return, that the system involves a concentration of power in party headquarters, which is profoundly unhealthy. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) made the important point that the system is not in the interests of voter choice.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire will have struck a note with many when he said that when voters go into the polling booth they want to know who a candidate is. I am sure that many hon. Members will have responded warmly to that sentiment.

The Home Secretary has done his best to sell the closed list system, but he has faced an impossible task. He has learnt this afternoon that there is no love on either side of the House for the closed list system. No organisation or commentator of any independence generally has had a good word to say about the closed list system. The right hon. Gentleman even set up a focus group to find some support for that system. It did not like it, either. The right hon. Gentleman tried to find some encouragement in his analysis of the Belgian electoral system. He put the paper about the Belgian electoral system in the House of Commons Library, but for all the good that that did, the Home Secretary might as well have performed his party game of trying to name 10 famous Belgians. We did at least discover today that Mr. d'Hondt's name means "dog" in Flemish.

As the Government's task has become more desperate, their arguments have become even more bogus. Very much at the last hour, the Government have produced a new argument—at least, one that has not been made too often before—that the system is being introduced for the benefit of women and ethnic minorities. That is an interesting proposition in view of the list which has been produced by the closed list system in my area in the eastern region.

Of the first five candidates on the list selected by the Labour party machine for that region—order is all-important—only one was a woman, although the bottom three candidates were all women. To the best of my knowledge, no one on the list was from an ethnic minority. At an open meeting on a wet afternoon in Newmarket, the Conservatives managed to produce at least one member of an ethnic minority—Mr. Bashir Khanbai—who is No. 3 on the list. He is an excellent candidate who stands every chance of being elected.

Mr. Ruffley: Is my hon. Friend aware that the noble Lord Evans of Parkside observed in the other place that, under the closed list system, 13 women and one black candidate are likely to be elected next year, compared with 13 women and one black person under the existing system? Thus there is no net gain and, even on its own terms, the closed list system fails.

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend has obviously been taking a close interest in this matter. His knowledge is greater than mine. I cannot speak for the generality of his argument, but I am sure that he is correct. I know from what we heard in the House earlier this afternoon that the system has at least produced an English MEP candidate at the top of the list in Wales. I do not know whether he counts as an ethnic minority, but it seems to have ruffled a few feathers.

The proposed system is bad. It is instructive that, given the Labour party's commitment to changing how we elect our MEPs, of all the systems that it could have chosen, it has chosen one that clearly emphasises central party control. We would have preferred retention of the first-past-the-post system, for which my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) made a robust case.

As the Home Secretary accepts, a number of other countries in Europe have various open list systems, which were all rejected in favour of a closed list system. Although he rightly says that some countries in Europe have closed list systems, so ours is not unique, his remarks must be qualified because, of all the countries in Europe with closed list systems—they are apparently in the minority—we will be the only country to operate a closed list system at a regional rather than a national level.

That is another characteristic of the Government's system that maximises central party control. It creates a double whammy for central party control, because voters will have no say about individual candidates, as they do in an open list system. Furthermore, it is difficult for smaller parties to be formed to contest elections nationally, because they have the disadvantage of having to operate at a regional level.

[Mr. Clappison]

As many commentators, including the constitution unit, have noted, a closed list system at regional level maximises central party control. That gives us a glimpse of new Labour's real constitutional priorities and instincts. It is very much a new Labour system. If ever a system was rife for cronyism, this is it, with central party control and cronyism being exalted at all levels.

We think that the proposed system is bad and that one based on first past the post would have been much better. However, it is fair that we should debate open as opposed to closed list systems. All the points made by Opposition Members about voter choice have been well made. The proposed system is anathema to our constitutional system, and alien to our political traditions. It will be deeply regretted by many members of the electorate when they discover that they can no longer choose an individual candidate of a party and that everything is handed down to them by central party bosses who think that they know best. That is wrong.

The Lords were right to raise this issue and give us another chance to discuss whether voters should have a choice or whether that choice should be taken away by new Labour and its apparatchiks.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I concur with the opening remark of the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison)—that this has been a good debate. It has been interesting, and hon. Members have made important points well. I congratulate all those who have participated.

The hon. Gentleman criticised the regional list system proposed by my party in Wales, on the grounds that an Englishman is at the top of the list. I find that criticism strange coming from a party which, when in government, could not even produce a Secretary of State for Wales who was not English.

Sir Norman Fowler: I would move on from that point, if I were you.

6.45 pm

Mr. Howarth: I might just say that, so successful was Conservative stewardship of Wales under an English Secretary of State that it no longer has a single parliamentary seat there, so the hon. Member for Hertsmere need not lecture us on who is fit to govern and represent Wales.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) made a couple of interesting points.

Mr. Ruffley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman in a minute. I wish first to refer to the points made by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire, who said that the House of Lords had done us a service in passing the amendment. Some of his right hon. and hon. Friends may share that view, but to portray the House of Lords as a defender of democracy is unlikely, particularly as 50 of those who supported the amendment were hereditary peers. It is a bizarre spectacle to set up hereditary peers as heroes for supporting such a measure, which the hon. Gentleman thinks brings greater democracy, especially as the amendment was passed by a majority of only 25 votes. That casts doubt over the role of hereditary peers.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) made an interesting speech, summing up the difficulty of those who might prefer a different system. The way in which the amendment has come from the House of Lords does not leave much choice. He rightly cast doubt on the motives of many of those who voted in the other place. We do not know exactly what considerations went through their minds, but the hon. Gentleman made a valid point. I welcome the fact that, in the circumstances, he feels it appropriate to support us in the Lobby tonight.

The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) quoted my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who said earlier that it is important that any electoral system should be appropriate to the body being elected. He went on to disagree with my right hon. Friend about the appropriateness of the proposed system. In a characteristically thoughtful speech, he said that he disliked the extent to which party labels would be the foremost consideration in the system that we have chosen, which we would call a "simple list" or "closed list" system.

It is incumbent on all those who represent a political party to make this simple point: representing a political party has a meaning. By identifying ourselves with a political party, we convey a particular set of values and policies, and we associate ourselves with those values. It is important that anybody who gets his or her name on to a party list reflects the values and policies that attach to that party. In that sense, the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon should examine whether it is important that a party label has that meaning, and that there is an endorsement from that party for any particular candidate.

Mr. Curry: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: In a moment; I want to make an important point for any party about a problem that his party has and mine had in the past.

When it becomes unclear to the electorate precisely what a political party represents, that party gets into difficulty with the electorate. I say, quite openly, that my party got into difficulties with the electorate in the early 1980s, when it was not entirely clear what it represented. The same applied at the previous general election—in equal, if not greater, measure—for the right hon. Gentleman's party, because it was not entirely clear what it stood for, what its values were and what policies it represented.

Political parties have a duty, not only to themselves but to the electorate, to protect what they stand for. A list system along the lines that we propose is one way in which we can do that.

Mr. Curry: I do not dissent from what the Minister says about our being elected with party labels, but he knows that a significant number of his party's MEPs, who presumably shared the values that he is talking about, are being replaced. A committee is putting forward a different set of people, presumably with the same values. That happened to some extent in my party, but at least it was done by all the members. Does he not think that that will give a problem to the electorate, who will wonder why a committee has apparently removed one set of people to replace them with another? The electorate will not be given the choice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are going wide of the Lords amendments. We are discussing a closed list or an open list.

Mr. Howarth: I took part in my party's selection procedure as a member. Members were consulted, and the system took their views into account, but, because the list was regional, my party had a particular right to say that being on that list must mean something in policy terms.

The hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) raised a particular point about the different systems that apply in different parts of Europe. Let me confirm what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary told her in a letter: Germany, France, Greece, Portugal and Spain all sign up to a system similar to the one that we propose. Those who are covered by that system form a majority of voters in Europe, and we are adding Britain to that system. The hon. Lady was correct to say that nine European countries have open list systems.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), who was about to leave the Chamber, but has come back again, let the cat out of the bag about the difficulty that Conservative Members have. They want first past the post under all circumstances, no matter how inappropriate it is to the body that is being elected. We have had a debate—the hon. Gentleman was quite open about this—predicated on the belief, which was unstated in many cases, that Conservative Members would prefer ordinary constituencies, such as those that we have used in the past, with a first-past-the-post system. We do not believe that that is the most appropriate way of electing the European Parliament.

Mr. Cash: Does the Minister accept that a Stalinist approach has been adopted to get rid of Ken Coates and others? [Interruption.] Does he also accept that that shows that the Labour party and the Government intend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is far too wide of the amendment. I also appeal to hon. Members: the House must come to order. There are far too many conversations around the Chamber.

Mr. Howarth: I will not be tempted along that line, Mr. Deputy Speaker, given your strictures, and because I have already answered the point. The hon. Member for Stone made an honest case, but not one that I agree with.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) raised a couple of points: his concern about turnout in the European elections as a result of whatever system we adopt, and Sunday voting. I shall deal with those in turn.

I share the concern about turnout, not only in the European election, but in general. I chair a working party, on which the Conservative party, the Liberal party and many experts sit, which is considering electoral arrangements. They are one of the issues that we want to address, and they are a problem in Europe, although that problem does not relate exclusively to Europe.

We all have a duty. I was involved in the launch of the "Get the Vote Out" campaign last week, and it will be helping. It is incumbent on political parties also to try to get the vote out at the election, whether they like the system or not. I hope that we all play our part.

It would be unwise to use Sunday voting on this occasion. We will be using a proportional regional list system for the first time, which is a major change. That may affect turnout, and moving to Sunday voting may do the same. We would not know the weight of one factor against the other in that equation, so I would rather have one change at a time so that we can measure it.

Mr. Bermingham: Will my hon. Friend give me a straight answer to a straight question: does he think that the new system will increase or decrease the turnout next June?

Mr. Howarth: I do not know. That will depend on how hard we all campaign, and how other bodies support us in that campaigning to make sure that people believe that it is important that they go out and vote.

As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, no electoral system is perfect. The most important thing is that we choose the one that produces the best and fairest result, which this one will. It is important that we choose a system that is appropriate to the body that is being elected. This one is appropriate, and I urge my hon. Friends to support it. There is no perfect solution, but this is the best available, and, in the long run, it will prove itself at the elections.

Question put, That this House does disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Working Time

7.13 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you, and all Members, will have been inundated with queries from constituents asking about the working time regulations. I was amazed to discover not only that the regulations were brought into force at a time when the House was not sitting, but that apparently only an hour and a half was available for us to debate 43 clauses and two schedules of what would constitute a major Bill.

Is there no way in which the House can protect itself and the constituents whom we have been sent here to represent by ensuring that the regulations are properly debated, and that the Government have a chance to amend any part of a measure that will otherwise cause enormous problems to all our constituents, including employers?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I am guided by the rules of the House, according to which everything is in order.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Government to spend large sums advertising the fact that rural persons—meant to be shepherds—will be affected by the measure even before it has been passed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for debate.

7.14 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Working Time Regulations 1998 (S.I., 1998, No. 1833), dated 30th July 1998, a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th July, be annulled.

At last we have been allowed a debate on massively important regulations that will cost business £2,000 million a year, may well cost many people their jobs, and are yet another reason why business in this country will be less competitive and less successful.

The House will know that I have declared interests in the Register of Members' Interests; but I do not speak on behalf of any narrow sectional interest tonight. I speak on behalf of all who want more jobs, more economic success, more flexibility, more opportunity and more choice. My right hon. and hon. Friends have exposed the hollowness of the new deal, and the fact that so few people have been able to take advantage of that scheme and go on to find jobs. Tonight we are debating the way in which the Government are heaping regulation on regulation, making it much more difficult for people to find jobs in the normal course of market business.

Where is the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? Did he discover that he had already done his work in time for this week, and decide to absent himself? Does he not realise that Ministers are not subject to regulation of this kind, and that we expect them to come to the House and answer when they are imposing such massive costs on business and making such differences to our economy?

Why did the Secretary of State allow no debate during the parliamentary year, up to the summer recess? We all knew that the work had to be done; we all knew that there were contentious issues in regard to how the Brussels directive was to be implemented. We wanted a debate to ensure that it was implemented in the least intrusive and damaging way possible, but we were offered absolutely no debate.

We then discovered that the measure had been sneaked out in the summer recess. The Government hoped to get away with it, with absolutely no debate and practically no publicity. Business had to obey all the rules from 1 October; yet business was not to be properly informed, and the public and business were not to be given the opportunity, through Her Majesty's Opposition, to express their view on how the measure could be implemented in a less damaging way.

Mr. Gummer: Is not my right hon. Friend being a little unkind to the right hon. Gentleman who should be present—the Secretary of State? When this issue hit the headlines, the right hon. Gentleman made it his business to appear on as many television programmes, and as widely, as was possible, to explain his position to the rest of the country. Is it not odd that he has not made it his business to come here tonight? Perhaps he feels that other issues will dominate the television headlines today.

Mr. Redwood: I am not sure what my right hon. Friend meant by that last remark, but I think it is often the case that the present Secretary of State prefers spinning to working, and perhaps tonight he is spinning away. What he should understand, however, is that this is the place that should have the news first. This is the place where he should come, so that we can cross-examine him. This is the place where he should defend and enormously complicated set of rules and regulations. This is the place where he should try to explain to us why we must have one costly and cumbersome set of regulations to tackle the issue of working time now, and why, next spring, we must have another set of equally cumbersome and complex regulations that do not mesh with the system to control the minimum wage.

Would it not have been more sensible for the Secretary of State to put the two pieces of work together, with the aim of minimising the cost to business of record keeping and bureaucracy? Would it not have been common courtesy for him to come to the House to support his Minister of State, and to answer the questions himself? So often, the Minister of State has been left—by both the present Secretary of State and his predecessor—to answer difficult questions.

Obviously, the former President of the Board of Trade and the new Secretary of State know that their policies do not add up. They know that they are part of the problem that faces manufacturing, which is now in a state of crisis. So they leave the poor Minister of State on his own to try to deal with all our sensible and important queries.

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): Is the right hon. Gentleman really suggesting that those who are losing their jobs in manufacturing are doing so because they have three weeks' paid annual leave and are entitled to rest breaks and decent terms and conditions?

Mr. Redwood: I am about to argue that the reason why British business is becoming so uncompetitive and so many manufacturers are closing factories and sacking their employees is that the Government have heaped too many costs and burdens on them; it is not one individual imposition. Of course we want decent terms and conditions of employment, but, if we take all the regulations and all the tax increases that the Government have hurled at British businesses, we get an insupportable burden, which has led many of them to close, and will lead to many more closing.

All too often now, I read in correspondence or in newspaper reports of companies that are not merely closing here, but opening an equivalent facility in more lightly taxed and regulated countries. It is a sign that the Government have turned the UK, in less than two years, from being people's first choice for new investment locations when running a global business, to being their first choice for closure, so badly have the Government damaged the environment in which companies trade.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Redwood: I will in just one minute, when I have developed my argument a little further.

I wonder whether the Government are aware that one job is being lost every 10 minutes. I wonder whether they realise that, on recent independent analysis, they have already, in the first two years of office, including the minimum wage next spring, pushed up the cost to business by 40 per cent. through additional regulation. Do they know that their own compliance cost assessment says that it is going to be more than £2,000 million a year to pay for working time? Does the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle) realise that the extra money will come out of business, which means less investment and less employment? [Interruption.]

We are all delighted to see that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry now realises that he should have been here all along to hear our arguments. I am sure that he did not enjoy going belatedly to his constituency to see why factories were closing there. If he stays for the rest of the debate, I and my right hon. and hon. Friends may be able to make him a little wiser about why it is that, under this Government, Britain has deteriorated so rapidly, and is now people's least preferred choice for new investment.

On top of the £2 billion working time regulations cost, we have an estimated £2.9 billion minimum wage cost coming in this spring, yet another reason why less profit and less revenue will be left in business coffers to pay for new jobs and new investment.

I have received evidence from those who are responsible for hiring temporary workers, a flexibility that some employees themselves like, as well as some companies. I am told that this regulation on its own imposes an 8 per cent. additional levy on the payroll cost of employing a temporary worker. Even the Secretary of State must realise that that will mean that fewer workers are employed.

I do not like that fact of economic life. I would like to be able to tell my constituents that there are going to be even more jobs, at ever higher rates of pay, with ever additional regulatory protection. We would all like to live in that world, but the Secretary of State must get real. He is always lecturing British business about the need to be more productive and more competitive. Every 8 per cent. additional burden on payroll means fewer people employed and less successful business operations in the United Kingdom.

When this Government came to office, we were told that they had three priorities: education, education, education. I do not know whether the needle had stuck or they had just got lost in making the soundbite more interesting, but let me play one back to them. After 18 months in office, they have shown that their priority is not education, education, education—because they have been destroying great schools and doing a lot of damage, as my right hon. and hon. Friends have been pointing out—but regulation, regulation, regulation. It is that which will do so much damage to job prospects and opportunities in the United Kingdom.

This Government are making it too dear to do business in Britain. They are making it too dear to make things in Britain. That is the common theme behind the tragedy at Rover, the closure of Siemens, the closure of Fujitsu, the closure of Grove Cranes—behind that long list of factory closures and job losses that we have helped to chronicle and expressed our regret over—but it was an entirely predictable result of this Government's policies of sticking up sterling, interest rates and business taxes and increasing regulation. Cost after cost has been placed on business.

I am sure that the Secretary of State would tell us, were he to speak, that sterling is beginning to devalue, but does he not understand that the damage has been done by 12 or 15 months of very high sterling and by the persistence of extremely high interest rates—more than double the level of interest rates of our main competitors on the continent? It is this Government who have made it too dear to make things in Britain.

Mr. Chidgey: I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman in advance for interrupting the flow of his argument, but a few moments ago he said that companies were relocating to other countries, rather than into Britain. I wonder whether he could help the House by giving us some examples of the countries to which companies are relocating on the basis of labour costs, rather than staying in the UK.

Mr. Redwood: Companies are relocating to Asian and American locations. Even within the European Union, where there are tax differences, companies are relocating. Rank Xerox, for example, has recently announced the cessation of 500 jobs in the forest of Dean. They are going to the Republic of Ireland, where there is a huge tax advantage. I have made it clear that we have to look at tax and labour costs together—that this Government have imposed many additional burdens on business here, which causes the problems.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am sure that the whole House will agree with my right hon. Friend that it is welcome news that the nomad has returned. The Secretary of State is making a half effort at listening, and is feverishly taking notes, but does my right hon. Friend not think that it would be useful if the Secretary of State felt able at the conclusion of the debate to deliver a half-competent response to it?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend has made his own strong point in his inimitable way.

[Mr. Redwood]

We want to know: why is it that the Government have chosen for the minimum wage different time periods and different record keeping from the working time regulations? We want to know why the two cannot be made compatible and be brought together. We wish to have some of the complexity explained through this House to the country at large.

Why, for example, have the Government chosen the particular formula on page 10 to calculate entitlement to leave? It would be too boring to read out the whole thing, but where

"(A x B)-C

A is the period of leave to which the worker is entitled under regulation 13(1);

B is the proportion of the worker's leave year which expired before the termination date"— and so forth is not easy for someone who is running their small business, and is worried about where the next sales are coming from and how to renegotiate the overdraft against the background of this Government's difficult monetary policy. There is much complexity and lack of clarity in the proposals.

I have had a lot of correspondence from throughout the country complaining about the opacity of the regulations and the lack of helpfulness of the ministerial team at the Department of Trade and Industry in making them clearer to business. For example, a nursing home owner wrote to me saying:

"These regulations have been brought in with no notice to small business. The first we heard of them was when a member of staff brought in an article from the Sunday Telegraph.

On speaking to the DTI they seemed totally confused and offered not a great deal of assistance, seeming to know virtually nothing about the subject."

That is one of several that I could quote from people who have not recognised that this was coming because we did not have the proper parliamentary debate and the normal publicity that relates to it. When the DTI realised that it needed to do something about publicity, people found that there were not enough copies of the guide, and that the 74-page guide was not clear anyway.

The guide warned people that it was not authoritative, and that it might even be wrong. It said that there could be court cases that undermined what the guide said, so the DTI and Secretary of State were saying to business, "Go to expensive lawyers. Ask for their advice, because our 74-page guide cannot reassure you. If you must, try to read these opaque and complex regulations."

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has my right hon. Friend seen the cartoon on the front of the regulations, which shows a British worker effectively sawing off his own job, and trying to indicate that the Government have got themselves in a mess? I wonder whether the Minister really understood what message he was conveying to people.

Mr. Redwood: Yes, I saw that and I assumed that Ministers had neither checked the cartoon nor read the text inside, as otherwise they would have seen what an own goal it was in its apparent portrayal of the Government cutting themselves off by sawing the wrong piece of wood on which they were precariously perched. The 74-page guide has made life more difficult, and the burden of DTI advice seems to be that people must go off to lawyers because they cannot be sure.

What extra financial provision is to be made throughout the public services to meet the extra cost? We know that that cost will be more than £2 billion a year, and that quite a bit of it will fall on service provision through public finance. Some nursing homes, for example, will have considerable extra costs. Those who have written to me say that the social services in their local authority have had no extra money, and that, if they try to put up their charges, they will doubtless be told that social services will have to buy fewer places.

Vulnerable people seem to be at risk unless the Government are prepared to route extra money into those social services funds, so that the same level of service can be provided and the public sector share of the £2 billion-plus cost of the regulations can be met. The Government should reassure all those people who may be at risk and tell them how much extra money will be put in to meet that cost in important public services. Over what period does the Secretary of State envisage that nursing homes, for example, will be allowed to put up their prices to cover the great additional cost and reassure all the people who need it that the care will continue to be provided?

The situation seemed to descend into farce when I read in the newspaper the other day that the Jubilee line completion date was gravely threatened because the work force wanted extra compensation in light of the regulations, and there was a threat of industrial action. It is a crowning irony for the Secretary of State, who prides himself on being able to see the dome through to a successful conclusion, that his own regulations, which he pushed through so casually in the summer recess, hoping that no one would notice, should have caused such industrial disruption to the construction of the Jubilee line, the timely completion of which is crucial to the dome project.

We want to know more about the exceptions. I am sure that many Labour Members would prefer the minimum of exceptions, because they believe that one can legislate for higher standards rather than working to achieve them in an enterprise economy. Why, then, are there so many exemptions? Why are all those working in exempted, but not others who might feel that their industry or activity warranted an exemption?

"air, rail, road, sea, inland waterway and lake transport . . . sea fishing . . . other work at sea; or . . . doctors in training"

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): I want to help the right hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he has forgotten that, when he was a member of the previous Government, it was negotiated with the European Commission that those sectors would be dealt with separately because of their specific needs. That is exactly what is happening, and consultation is taking place. He made the point to attack the Government, but in fact he is attacking the previous Government, of which he was a member.

Mr. Redwood: I am not attacking the previous Government, who did not want any of these regulations, but were unable to persuade our European partners through the courts. We would have been forced into implementing the regulations, but we would have done so in a far less damaging and costly way.

It is for the Minister to explain why, given that he is a believer in such regulation, he is exempting all those groups. There is nothing to stop him including everyone in the regulations, if he thinks that they are such a good idea. Why are those groups, representing a substantial chunk of the economy, left out of a protection that he considers valuable? If the answer is that they need the extra flexibility to have a successful industry with good labour relations, why does that not apply to other groups? Why does he not go back to Brussels with another list of groups that need similar treatment?

We were told that the Government would pride themselves on having a lot of influence in Brussels. I would not mind betting that they have not tried to renegotiate anything in the regulations, and that they have not returned to Brussels after the court case, as we would have done, to say that they were still not happy and wanted to negotiate something better. I do not suppose that they have expressed any interest in the subject around the ministerial table in Brussels. I take the grins on Ministers' faces as confirmation of that.

The Secretary of State is very good at asking people to work longer hours. He asked the Conran shop to stay open longer than normal so that he could complete his shopping, and when I visited the Birmingham motor show on Friday, I learned that he had asked for it to open early on Wednesday so that he could get back in time for a private lunch that he thought was very important.

It is ironic that the right hon. Gentleman, who, whether with a talking or with a silent part, has come to propose the regulations to the House, should himself have encouraged workers to break, or to get dangerously close to breaking, them for his own convenience. He is an important and influential man, but he is not yet royalty, and there must be limits to what he can expect of those in shops and motor shows.

Will the Minister confirm that Members of Parliament are exempt? Many of us would find it difficult to carry out all our functions in a 48-hour week. I believe that there is some doubt about the position of the Speaker. That should be clarified: is there any special circumstance in which someone working loyally for the service of the House as a whole could be in a different category from those of us who, I trust, are assumed to be more independent and are exempt from the regulations?

It is widely agreed by independent commentators, as well as by Conservative Members, that the incoming Government received a very fine economic legacy. It was a golden legacy, with low inflation; reasonable growth; reducing unemployment; a flexible work force; and living standards and real wages rising at a pace that the economy could sustain, in the context of a successful enterprise economy.

Eighteen months on, there is growing evidence of a downturn made in Downing street, with closure after closure, job loss after job loss and problem after problem. The Minister must answer on that general issue as it applies to this debate. Will not he concede that every such regulation, reducing flexibility and imposing additional costs, makes it more difficult for the enterprise economy to work and for us to achieve the improvement in living standards and in terms and conditions that always comes when an economy is growing or flourishing?

The paradox may be that, through the regulations, more people will lose their jobs and fewer will have decent living standards and quality of employment, because the regulations are part of the process by which the golden economic legacy is being squandered.

We have some positive recommendations, should the Minister be interested. We should like him to take away the regulations and come back with an improved version. He has to do something, as we know that he will not negotiate the cessation of the regulations from Brussels. We want him to consider whether more exemptions would be sensible, and to come up with less onerous record keeping. Much of the cost will be in record keeping, not improving people's jobs, but creating a lot of bureaucracy. That is simply throwing money down the drain. The Minister should reconsider the record keeping, in the light of the equally onerous record keeping that he is soon to demand for the minimum wage.

We should like the Minister to offer, even at this late stage, a better guide for businesses: 74 pages offering no guarantees is not satisfactory, and the language of the regulations is not clear for the normal entrepreneur running a small or medium business, who has better things to do than wade through this kind of stuff in the afternoon or late at night.

We definitely want clarification from the Secretary of State and his colleagues about how the public sector is to handle the large share of the cost that will fall on public services. We desperately need to know that those in nursing homes, for example, will continue to get their care, and that adequate extra money will be provided to pay for the costs that will fall on that sector.

Above all—from a Government who say that they are about creating jobs and opportunities—we want a proper statement of the impact of all that cost on jobs. Why is there no impact statement on jobs? The Department must have done work on that matter, and knows that every extra £2 billion of business cost results in less investment and fewer jobs. Will Ministers spell it out for us today, and honestly tell the nation what the cost will be? How many more factories? How many more times will I turn on my television or Ceefax in the morning and have to learn of another factory closing because the costs are simply too great?

The Government are wrecking the business bottom line. Wrecking the business bottom line means that there will be less business in Britain. Businesses will go elsewhere; they will shut down here. Will Ministers listen before it is too late, and before the Secretary of State is known and remembered only as the Minister for recession?

7.40 pm

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): I speak in this debate more in sorrow than in anger, and as one who argued for many years in the trade union movement—it was not always an easy argument—that the movement should undergo a sea change by moving away from legal immunities and always depending on free collective bargaining, and towards positive rights and minimum standards. I argued that, if we did that in the United Kingdom, since no mainstream political party could oppose basic minimum standards, we would prevent exploitation and safeguard the rights of the most vulnerable. I argued that no political party entering government would ever dare to interfere with those minimum standards.

[Mr. Alan Johnson]

Although it is arguable whether the Conservatives are any longer a mainstream party, it is sad that a once great political institution should be demeaning itself by opposing such modest steps to prevent the exploitation of British workers. Conservative Members' opposition to such provisions is sad and makes them unique, even among the centre right parties on the continent.

Conservative Members have had a difficult time with the issue of working time regulations. First, they humiliated the United Kingdom by trying to evade the law and losing, hands down, at the European Court of Justice. Ultimately, they humiliated themselves. All they achieved—belonging, as they do, to the party of Church and the family—was the removal from the regulations the principle that Sunday should be the statutory day off.

Conservative Members then went to the country in a general election. I have a document—it is not easy to find a copy—published before the general election that is known as the Conservative party manifesto. It is perhaps known also as the shortest suicide note in history. It states:

"We will insist at the Intergovernmental Conference in Amsterdam that our opt-out is honoured and that Britain is exempted from the Working Time Directive".

There were not many specific pledges in that document, but that was one, and it was emphatically rejected at the general election by the British people.

Conservative Members deluded themselves into believing that they could continue to fool the British work force by making the essentially unpatriotic argument that it would somehow be good for people working in British factories for our country to be the exploitation capital of Europe. The British people emphatically rejected that attempt.

After the views of the Conservative party were rejected on 1 May 1997, the Labour Government went to Amsterdam and re-engaged in the process of civilised and mature politics. I honestly thought that, after their devastating defeat, Conservative Members would listen and learn from their experience. I really thought that they would realise that there had been a change not only in the United Kingdom but in the thinking of the trade union movement on how we should proceed in ensuring basic minimum standards at work. Conservative Members' motion on today's Order Paper shows that they are simply wallowing in their humiliation.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Johnson: No; there is no time to give way. It is a short debate, and other hon. Members wish to speak.

Once again, Conservative Members are spouting their basically unpatriotic argument. They say that the issue is one of burdens on business. An example of a burden on business was the passage of legislation insisting that, every three years, employers had to approach workers to discover whether they were still happy to pay their union dues out of their pay each week, through check-off. Moreover, every time union dues were increased, the legislation required employers to write to every employee to discover whether he or she was still keen to continue doing what he or she had done for years. That is a burden on business.

On the principle of not imposing burdens on business, Conservative Members oppose passing regulations that will ensure basic, decent workplace standards. The regulations will not affect the practices of the vast majority of good British employers, but will help to tackle exploitation.

I have been a member of the Trade and Industry Committee for only a short time. However, shortly after the general election, because of Conservative Members' arguments that companies would make inward investment in the United Kingdom only if we opted out of the social chapter, we conducted an investigation into inward investment, and quizzed everyone to whom we spoke on the matter. As the evidence shows, the issue of the United Kingdom opting out of the social chapter did not crop up once among the firms to which we spoke about inward investment. The issues that they cared about most were training, skills and local facilities. Not once was the social chapter raised.

The Opposition have always opposed decent standards—whether in health and safety, equal opportunities or maternity rights—on the basis that providing decent standards would be a burden on British business. I think that British business understands that we now have a Government who subscribe to principles that are very different from those of the Opposition. I am happy for that difference in principles to define the difference between the Government and the Opposition. I hope that the House will reject the Conservative motion and pass the regulations.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): This is a very short debate, and I shall therefore make my speech a very brief one. The hon. Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson) said that he was speaking in this debate more in sorrow than in anger. I speak in the debate in anger. I am very angry, on three counts—not least of which is the fact that the Government did not give the House an opportunity to debate the regulations before they came into effect on 1 October 1998.

Before I tabled early-day motion 1637, on 30 July 1998—effectively the last full working day before the summer recess—I checked with the Table Office to obtain a copy of the regulations. By mid-afternoon on that day, the regulations were still not available, although there was a hint that they might be available the following Friday morning. Such a situation is simply unacceptable. We are dealing not with run-of-the-mill regulations but with a very significant and expensive measure indeed.

The Government have acted disgracefully on the regulations. They could have made parliamentary time available to debate the regulations if they had wanted to. They failed to do so, and have thus shown their contempt for Parliament.

The second point that makes me angry is the fact that the Government, because of their handling of the regulations, have gratuitously imposed a huge cost burden on British industry. The hon. Member for Hull, West and Hessle has his own perspective on the matter, but that perspective is not shared by employers who are trying to run businesses in an increasingly competitive world.

I remind the hon. Member for Hull, West and Hessle of the new costs that will be imposed on British business. In the first full year, the costs will be £1.9 billion. In 12 months' time—because of the additional week's paid leave coming into effect—that £1.9 billion will increase to £2.3 billion. But the costs will not end there. According to the cost compliance statement, at paragraph 3.26 of annexe E3 of the consultation paper:

"It is assumed that the total cost of enforcing the Working Time Regulations could fall in the range £3.5-£6.3 million."

That cost deals only with enforcing the regulations. Paragraph 3.27 states:

"It is assumed that the enforcement of the Working Time Regulations could increase the industrial tribunals workload by an additional 3,000-6,000 industrial tribunal cases per annum".

It goes on:

"It is estimated that the enforcement of the Working Time Regulations could increase the workload of the HSE"— the Health and Safety Executive—

"by between 10 and 25 per cent.".

The Government must be aware of all those factors. They must be aware of the huge burden of cost and bureaucracy that they are imposing on employers. Conservatives are certainly acutely conscious of those things, and we are determined to do all that we can to help employers remain competitive by opposing the regulations.

The effect of the regulations on this nation's competitive edge will be devastating. It is all very well for the Secretary of State, who is no longer in his place, to tell British industry to sharpen up its act and improve productivity. I can tell him that what British industry needs is help, not hectoring.

I shall give just one example from the real world of trade and industry to illustrate my point. The sawmilling industry is facing a grave crisis. In England and Wales, 22 mills have between them shed 485 workers. In the harvesting industry, approximately—

Mr. Alan Johnson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) has registered shareholdings in a company but has not declared that fact in the debate; surely he should have done so at the beginning of his contribution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Gill: My interests are well known, and they are of course declared in the Register of Members' Interests.

My point is that 22 companies in the timber industry in England and Wales have shed 485 jobs, which is leading to a further 100 job losses in the harvesting industry. The hon. Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson) should know that that is because we are competing with countries that can provide us with timber very much more competitively. In Latvia, which is providing so much of that timber and putting British sawmills out of business, wages are not £3.60 an hour, or the minimum wage, but £2 a day. What are we doing in the face of that competition?

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gill: No, I want to leave time for other hon. Members to speak, because it is important that we hear your arguments and I intend to complete my arguments before I sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Gentleman expect me to give my argument?

Mr. Gill: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but, as I said at the outset, I am very angry about what is happening.

I am about to give the third reason for my anger, but I shall first give way to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg).

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): My hon. Friend said that there were three reasons for his anger, and he was just about to tell us the third. I suggest that there is a fourth reason, which is the lack of clarity in the regulations themselves, especially with regard to the definition of working time and whether it extends to long travel periods. If people travel to the far east on their employers' business, does that fall within the definition of working time? Does my hon. Friend agree that that is simply not clear from the documentation?

Mr. Gill: My right hon. and learned Friend draws attention to a very important point. Industry feels that all these matters should have been clarified in advance of the publication of the regulations. The point that I was making, with which I am sure my right hon. and learned Friend agrees, was that the regulations were not available before they were implemented. As he knows, they came into effect on 1 October, but only now do we have an opportunity to debate how they might affect our industries. The Government's view is that cases such as that which my right hon. and learned Friend instanced will have to be tested in the courts.

The third reason why I am angry is that the Government went to Amsterdam and simply caved in over the regulations. Before the election, the Conservative Government had challenged the legal base of the working time directive in the European Court of Justice, arguing that it was not a genuine health and safety measure. The Court ruled against the United Kingdom on 12 November 1996. My right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) then sought a reversal of that decision at the intergovernmental conference that led up to Amsterdam, and threatened not to sign the treaty unless that was agreed. That is an example of the Conservative Government trying to get the best possible deal out of the European Union. What have this Government done? As soon as they were elected, they went to Amsterdam, caved in and accepted the regulations in toto.

I promised to be brief, so I conclude by saying—to the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) in particular—that we need answers to three questions. Why did not the Government provide an opportunity for Parliament to debate the measures before they were put into effect? Does he not understand the devastating effect of placing a huge burden of overhead costs on British industry? Finally, why did the Government go belly up? Why did they cave in in Europe instead of getting a quid pro quo for their acquiescence to the regulations before us?

7.55 pm

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): I am glad to have the opportunity that the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) would not give me to respond to what he said. He cited the example of the timber industry in Latvia—I do not know whether he is involved in that industry—to show that our competitors are paying workers in the saw mills as little as £2 a day. Is he suggesting that the only way that industry in this country can compete is by paying such wages? That is what he seems to be suggesting.

Mr. Gill: The hon. Lady knows perfectly well that that is not what I was suggesting. I was telling the House, especially Labour Members, that, if the Government continue to load British industry with overhead costs that are avoidable, they will make British business uncompetitive. My concern, although it might not be the hon. Lady's, is that that will put British people out of work.

Maria Eagle: I am grateful for that clarification, but the hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand the logic of his own argument. If employers in this country are paying massive wages, as he seemed to suggest, and if our competitors are paying their workers only £2 a day, it does not matter what other burdens businesses endure. The Opposition's argument is that we should be competing on the basis of the lowest possible wages and the worst possible conditions.

I congratulate the Government on implementing the working time directive. We are talking about decent minimum standards at work. We are not talking about giving people 10 or 12 weeks' holiday but about giving them three weeks' paid leave. That is not an excessive amount of leave to expect in a working year. We are talking about rest breaks that guarantee 20 minutes' rest, not one or two hours, if people work more than six hours. We are talking about the right not to work more than 48 hours a week unless one agrees to do so. We are also talking about people having the right to one day off a week.

Those provisions are not excessive, and I have not met one business man in my constituency—I talk to many regularly—who thinks that they are. It is clear from the regulations that there are derogations, and opportunities for people who wish to work longer hours to agree to do so. However, we are talking about the basic minimum standards at work which people should expect in a civilised society.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) cited the example of a nursing home. Does he not think that care workers will be ground down by their job if they do not have holidays and the right to a day off?

Mr. Redwood: My question on the nursing home was whether, given that what the hon. Lady regards as a desirable improvement will be introduced, the Government will pay for it. They must, or people will not get the care they need.

Maria Eagle: People will not get the care they need if the work force who are providing that care do not have holidays, cannot afford to take any time off and are being ground into stress-related illness. What are the costs of that? The right hon. Gentleman has made no reference to that.

What we have heard from Opposition Members tonight are further symptoms of their Gradgrind approach to industrial relations. They think that employees can be motivated to work for a living only by threats and big sticks such as fear of dismissal and lousy conditions at work. Anyone who has ever worked in the private sector, as I have, knows that the best way to motivate people at work is to lead by example and have team working and fair treatment. We are talking about basic decency—nobody should object to that.

I have a number of world-class companies in my constituency, including Glaxo Wellcome, Eli Lilley, Medeva Pharma and Ford Jaguar. I regularly meet their representatives, and I often ask them what is the most important reason for their success. Pharmaceutical companies in my constituency were in desperate trouble in the 1980s and almost closed. Unlike 25 per cent. of manufacturing industry in Liverpool, which closed in the first 18 months of Tory government—from 1979 to 1981—those companies managed to stay afloat. When I asked them how they did so, they said that it depended overwhelmingly on the commitment, time and effort of their staff. They accept, as does any decent employer, that one gets those results from people not by grinding their noses into the dirt but by treating them well, taking account of what they think, motivating them and having team working. That is the way of the future, but the Tories have not yet accepted that.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson), who has extensive experience in this field. He said that the Conservatives are living in the past. The Tory legacy shows why the regulations are needed. There are 2.5 million working people in this country who have fewer than three weeks' paid leave a year, an amount which is a basic decency. There are 2.7 million employees who usually work more than 48 hours a week. People cannot do that for long periods without suffering an impact on their health.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that we shall need to be very vigilant when implementing the working time directive. I have information concerning an unscrupulous employment agency operating in my constituency. One of the people employed by the agency has been advised that, if she does not sign an agreement, she will lose her job. That is clearly an attempt by an unscrupulous agency to bypass the regulations, which are designed to protect workers' rights. We must be ceaselessly vigilant to ensure that such agencies are brought to book.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend is right. There are examples in other industries of people who have been put under duress to sign opt-outs. Once the regulations have been implemented and the Government have had an opportunity to monitor their implementation, they should consider whether duress is being placed on workers to make them opt out. If there is evidence of duress, the Government should ensure that it does not continue.

The sawmill sector has already been referred to. I have an interest in the print trade because my father used to work in it. There are examples in that, trade of federations of employers, such as the Paper Federation and the Corrugated Packaging Federation, amicably reaching agreements with the Graphical, Paper and Media Union for implementing the regulations. That is the way forward. Good employers recognise, as do good employees, that the regulations set basic minimum standards. We should congratulate the Government on implementing them, and we should make sure that bad employers who do not implement them are pursued.

8.3 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I shall be brief because I know that other hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. My colleagues and I support the principles behind the working time regulations because we believe that sensible, well-designed regulations that preserve individual choice and guarantee minimum working conditions are an essential part of a modern industrial democracy.

We disagree with the Government on the manner in which the regulations have been introduced. These ground-breaking regulations are controversial in some sectors of the economy. Industry, commerce and the unions have concerns and fears about the way in which they will be implemented. All those issues could have been dealt with in a proper debate in Parliament at the right time. That is why I introduced early-day motion 1601 not at the end of the Session, but on 23 July 1998, with a full week left before the recess. Sadly, there was no response from the Government.

I have always understood that statutory instruments are used when it is necessary to introduce non-controversial legislation that does not require full debate in Parliament. We know that these regulations are controversial and that industry and commerce have concerns about them. The Government should have made the effort to have a proper debate in Parliament before the regulations were introduced. Many of the problems highlighted by industry and commerce could have been dealt with, and Ministers could have provided clarification in the proper forum. That would have helped the implementation of the regulations to proceed more smoothly.

Officials in the Department of Trade and Industry are still unable to answer basic questions about how the regulations should be implemented. What is working time? What is travel time? The classic example is when one is asked to go from London to a meeting in Edinburgh. If one takes the overnight sleeper to arrive in Edinburgh for a morning meeting, is the travelling part of working time or is it one's own time?

Mr. Hogg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: There is little time left and I must continue.

Another example is when one is asked to take a client out for lunch or dinner. Is that entertainment in one's own time or is it working time? I hope that the Minister can clarify those issues. He must be aware of them. I am sure that many people have taken him out for lunch and asked him whether they are working or entertaining him. I mean that in the nicest possible way; I do not want to comment on his figure—perhaps there is another reason for that.

The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) said that agency workers were exploited and told that they would lose their jobs. There is now an obligation on agencies to provide their workers with paid holidays. I agree with that measure, but it has a knock-on effect. Are employers who currently take on agency workers on long-term contracts prepared to recognise the additional costs that the agencies will have to bear through fixed-price contracts? Will they renegotiate? My worry is that Government Departments that use agency workers are reluctant to accommodate the increased costs faced by bona fide good agencies.

I shall give some examples of concerns in my constituency related to whether industries are able to claim exemptions. Eastleigh has three major bakeries serving the region. The baking industry has a long tradition of night working. I am told that it is essential, in order to keep the baking process running on a 24-hour basis to produce the goods that serve the community. I add that night workers in my constituency are not being exploited or coerced into working night shifts, which are well established. Eastleigh has only 3 per cent. unemployment, which, statistically, is zero unemployment, so people are not being forced into those jobs. Will the baking industry be exempt?

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): My hon. Friend has referred to bakeries, but very little has been said about the fishing industry. We have established that the industry has exemptions, but the Minister said that they were negotiated separately. We need clarification about whether those negotiations have been completed and whether it is absolutely certain that self-employed share fishermen will be exempt. They cannot stick to inflexible working hours when they are doing dangerous fishing work and competing with the elements.

Mr. Chidgey: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I am sure that the Minister will respond to it.

Those who want to be able not to work on Sundays are concerned that the 14-day contract laws will weaken their position. Perhaps the Minister will clarify that.

There is confusion among those who will have to work and abide by the regulations. Apart from the need for clarification, the main concern is that unscrupulous employers have the opportunity to find loopholes in the legislation. We have already heard some examples. I have heard of employees being threatened that their contracts will be reviewed and their pay and conditions changed if they do not sign up to an exemption from the 48-hour rule. Many people are employed on conditions that say that they will work for more than 48 hours a week. What will happen to them if they sign up to working 48 hours? Will pay cuts be imposed on them? That is not what we want.

I know of one employer who has suddenly changed the calendar. As far as he is concerned, his employees now work on a 54-week year. That is a neat way of reducing the hours worked per week to less than 48.

There is muddle, confusion and ambiguity. I do not want the regulations to create a field day for lawyers. We have already heard predictions of a spate of industrial tribunal cases. We do not know how tribunals will react. I am concerned that many firms legitimately trying to operate the regulations correctly could find that they have unintentionally broken the law. We support sensible, clear working time regulations, but the Government have a long way to go to address the genuine concerns of those who will have to operate them.

I would appreciate more guidance from the Minister on how the regulations should be implemented and how the concerns will be addressed. If he cannot do that tonight, I should like a commitment to providing additional information to help people to follow the law.

8.11 pm

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): The working time directive is an important step in creating a fairer, safer and more productive workplace, based on partnership rather than conflict and exploitation. In that spirit of partnership, it is important to make it clear that employees have the right to work beyond 48 hours if they want. We have heard tosh and nonsense from the shadow Secretary of State about the hours that the Speakers or Members of Parliament work. That is an erroneous point.

I am not a dewy-eyed romantic who believes that workers and trade unionists are never wrong. Before the election, I was a senior manager in the public sector and had direct responsibility for some low-paid employees. I understand the frustration caused by the need for adaptability and flexibility in the workplace. However, that adaptability and flexibility needs to be underpinned by a shared commitment and enthusiasm.

In government, the Conservatives rejected that balance and fairness. Their track record in the 1980s was one of dismantling legislation that provided protection for working people, particularly on working hours. The message this evening from the Conservatives is that in no circumstances can social costs borne by an employer to comply with legislation be justified, yet even the Tory party acknowledges that in certain circumstances, employment legislation is necessary—on health and safety and the right to go to an industrial tribunal.

If the principle that there are circumstances in which it is legitimate to have employment legislation is accepted, the issue at stake is how much legal protection for employees is compatible with the need for flexibility, greater productivity and the desire to create jobs. That should be the subject of a mature debate, not the knockabout party posturing that we have heard in the House this evening. The Conservatives are saying that any regulation in the workplace is wrong.

I am not saying that we should return to some of the restrictive practices of the past. However, the pendulum swung too far in favour of the employer against the needs of the employee in the 1980s.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Does my hon. Friend recognise that that pendulum swung back further in some regions than in others? The terms and conditions of employment in Wales are among the worst in the United Kingdom. The proposal will be welcome in the Principality.

Mr. Rammell: Some regions suffered more than others, and the measure will be welcome.

The working time directive must be judged on the balance between the need for the measure and the extent to which it may have adverse consequences. There is certainly a need. Britain works the longest hours in Europe. There is evidence from the CBI that absenteeism in the workplace costs £25 billion a year. The health risks of long working hours are well documented. There are many costs to family life and other factors that need to be taken into account.

Given all those adverse consequences, we have to ask whether long hours bring higher productivity. The answer is emphatically no. We work the longest hours in Europe, yet our productivity levels are far worse than those of Japan, the USA, France and Germany. There is evidence from the engineering industry in the early 1980s that a negotiated reduction in working hours can lead to higher productivity and the creation of further jobs.

Finally, I should like to deal briefly with some of the arguments by the Conservatives this evening. We have been accused of sneaking the legislation out. How can we sneak out a measure that we said explicitly in our manifesto that we intended to deliver? We are accused of caving in to the European Commission. How can we cave in on a measure that we have advocated and said that we intend to implement? That is nonsense. The Conservatives have put forward a series of contradictions. It is just party posturing. We have heard a lot about job losses. If the shadow Secretary of State has any evidence that any of the job losses that we have heard about recently are directly attributable to the 48-hour working week, he should stand up now and justify his comments. He cannot, because he has no evidence.

The measure is about fairness, partnership and creating the conditions for higher productivity. I welcome the fact that the Government are bringing it forward.

8.17 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): When such a change is proposed, it is first reasonable to ask that the House should have time to discuss it before it is put into operation. I do not find many of the extreme arguments about the measure persuasive, but our ability to discuss the issue is important.

Secondly, if we are to have such legislation, it should be introduced in as user-friendly a way as possible. As hon. Members on both sides know, many people around the country have found the way in which the legislation is being implemented confusing and less user-friendly than it could have been.

Thirdly, while I am not suggesting that the Government should change their view—they fought an election on the issue—I wonder whether they could have argued in the European Community for lighter regulation, even in the areas in which there might have been disagreement between us.

Fourthly, I wonder whether the Government have betrayed their cause. They say that the legislation will not be as onerous as the Conservatives have suggested, because, just as the minimum wage is so low that it has caused great criticism outside, they have made sure that the working time directive has many exemptions. What have we heard from the Liberals? They have asked for exemptions for group after group. If the principle is right, it is extremely difficult to understand why we must rush in to stipulate this exemption or that exemption.

In general, I do not find any objections to the working time proposals; they are perfectly reasonable. I object to the fact that they are enshrined in legislation and regulations that will impose considerable extra cost on business. I do not worry too much about extra costs that result in people getting a better deal. I worry about the extra costs that the Government impose; they are expensive.

Such extra costs are being imposed in areas where there is no possibility of recompense. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) referred to local authorities. He was—I hope, not purposely—misunderstood by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle). He was saying that, if costs rise as a result of the directive, for reasons with which the hon. Lady would be happy, the local authority that has to pay the extra cost of placing old and vulnerable people in nursing homes must either receive more money from the Government or be able to place fewer old and vulnerable people. There may well be a very good answer to this problem; I am sure that the Minister will give it.

I do not understand why we have not had a proper debate before now, so that the reasonable worries and criticisms of people like myself, who are perfectly moderate on the issue, have no antagonism toward the European Union and think that, in general, such directives are not quite as dreadful as they sometimes seem, can be met. It is another example of the House being bypassed—as it has been on almost every issue. That is why I intervened on the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he was in the Chamber for a short period. The Government think that the way in which to do business is to speak to the press and not to Parliament. In that way, the view given to the public is not the one that Parliament has debated, but the one that is spun to the press.

We are a parliamentary democracy. Those of us who believe in parliamentary democracy, even if we are not overwhelmed by this subject, must stand up time and again to demand that the House debates such questions, so that it takes the decisions and is able to help the Government to be a better Government. The press will not help this Government to be a better Government, but the Opposition can if there are debates rather than periods of an hour and a half in which the matter is not sufficiently discussed.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): I shall try my best in the time available to answer the questions of right hon. and hon. Members. I give a commitment that I will write to them on the specific points that I do not answer in my speech.

I shall first deal with the question of the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) about share fishermen. The issue will be the subject of consultation with the industry. We shall make submissions based on the appropriateness of any measure to specific industries. We did of course exempt share fishermen from the national minimum wage on the basis that they are self-employed. I hope that that assists the hon. Lady. Following consultation on all possible excluded sectors, the Government will make proposals in a way that meets the needs of particular industries.

If the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), who raised the issue of bakers, does not mind my saying so, he cannot have his cake and eat it. He cannot on the one hand say that he supports the proposals and on the other say that he wants this or that to be excluded. The baking industry is covered by the regulations.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) raised questions in respect of the House and its staff. His comments about the Speaker seemed flippant, given that the holder of that office is not covered by a contract of employment. The staff of both Houses of Parliament are covered by the proposals.

The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) raised questions about parliamentary scrutiny. As a member of the previous Government, he will know that, in 1972, the then Conservative Government passed the European Communities Act, which provides for European directives to be implemented by statutory instrument. All directives, including this one, have been scrutinised by the Select Committee on European Legislation. There has been public consultation on implementation—of two directives, if the previous consultation conducted by the Conservative Administration counts. [Interruption.] I am not running away from the debate. Indeed, I am absolutely delighted that we can debate these issues.

Mr. Hogg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: No, I have barely begun my speech.

Mr. Hogg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: No.

The Government are very proud of the fact that, within 18 months of coming to power, they have ensured that 3 million workers in Britain who did not get a holiday will receive one. Protection is being introduced.

The speech of the right hon. Member for Wokingham was hysterical. It was mostly trivia, and came from a member of a previous Government under whom a business went bust every three minutes, and 10 million people in England alone were unemployed at least once. Yet now he comes to the Dispatch Box and tries to trivialise issues around fairness in the workplace. The debate, and his 25-minute tirade, explain why Labour Members sit on the Government Benches and the Tories are in opposition.

Mr. Redwood rose—

Mr. McCartney: Listen first of all!

The debate has highlighted the different values of the parties: exploitation versus fairness, no respect versus respect, hire-and-fire culture versus partnership, bad employers versus good employers. The right hon. Gentleman used to work for Baroness Thatcher, who once coined the phrase that there was no such thing as community. He has coined another phrase: there is no such thing as fairness in the workplace. He said clearly that the Conservative party is on the side of poor employment practice. He should answer whether, at the next election, his party would remove the rights that this directive provides for many millions of British workers.

Mr. Redwood: I made it very clear that the Conservative party wants rising standards at work and better quality of employment. We have our ways of achieving that, which happen to be different from those of the Government. I repeat the question that the Minister does not want to answer. Given that better standards of work in nursing homes will cost money, will the Government pay for those better standards or throw old people on the street?

Mr. McCartney: The Government have put £21 billion extra into health and social care, which were underfunded by the previous Government, who created a crisis in both public and private sector community care. The right hon. Gentleman argues that vulnerable elderly people, disabled people and young children with special needs should be looked after by a work force who are falling on their knees through tiredness from working excessive hours. What a scandal!

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: No, I will not give way. The right hon. Gentleman had 25 minutes to speak. He berates the Government but he cannot take the truth when we set it out. The argument he put before the House is quite clear: he would support employers in the care sector who exploit their workers to the point that proper medical and social care needs are put at risk.

This Government believe in fairness. We believe that workers should enjoy basic protection against exploitation by unscrupulous employers. We recognise the fundamental imbalance in the relationship between worker and employer in the workplace where, on some occasions, workers need support. I thank my hon. Friends who have participated in the debate. In their short speeches, they have set out clearly why the legislation is necessary.

We recognise that providing such protection is not necessary for the majority of employees, but that such protection must apply to workers equally. It is important that good employers should not be undercut by bad ones who profit by exploiting their workers. That is not good for competitiveness or the United Kingdom in the long run.

In government, Conservative Members tried to create a Britain that was the sweatshop capital of Europe. We want to be the investment and production centre of Europe, based on high standards. We are therefore committed to creating a flexible labour market that is underpinned by fair minimum standards. The first step was the national minimum wage legislation; implementation of the proposals in the White Paper "Fairness at Work" will follow. Implementation of the working time directive represents another major stepping stone.

The regulations provide seven new rights. No worker can be forced to work more than an average of 48 hours a week. There is a right to paid annual leave of three weeks, rising to four weeks. Would the right hon. Member for Wokingham and his colleagues withdraw that right from the 3 million workers who will benefit from it for the first time? Will there be a wage cut under the Tories, as they withdraw the minimum wage and paid holidays?

Mr. Ian Bruce rose—

Mr. McCartney: Sit down.

There are rights to rest breaks during the working day. There are rights to rest periods from work, including the right to a day off a week. My God, who would object to someone having a day off a week? [HON. MEMBERS: "They would."] Only the Conservatives. There is special protection for night workers, including a right to health assessments. There is special protection for young workers. Moreover, there is protection from unfair dismissal or detriment for asserting those rights.

The Working Time Regulations 1998 provide protection for the most vulnerable workers and enable them to enjoy rights similar to those that the majority of workers in the United Kingdom and the rest of Europe already have. About 90 per cent. of workers in this country already have paid annual leave. Why are the Tories campaigning to prevent the other 10 per cent. having the same rights?

It takes the biscuit when the right hon. Member for Wokingham argues for 25 minutes against the proposals when he has had, typically, 16 weeks leave this year, paid for by the British taxpayer.

Mr. Redwood indicated dissent.

Mr. McCartney: I shall take some examples of cases of the type that the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues believe should not be helped. A lady writes to me:

"My husband works for a large medical company and has for the past 2 years worked on average 51 hours a week. During this period he has been off sick twice through stress and exploitation".

A contract cleaner in Oxford wrote to the Prime Minister:

"I would like in due course, if it's within your power, that we should all have at least two weeks fully paid holiday a year".

We have given her that commitment.

A lady from Sussex wrote to me about her daughter, who must work long hours and double shifts without proper breaks and is subjected to abuse by the manager. The regulations will combat such exploitation.

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: No. The right hon. Gentleman had 25 minutes.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman should give way instead of talking fiction.

Mr. McCartney: The right hon. Gentleman does not like to hear the truth. As someone who was a member of a Government who could not tell the truth, he does not like to hear it.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the hon. Gentleman give way to someone who has not even had a single minute?

Mr. McCartney: You are not worth a minute.

That type of exploitation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The Minister has indicated that he will not give way at the moment.

Mr. Bercow: He cannot take it.

Mr. McCartney: Oh, I can take it, all right; I am enjoying myself.

For the first time in a long time, we have a Government who are prepared to stand up for workers' rights against Conservative Members' bully-boy tactics. As we reach the end of the century, we cannot continue the long hours culture—long hours, low pay, low esteem. Employers do not want it; we do not want it. The only employers who want it are the employers who side with the Conservatives—those who want to exploit their work force for an advantage in the marketplace against other employers. This is not just a social issue; there is a strong business case for these proposals.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham spoke about costs. In the last year of the Conservative Government, the Confederation of British Industry estimated that £25 billion was lost to the economy as a result of unregulated absenteeism because of the sweatshop economy that the Conservatives controlled. Another £1.8 billion was lost as a result of high staff turnover—in sectors where the greatest number of jobs is lost due to low status and low morale.

The proposals before us will cut that huge loss to the British economy, and allow employers to compete on quality, but not by pursuing a downward spiral of wages and conditions. The Government are not the only ones who hold that opinion. The consultation was interesting. I quote the views of some employers.

"The Institute of Personnel and Development believes that the current proposals represent a significant improvement on those contained in the consultation document issued by the last Government. In many areas, the new document takes account of comments made . . . on issues that are important to the practicality of the Directive's provisions and their acceptability to both employers and employees."

Manpower, a big agency employer, said:

"Most notable for us has been Peter Mandelson's recent arrangement concerning the Government's intentions to respect temporary workers. Giving them the minimum pay, the working time regulations and 'Fairness at Work' achieves a major step forward in establishing minimum standards across the UK work force."

I could go on and on and on, quoting employers who support the proposals.

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: No; I am not giving way.

Following the consultation, small business employers telephoned the Department, expressing their pleasure that at last they would compete on a level playing field, instead of against employers who undercut them by exploiting their work force. Good employers in this country overwhelmingly support the proposals.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham spoke about record keeping. There are no over-burdensome bureaucratic record-keeping requirements. Employers need not keep records for entitlements to paid annual leave, rest breaks, daily rest or weekly rest. They need not monitor and record every hour that a worker works. They merely have to be able to show that they have complied with the limits, and how they do so is up to them. [Laughter.] Many employers—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should listen. Many employers already have records showing the hours that their workers have worked, and that relates to their normal business practice.

The Health and Safety Executive has said that, in other circumstances, it would be sufficient to have robust management systems that can show when workers are in danger of working close to the limit, and so take steps to monitor those workers more closely.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) rose—

Mr. Gummer rose—

Mr. McCartney: There is a slight anomaly—a requirement of the directive that hourly records be kept for workers who have agreed to work in excess of the 48-hour weekly working time limit. However, I make it perfectly clear that that is the result of the previous Government's woeful and bungled negotiations in 1993. If anyone is responsible for imposing unnecessary red tape on business, it is the Conservative party, because the Conservatives carried out the negotiations before the general election.

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. McCartney: No.

I shall make a few points on the timing of implementation of the regulations. Some recent comments—

Mr. Ian Bruce: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Clearly, the Minister is concerned about the time limits that have been artificially set on the debate. Our normal working time in the House continues until 10 o'clock. Do you have any power, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to allow the debate to continue until 10 o'clock, so that we may vote at our usual time, and so that the Minister may give way in the usual fashion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The length of the debate is regulated by Standing Order. The hon. Gentleman is only wasting more time.

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman also took up time at the start of the debate in fruitless points of order.

I should like to make a few points in relation to the timing of the implementation. Some recent comments make me wonder whether some Conservative Members have been asleep for the past 18 months. The working time directive is no secret that has been sprung on an unsuspecting world. The directive was agreed under the previous Government in 1993. It was due to be implemented by November 1996. However, all the previous Government did was try to buy time, leaving business uncertain, and spending taxpayers' money on futile attempts in the European Court to prevent the implementation of the directive.

What were the Tories preventing being implemented? Basic minimum standards for 3 million workers in Britain to have the right occasionally to say to their employer, "I am not working 80 or 90 hours a week. I want a break; I want a rest. I think that I am entitled, at the end of the century, to some holiday pay." That is what the previous Government tried to prevent by using taxpayers' money in a court case.

[Mr. McCartney]

Belatedly, at the end of 1996, forced and humiliated by the European Court, the previous Government issued a vague consultation document that made the situation no clearer. It has been left to the present Government to sort out the mess that they left us. We said in our manifesto that we would implement the directive. The timetable for implementation was announced to Parliament in February. We consulted on detailed proposals, including draft regulations, in April. The finalised regulations were laid before Parliament on 30 July, and came into force on 1 October.

It should be remembered that the implementation directive is already two years overdue because of the incompetence of the previous Government. We all know that the Conservatives, as has been confirmed tonight, do not want people in Britain to be rewarded with proper rest and paid holidays. During the debate, an Opposition Member advocated pay of £2 a day to replace the national minimum wage.

As a legacy of the previous Government, there are workers in Britain who must work 100 hours a week for minimal rates of pay. The working time directive, alongside the national minimum wage, will start to end the cycle of deprivation and exploitation in the work force. The Government are committed to a positive relationship with Europe and take their treaty responsibilities seriously. It has been necessary to take prompt action to rectify the neglect of the previous Administration.

There has recently been correspondence from hon. Members expressing concern about the so-called 12-day working week. I shall clarify the matter now. It is totally misleading to suggest that the regulations diminish the rights of workers or place them in a more vulnerable position in terms of "Sunday Special" arrangements. The regulations include a right to a day off a week, which may be averaged over a period of two weeks. That is a new right. Workers had no such right to a day off until 1 October this year. Therefore, I fail to see how the arrangement could do anything but improve the lot of workers.

The right to a day off may be averaged over a period of two weeks to allow flexibility and avoid unnecessary burdens on business. In most cases, rest will be taken on a weekly basis, but certain industries require differing and fluctuating work patterns that are not conducive to such a standardised arrangement. That flexible approach received widespread support in the responses to the consultation on the draft regulations.

The Government believe that the regulations provide minimum fair standards of protection for workers exploited by unscrupulous employers. Such rights have been denied to workers in this country for far too long. That is due to the Opposition, who continue to try to deny others the rights that they enjoy, such as paid leave. There has been ample time for consideration of the measure. I hope that the House will support me in opposing the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is—

Mr. Hogg rose—

Mr. Ian Bruce rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am about to put the Question.

Mr. Ian Bruce: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely the hour and a half is not up yet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour and a half is very nearly up. If the mover of the motion had chosen to respond at the end of the debate, that would be in order. The Minister has responded to the debate and I am about to put the Question.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Redwood: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I allowed my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) to intervene. He has been present for the entire debate and had important points to make, but he has been squeezed out by the Minister. I would regard it as a great courtesy if he were able to make his points.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already pointed out that it must be the mover of the motion who responds to the debate on that motion.

Mr. Redwood rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt with that point of order and I shall now put the Question.

Mr. Hogg rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall put the Question.

Russia

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

8.56 pm

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): I am pleased to initiate my second Adjournment debate since my election on an international subject that is very close to my heart. I chose to debate this topic tonight as a result of an Inter-Parliamentary Union trip that I made to Russia last June. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) led the trip, to Moscow and St. Petersburg, and I am delighted to see several members of that delegation in the Chamber tonight. The right hon. Gentleman and some other members of the delegation were returning to Russia, but it was my first visit to that country. They were able to see the changes that had taken place since their previous visits, while I could only look on in wonder.

To understand the economic crisis now befalling Russia, one must understand the political crisis. If one were to ask schoolchildren the date of the Russian revolution, they would answer "1917". However, the revolution of perestroika, begun in the late 1980s by Mikhail Gorbachev, is far and away the greatest change that Russian society has seen this century. That revolution brought so much political change so quickly that the political crisis that followed it has now led to economic catas[illegible]

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): Would my hon. Friend care to speculate on what the history books will make of Mikhail Gorbachev? Some people see him as the man who changed the world, but the Russian people who voted in the last presidential election gave him only 1 per cent. of the vote—so they are not happy with him. I had the privilege of meeting Mikhail Gorbachev in 1993 when he visited my constituency. What does my hon. Friend make of the long-term view of what Mikhail Gorbachev has done to a once great super-power?

Mr. Keetch: I think that Mikhail Gorbachev will be remembered slightly better by history than the present president, President Yeltsin. Russia is the one place in the world where I would not advocate that people vote Liberal Democrat. It is somewhat embarrassing every time a Liberal Democrat visits that country.

The revolution that brought so much political change has led to an economic crisis in Russia. In short, the transition that the United Kingdom effected over hundreds of years—the transition from absolute ruler to democracy—has taken place in Russia in under a decade. It is no wonder that there are problems. It is interesting to examine what has changed. Russia has gone from a super-power surrounded by client states, with power vested in a few people, to a country by itself. In doing so, it has lost many of its more prosperous and plentiful territories. It has been stripped of much of its international pride and position. It has seen the dismantling of the military economic machine that used to drive it. In short, Russia is now regarded by the world as the loser in the cold war.

With no democratic tradition to fall back on, it is not surprising that, in 10 years, such dramatic change has been less than smooth. The reforms that President

Gorbachev introduced, ending in the coup that almost toppled him, resulted in the end of the Soviet Union in 1991. The changes to the constitution forced upon parliament by President Yeltsin ended in his troops shelling Parliament in October 1993. The subsequent rivalry between the Duma and the president continues today. These are some of the factors that have formed a breeding ground for economic chaos.

Boris Yeltsin's health, too, declining during this period, has led to a situation today which would have been, for many Russians, unthinkable only a few years ago—a Russian president who is the butt of jokes at home and abroad, a living embarrassment to all Russians. It is no exaggeration to say that the Russian economy today is as sick as the Russian president.

It is sometimes difficult to make comparisons, but the output of Russia now is barely half what it was in 1989. Officially, central Government expenditure this year was set at 500 billion roubles, with revenue coming in at just 367 billion roubles. In other words, that is Government expenditure of £17.5 billion with an income of just £13 billion. That deficit would be bad enough, but in reality nothing like that revenue has been achieved. Add to that the crippling debt burden of 121 billion roubles a year, and the crisis was inevitable.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Would my hon. Friend agree that the sad tale that he describes for Russia is almost the opposite of the success stories of the recovering economies such as Estonia, which broke free from the Soviet Union? Does he agree that, as Estonia develops, links with western Europe should be built? At the same time, my hon. Friend will know that there are concerns in the Baltic states that Russia might cast an ominous eye again. Does he agree with the adage that people who live in glasnost should not throw Estonians?

Mr. Keetch: My hon. Friend is well known for his sense of humour and Estonian connections. I have visited the Baltic states, and have been to Lithuania on two occasions. I know of the enormous success and leaps forward of some of the Baltic economies. Estonia is a shining example, and we should certainly support its economy.

The crisis in Russia is far from over. The Morgan Stanley Dean Witter brief on the Russian economy recently highlighted industrial production in August down by 8.5 per cent. The economic growth forecasts that it was suggesting, being at the bottom range of minus 2 per cent. for 1998 and 1999, are being revised downwards to minus 5 per cent. for this year and minus 10 per cent. for next year.

In the cities such as Moscow and St. Petersburg that I and my colleagues visited, the semblance of Russian economic prosperity exists. There are McDonald's restaurants, expensive shops and advertising, all features of the Russian scene that are new over the past few years. However, it is not necessary to go far from the city centres to come across vast Soviet-style tenement blocks where millions of people live. These are huge, cold and dark buildings, often with no electricity or water supply. These are the hovels which ordinary Russians call home.

In St. Petersburg alone, the population has fallen by more than 600,000 since the early 1990s. People have moved into the country to try to find food. Those who stay have their own allotments. They try to grow what they can. However, the search for food is a desperate one. Life in the provinces is even worse than that in the cities.

Anybody who has seen a second world war film, especially about prisoner of war camps, will have heard about Red Cross parcels. Yet today the Red Cross is trying to launch a £10 million appeal for food for Russia. It is distributing Red Cross food parcels to people who cannot feed themselves in Russia. This once great super-power now receives international food aid.

Medicine, too, is in short supply. Shortages of basic medicine have led to a huge rise in diseases that we in the west long thought had disappeared. Poor diet and even starvation have led to huge numbers of Russians dying from economic neglect. Last year alone, more than 10,000 prisoners in Russian gaols died of illness. The life expectancy of the Russian male is now below 60. In all, last year, almost 25,000 Russians died of tuberculosis, and another 2 million are infected. Even so, in Moscow four hospitals are kept just for Members of Parliament, bureaucrats and army chiefs, ensuring that the elite remain healthy. Even bank robbers in Russia now go short. In a recent break-in at the Vimpel bank in central Moscow, thieves got away with the total takings of just 13,000 roubles—about £120.

Perhaps the biggest and most widely talked about of the economic problems is the late payment of salaries. Wage arrears in the public sector are estimated to be around £750 million, resulting in despair for hundreds of thousands of families. Doctors, nurses and teachers go unpaid. In Russia today, people strike not for better pay, but simply to be paid.

The story is similar for state pensioners, and even in the armed forces salaries are sometimes not paid. Wage arrears were supposed to have been stopped last July, but in reality still exist. Stories of soldiers selling off their weapons and equipment to terrorists for money to live are not exaggerated. Not surprisingly, that has led to huge discontent in the army—no wonder, in a country where officers and their families sleep four to a room.

In 1997 alone, 304 murders were recorded in the Russian armed forces, and, following the Chechen military debacle which shook Russian military confidence, the economic crisis has hit the once proud Red Army. An army that once defeated Hitler's Nazis is now at rock bottom. There is no money for research and development, training is minimal, and exercise is unknown. Reductions in manpower in the Russian armed forces are huge, with some 300,000 officers and non-commissioned officers a year being made redundant. It is interesting that the Interior Ministry troops who were so loyal to President Yeltsin in 1993 are still being paid, but no one today believes that they would once again rush to his aid should he need it.

Even the environment is against the Russian economy. In one region of southern Russia, Kalmykia, more than 25 villages have had to be abandoned in the past 20 years due to the spread of a desert. An area the size of Belgium is now sand.

What can we do? One thing that anyone who knows Russia will tell us is that the Russian people have long memories. Other countries may abandon Russia and other Governments pull their people out, but we in the United Kingdom must not. We owe it to the Russian people and to world stability to ensure that the Russian foray into democracy is a success. We must preserve the rule of law in Russia, because, if we do not, we shall simply see the rule of terror.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in Russia there is a great sense of friendship towards Britain, and that, as one of the major problems affecting the Russian economy is massive tax evasion and the influence of organised crime, that is one area in which that friendship could be used to assist the Russian people to tackle those problems in order to move their economy forward?

Mr. Keetch: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. She well knows the plight of the Russian people, having, like me, been a member of the IPU delegation. I am not necessarily calling for more monetary aid, but the kind of schemes that she has suggested—she is involved in schemes with the British Council—would do much to help support Russia.

When we were there, we saw the people who might lead Russia should the Russian foray into democracy fail—former Communists who believe that the Soviet-style planned economy did work, nationalists who believe that President Yeltsin illegally gave independence to Russian territories and who want those territories back. We even met liberals who talk about NATO expansion as a real threat to mother Russia. Madam Speaker has similarly returned from Russia, having met many of the same people.

I did not initiate this debate to obtain answers, because we may not be able to give them, but the House must make it known to democrats throughout Russia that we will not abandon them. Our Government must re-emphasise their pledge to support British programmes in Russia, such as the excellent ones run by the British Council, to help democracy survive. The British Council is now looking at close links between our two nations, including links between schools, and establishing information technology links with schools and exchanges for Russian teachers and children. The Government must support those schemes. We must encourage more business and trade with Russia. Most of all, our foreign policy must support the pro-reformers and those who want democracy to survive.

Imagine the prize of success for Russia—a country that is democratic, reformed and economically buoyant. That prize should be our principal foreign policy objective.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I gave my hon. Friend notice before the debate that I might intervene. Given the enormity of the problems, does he agree that no nation state alone can offer assistance, and that the best hope lies in the aid programmes to which we can contribute through the European Union?

Mr. Keetch: My hon. Friend is right. Britain cannot solve the problems by itself, but it is important to remember that it has a special relationship with Russia. The Russian people are understandably suspicious of the Germans, the Japanese and the Americans. They would welcome British involvement, and I hope that the Government will take a lead in that.

The price of failing to support the Russian economy is huge. In its negotiations in the forthcoming weeks, the International Monetary Fund must not seek to impose on the Russian Government the terms normally accepted for IMF support, because Russia could not take them.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): The hon. Gentleman is developing an interesting and powerful speech. On IMF support, the conditionality that has been imposed has been to collect taxes that are lawfully due. My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) referred to that a moment ago. Does he accept the fundamental point that taxes lawfully raised must be paid if Russia is to be the success that he wants it to be?

Mr. Keetch: I certainly accept that, but I hope that the IMF will not only put in place conditions but provide practical support that will allow Russia to meet those conditions. Russia simply cannot meet those conditions by itself. As the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) said, it needs our practical help and experience in collecting those taxes.

History has a nasty habit of repeating itself. We all know what happened to Germany in the 1930s after it had been made to pay too high a price for losing the first world war. Let us not expect Russia to pay too high a price for losing the cold war. The world has never known a super-power with a vast arsenal of nuclear weapons that cannot pay its employees. The House and the Government must get the message across to Russia that we will not let it give up on democracy. If it does, the whole world will suffer.

9.12 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I thank the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) for his initiative in introducing this debate, and congratulate him on his excellent speech and evident interest in, and concern and knowledge about, the conditions in Russia. His description of the state of the economy and of Russian society is absolutely right. As he said, gross domestic product has fallen by 10 per cent. in the past 12 months, inflation has risen by 50 per cent., and tax revenue, which was never particularly good, is shrinking rapidly. Clearly, barter and non-payment are rapidly on the rise. Perhaps most distressing of all is the catastrophic drop in life expectancy, particularly among men, since the fall of communism, exacerbated by the current economic crisis.

The position is as serious and distressing to everyone as the hon. Gentleman has described. However, it must be understood that responsibility for tackling the problem lies, as it must, with the Russian Government. We cannot guarantee law and order, or economic stability and all the other things that Russia needs. It is for the Russian Government to take a lead and to implement the policies which will bring real economic and social benefits to a country in immense distress.

The priority is clear: Russia needs to develop a coherent macro-economic framework and to get its public finances under control, because without that, it cannot regain economic stability. It certainly has to introduce tax and expenditure reform, and needs to restructure its banking sector, because there is near-bankruptcy or worse among many of its banks. It needs to close insolvent enterprises, and to tackle the problem of barter and non-payment. It of course has to develop and try to enforce the essential, the basic, legal and institutional framework of a market economy, because that is clearly missing.

The hon. Member for Hereford and my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) mentioned the excellent work of the British Council. As a short-lived former vice-chair of that organisation, I also pay tribute to the work that it has been doing in know-how transfer, and in helping to build that capacity within Russia.

The Government are not only actively monitoring the situation in Russia, but are in regular contact with our partners there, in the G7 and in the European Union. The Russian Government are, however, still formulating their economic policies. We and our international partners—this cannot be done by one country alone—remain ready to support and work with Russia, and with its Government, in support of sustained efforts towards stabilisation and reform.

As the hon. Member for Hereford said, the international community must be ready to back International Monetary Fund financial assistance, but that assistance must be given in support of credible and sustained efforts by Russia towards stabilisation and economic reform. There is no point in supporting policies which will not work.

We, and our partners in the EU and the G7, are more than ready to help with this process, and we are re-focusing the technical assistance programmes accordingly. The international community also needs to continue to monitor the situation on food supplies and on medical supplies. If there is clear need, we must and will be ready to ensure that humanitarian assistance is provided.

I should like to connect the situation in Russia, which the hon. Member for Hereford described so vividly, with the second half of the title of the debate—the world economy. The direct effects of the crisis in Russia are relatively small—before the collapse, Russia contributed about 1 per cent. of total world output, and accounted for 1.5 per cent. of world trade—but that is not the case for certain countries. Ukraine, which does a quarter of its trade with Russia, was particularly badly affected, and remains so even today.

There is also a direct impact on those banks, especially in Germany, which were severely exposed to the situation in Russia, but the indirect effects on the rest of the world economy—the contagion of the collapse in Russia and the default on debt—are of immense concern, to the hon. Member for Hereford, his hon. Friends and all of us.

Japan, the world's second largest economy, is expected to contract by 2.5 per cent. this year, and that following several years of low growth. Another region—which, hitherto, had been the growth engine of the world economy—also faces unprecedented declines. We are all affected, and not only for humanitarian reasons. We are dependent on each other's goods and services—the Asian crisis has cut United Kingdom exports to Indonesia, Malaysia, South Korea and Thailand by between 50 and 60 per cent. in a single year—and, as we have seen over recent months, a weak financial system in one country then threatens the financial systems of other countries. We are having to deal with the consequences of the financial turmoil and the destabilising lack of transparency.

We are faced with a crisis that grew because of weak, under-supervised financial institutions in developing economies, and which became global because of deficiencies in supervision and in risk management, even in developed economies. It became a prolonged crisis because the initial policy responses were more suitable for over-extended pubic sectors than for over-exposed private sectors.

Not only in Russia, but across a large part of the world, this crisis has become a human tragedy for millions of people. They are the victims of inadequate social protection. We must deal with the situation in Russia, and continue to work with the Russian Government to try to support efforts to achieve first political stabilisation and then economic and social stabilisation. We must also deal with the problems in the global economy. We must begin by addressing the short-term problems. We should recognise that the balance of risks has changed, and act accordingly.

Monetary authorities around the world continue to be vigilant. Crucially, G7 countries have committed themselves to creating or sustaining the conditions for demand-led growth and financial stability in their own economies. In addition, we must address the underlying longer-term problems that have contributed to the current crisis in Russia, Japan and in the world economy. That requires an international financial architecture that is suited to today's global economy, not to yesterday's.

For 50 years, the world economy has had policies for regulation, supervision, transparency and stability that were devised and developed for a world of relatively sheltered national economies with limited capital markets. We must now create procedures for supervision, transparency, regulation and stability that are as sophisticated as the markets with which they have to work, and try to prevent the collision of inadequately regulated global capital flows with inadequately developed and supervised national banking systems, which has been a common feature of the crisis in many countries.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): I hesitate to intervene, but last week I was in Moscow, and I had the opportunity to talk to members of the Duma about the current crisis in Russia. They said, "It's not money we want from the west. We need to know how we can stop our wealth draining out of our country." That is the problem at the moment. It is like pouring water into a colander. Last year, 40 per cent. of Russia's oil went on to the black market, without anyone knowing where it had gone to. They need such assistance more than some high-flown IMF package which will impose conditions that they will not be able to comply with.

Trade is more important than anything. Over the years, the central European free trade agreement has worked well for the countries of central Europe. The sooner we extend that eastwards into Russia, whose centre of gravity is European, the better it will be, not only for Russia, but for the rest of Europe and the rest of the world.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman makes two extremely important points. He is right about the importance of trying to re-establish and to develop trading relationships with Russia, and to draw it into that broader European family. That in turn depends on securing a financial and legal infrastructure for its economy. As he rightly says, the wealth and income that they ought to have in Russia is draining out faster than they can replenish it. That is an issue for those who might wish, or be able, to trade with Russia, and to benefit from such a trading relationship. The trading relationship itself will require an adequate economic and legal infrastructure—in other words, the fundamentals of a market economy in Russia.

I agree with the hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin). It does not come down simply to the question of a financial architecture and sorting out Russia's banking system, although that is important; it also comes down to technical assistance. It comes down to the help that we can give the Russians to secure the basics of a functioning market economy with a functioning legal and contractual system, and with something resembling an efficient tax collection system.

Unfortunately, Russia must act on many different fronts at the same time. I do not think that it is possible to work on the trading end of the relationship without also working with Russia to put in place the basics of the economic infrastructure that it so badly needs.

That, in a sense, is precisely the point of what we and our partners in the G7 and the European Union are trying to do to establish a stronger, modernised global financial and trading architecture. National Governments, helped by international institutions, need to set clear, clearly understood, long-term policy objectives that will build confidence and establish their credibility. That applies to all countries, whether they are beginning the process of creating and developing market economies or are a long way down the line. That is why the Government have welcomed the International Monetary Fund's new code of good practice on fiscal policy, and look forward to similar codes of conduct on monetary and financial policy.

The new economy, however, also requires much more transparency in the private sector. That is why we are urging the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to conclude rapidly its work on a code of conduct for corporate governance.

Events in Russia—and, indeed, throughout the world—in recent months have identified inadequacies in our understanding of the interrelationship between financial markets and between countries, inadequacies in the quality of risk assessment, and gaps in the international regulatory system. There is an urgent need for us to look at the scope for a new Standing Committee and for global financial regulation.

We must also continue to be vigilant in regard to the threat of protectionism. It is perhaps most likely to arise in relation to the countries of south-east Asia, but—as the hon. Member for Hereford pointed out—it is crucial in terms of our own relationships with the countries of eastern Europe. We need to work with the World Trade Organisation to ensure that there is a proper start to the next round of trade negotiations, so that we can take the necessary steps to ensure openness in trade.

Last night—also in response to the Liberal Democrats—my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and I outlined the measures that the Government were taking, and had taken, to put the United Kingdom on to a path of stability. They are all the more important given the instability in the world economy.

One of the trigger points for that instability is the crisis in Russia to which the hon. Member for Hereford has so eloquently drawn attention. I assure him, and the House, that—both on behalf of this country and in co-operation with our colleagues in the G7 and the European Union—we will continue to do everything possible to assist the Russian Government to put their country on to the path of economic, political and social stability that its people so badly need.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-eight minutes past Nine o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 28 October 1998

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Cyprus

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

9.33 am

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I particularly welcome your presence, Madam Speaker, at the beginning of our proceedings, as I realise that we are debating a subject that is of some interest to you. Indeed, it is a subject in which you have considerable expertise.

I may be wrong, but I think that this occasion may mark the Minister's debut at the Dispatch Box in a debate on Cyprus.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin) indicated assent.

Mr. Amess: I welcome her to the debate.

I should perhaps say that I am not Greek or Turkish, but a British Member of Parliament who was born in London. Some of my constituents would probably say, "David, there is enough to worry about in Southend without expending your efforts in a debate on the future of the tiny island of Cyprus." I suppose that such a sentiment sums up how hon. Members are thought of today—largely as an alternative councillor and glorified social worker, overlooking our national and international roles.

I strongly believe that the future of Cyprus is and should be of great concern to all hon. Members, particularly because of the island's strategic defence importance. The presence in the Chamber of so many hon. Members demonstrates that many others share my views on the importance of Cyprus's future.

I made my most recent visit to Cyprus, at the end of August, as a guest of the Cypriot Brotherhood. I went as part of an all-party group, which included my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright)—who had hoped to attend this debate but, unfortunately, is otherwise engaged. We met in Cyprus, on an all-party basis, many different people, and were very pleased to meet President Clerides.

After that visit, I felt great frustration at the lack of progress in achieving a fair and peaceful resolution of the situation in Cyprus. Although the Minister may say that it is unfair to criticise that lack of progress, my criticism is not directed at her or the Government. I applied for this Adjournment debate, for which I am grateful, because of that frustration.

In my time as an hon. Member, there have been many debates on the future of Cyprus. Although I certainly do not pretend that I am an expert on the subject, I am still entitled to my views on it. The chances are that no original views will be expressed in this debate, but—who knows—today may be an historic occasion. Perhaps, in future years, we will be able to claim that today's debate made an important contribution in finding a resolution to the problem.

It may surprise the House to learn that, in my constituency of Southend, West, I have very few Greek Cypriot constituents. The overwhelming number of my Cypriot constituents are Turkish. I believe that I have very good relations with those Turkish Cypriots, with whom I have interesting exchanges on matters concerning Cyprus. Nevertheless, I should make it clear now that my own sympathies lie with the arguments that have been enunciated by those on the Greek side of the issue.

Cyprus, as we all know, is undoubtedly a very beautiful island, but its landscape has been entirely marred by the green line. Hon. Members may have been sent a photographic record of the line by Doris Partasides. For those who like looking at pictures and are not so interested in text, that record graphically demonstrates the tragedy that is Cyprus. I thought of Miss Havisham and her frustrated wedding feast when I looked at the photographs, which show the eeriness and tragedy of the green line—and which is madness. Surely it cannot be in the interests of the Cypriot people to have a divided island.

We ignore history at our peril. The history of the occupation of Cyprus over the centuries is used by the Greek and Turkish Governments partly to justify their positions. I know that there are hon. Members here this morning who are drawn to both sides of the argument. As we know, Cyprus finally achieved independence in 1960, but that independence was short lived. In the summer of 1974, Turkey, following a military coup against President Makarios, invaded the island. That is a fact, and cannot be disputed.

Mr. Jamie Cann (Ipswich): I do not like the word "invaded". Turkey was one of the guarantor powers of the treaty of independence. Under that treaty, Turkey intervened in a military coup that was taking place in Cyprus and during which Turkish citizens were being massacred.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): Why are the Turkish troops still there?

Mr. Amess: There we are—

Mr. Cann: Madam Speaker, may I respond to the sedentary intervention of the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale)?

Madam Speaker: I did not hear it. Is the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) giving way?

Mr. Amess: I should like to reply to the first intervention. There we are—we have heard the Turkish view of events. I said that we ignore history at our peril, and we seem to have two versions of history. I do not want to waste hon. Members' time by engaging in semantics, as many want to speak. The hon. Gentleman has expressed his point of view; we shall have to agree to differ.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it was also part of the terms of the treaty that any troops who went to the island should leave as soon as possible and return the status quo ante?

Mr. Amess: Yes, I am delighted to be able to agree whole-heartedly with the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of history, with which I know another hon. Member disagrees.

What I was about to say—it might please the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann) a little—is that we must not forget that the military coup was carried out by the Greek junta. The Turkish Government at the time said that their action was aimed at re-establishing the status quo created by the Cyprus treaty of independence. Constitutional order was indeed restored within a week, but the invading forces—I know that the hon. Member for Ipswich does not like that description—extended their operations and occupied 37 per cent. of the republic's territory. Tragically, as a result of that, 5,000 Greek Cypriots lost their lives.

Mr. Eddie O'Hara (Knowsley, South): Whether we call it invasion or intervention, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the continued occupation of 37 per cent. of northern Cyprus since 1974 by the Turkish army is in contravention of Turkey's powers under the treaty of guarantee?

Mr. Amess: Again, I am pleased to be able to agree with the hon. Gentleman whom I was privileged to accompany on a visit last year. He has great expertise in these matters as he was stationed in Cyprus for some time. I whole-heartedly agree with his interpretation of the facts.

Five thousand Greek Cypriots lost their lives, nearly 200,000 became refugees and 1,619 are still unaccounted for. Greek Cypriots believe strongly that Turkey began a programme of demographic change in the occupied zone. Settlers from Turkey were allowed to establish themselves on the island as full citizens with the right to vote. In 1983, Mr. Denktas declared a separate state. The international community—again, this is a matter of fact—unanimously rejected that action. Today, the occupied territory is recognised by Turkey alone.

As evidence of how the Greek Cypriots feel, I want to quote a wide-ranging speech made by the re-elected President Clerides to the General Assembly of the United Nations on 25 September. In it, he set out his proposals for the future of Cyprus. It shows clearly the Greek Cypriots' claim that their efforts to achieve a settlement have been frustrated, although I know that some hon. Members will disagree. President Clerides said:

"As regards Security Council and General Assembly Resolutions calling for the speedy withdrawal of all foreign armed forces and personnel from the Republic of Cyprus, not only the Turkish Armed Forces and personnel have not been withdrawn but they have been increased and upgraded to such an extent that the previous Secretary-General Mr. Boutros Ghali described in his report to the Security Council the occupied part of Cyprus as the most militarized area in the world."

Mr. Cann: Rubbish.

Mr. Amess: The hon. Gentleman shouts, "Rubbish", but I was quoting the President of Cyprus. The hon. Gentleman is entitled to disagree.

President Clerides continued:

"UN resolutions for the return of the refugees to their homes under conditions of safety were not implemented not only because Turkish Forces prevented the refugees to return, but also because Turkey, violating other provisions of UN resolutions calling on all parties concerned to avoid any action to change the demographic composition of the population of Cyprus, imported to Cyprus thousands of illegal settlers from Turkey, usurped the properties of the refugees and installed settlers into them."

He continued:

"The recent demand of the Turkish Cypriot leader Mr. Denktash in the presence of the Turkish Foreign Minister for a confederation solution violates all UN resolutions, which call for a bizonal, bicommunal federation with a single sovereignty, international personality and citizenship, and is aimed at derailing the negotiating process from the base of the UN resolutions on Cyprus, but also at extinguishing the independence of the Republic of Cyprus and creating under the guise of a Turkish Cypriot Republic a Turkish colony in Cyprus or to say the least a Turkish protectorate."

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most significant factors in what has happened has been the refusal of Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots to pay any heed to repeated United Nations resolutions? The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann). who intervened on my hon. Friend and continues to laugh at his speech, might not like it, but the fact remains that it is Turkey and Turkish Cypriots who have continued to flout the will of the United Nations.

Mr. Amess: I agree with my hon. Friend. That was certainly the evidence that we found on our recent visit.

President Clerides went on to say:

"The non-implementation of United Nation Resolutions on Cyprus tarnishes the image of the United Nations and its main bodies. The former Secretary-General Mr. Boutros Boutros Ghali has in one of his reports to the Security Council identified that a cause for the absence of progress in Cyprus is the lack of political will on the part of the Turkish side. With that report the diagnosis of the causes of the failure to make progress towards a solution is completed. Is it too much for the people of Cyprus to ask what will the next step be? Will the United Nations finally take the necessary action to apply the required remedy in order to put an end to the tragedy that has befallen our small state and which continues for 24 years?"

That is President Clerides's interpretation of the current position, but hon. Members are entitled to agree or not. However, it would be foolish of the House not to unite in agreement with President Clerides, who says of his vision for Cyprus:

"I want all Cypriots to have security in their homes and their communities. I want all Cypriots to pursue their livelihoods".

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): I believe that we, in the United Kingdom, wish the Turkish Cypriots in northern Cyprus and the Greeks to enjoy security and safety. However, I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has made no reference to the reason why the Turkish Cypriots lack that comfort and security—the betrayal by successive British Governments in failing to play their part and guarantee the security to which the Turkish Cypriots were entitled, and which was denied them by an expansionist Greek regime.

Mr. Amess: The hon. Gentleman, as an Ulster Unionist, knows all about political difficulties, and I do not dismiss his contribution this morning. He has placed on the record his version of events. Later I may—without necessarily criticising the Government—agree with part of what he says.

Mr. Gale: Does my hon. Friend agree that a very significant number of Turkish Cypriots have found it necessary to leave the island of Cyprus and are now resident in Australia, New Zealand and, indeed, in London and other parts of the United Kingdom? They have done so as a direct result of the fact that they feel unsafe under what is termed their own regime in the northern part of Cyprus.

Mr. Amess: I agree unequivocally. Last year, that fear was evident, especially when we visited Famagusta. He is entirely right that, as a result, many people have now chosen to live in Australia.

Mr. Cann: Does the hon. Gentleman also recognise that the second largest population of Greek people in one town is in Melbourne in Australia?

Mr. Amess: To allow everyone to speak, I shall—I hope without being discourteous to others—move on quickly and conclude my speech.

I had hoped—obviously the hope was futile—that hon. Members might unite in agreement with President Clerides, who has said:

"I want all Cypriots to have security in their homes and their communities. I want all Cypriots to pursue their livelihoods free of economic restrictions and the fear of instability. I want all Cypriot children to know their distinct culture and religious heritage and to be able to carry their identity and political rights into the future without fear of domination from any quarter."

In 1991, the Cyprus Government applied for full membership of the European Union. I support their application, not least because I believe in the enlargement of the community. I understand that the negotiation process is taking place at the moment, as it is for the six other countries that have applied to join the Union. We know that Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot leader have declared their opposition to the admission of Cyprus. After the long years of uncertainty for the Cypriot people, I believe that the British Government have a great responsibility to encourage Cyprus in its application, and I hope that we shall take positive steps to encourage an amicable and peaceful settlement to the Cypriot problem.

Often people say to me, "There is no problem between the Cypriot people; the problem is between the Greek and the Turkish Governments." I do not know whether that is the case, but the Turkish Cypriot community in my constituency says that it has no argument with the Greek Cypriot community.

Mr. Love: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Amess: For the last time.

Mr. Love: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Cyprus's application for accession to the EU may act as a catalyst in bringing the two communities together and finding a resolution to the problem of the division of that island?

Mr. Amess: I agree whole-heartedly. As a Conservative Member of Parliament, I might be somewhat sceptical about some elements of the EU, but I entirely agree that membership can, in a very positive sense, bring about a lasting settlement.

So often, personalities determine events. I was optimistic that the last Prime Minister but one of Turkey—who, tragically, died following a heart attack—might have been instrumental in bringing about a settlement. Today, we need strong personalities to achieve that. I hope that the Minister will address several issues. If she does not have time to respond this morning, perhaps she will write to me on the matter, but I should like to know in detail, eventually, precisely what Her Majesty's Government are trying to do in a practical sense to bring about a settlement.

In my constituency, members of the Turkish Cypriot community are troubled by the present visa requirements. They say that there never used to be any difficulty. They find it insulting when mothers and fathers are now required to have visas. I do not know the truth of that; would the Minister kindly let me know?

On another matter, which may not seem relevant to the future of Cyprus, I am deeply involved in supporting members of the Cypriot community who are concerned about the tragic consequences of thalassaemia, and I am working with them to raise money to combat it. I have first-hand knowledge of that tragic illness, which is a blood disorder that destroys the lives of young people mainly. I know that Her Majesty's Government's resources for the health service are greatly stretched at the moment, but I wonder whether the Minister could offer any words on what we are trying to do to combat that disease. Next year, I shall visit the northern and southern sides of Cyprus, and I shall present a cheque to the appropriate authorities to try to help fight it.

Nothing could be more graphic than a visit to Famagusta to demonstrate the futility of the situation. Last year, I visited the island with the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) and the hon. Member whose constituency I have forgotten.

Mr. O'Hara: Knowsley, South.

Mr. Amess: I am sorry; I meant the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara). We spent time with the mayor, deputy mayor and other councillors. We learnt at first hand their experiences—the real fear that exists.

I know that the Cypriots are looking to the United States of America to take a lead in this matter. In July 1996, Madeleine Albright, US Secretary of State, said:

"a settlement to the Cyprus problem is long overdue . . . finding a just and lasting settlement that will end the longstanding division of Cyprus is one of my highest priorities".

I believe that the expectations that arose from that statement have not been fulfilled. Sadly, the American Administration is somewhat flawed and distracted at the moment.

All Cypriot people want a future for their country. Anyone visiting the island must surely conclude that the present situation is totally unsatisfactory. It is now up to all political leaders who are of good will, especially in this country, to unite in saying that the situation has persisted for far too long. In the name of decency, we must ensure that the two communities can live, work and prosper together in a free, united and demilitarised Cyprus. That surely must be the future of Cyprus.

[Mr. Amess]

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am delighted to see that there is a great deal of interest in the debate, but we have little time for it. I appeal to hon. Members to be brisk and short, because I want to call as many as possible.

9.59 am

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on initiating this debate and on his long and honourable contribution to Cyprus. I endorse his comments about my hon. Friend the Minister. He is right to say that this is her first appearance as Minister in a debate on Cyprus, but it is by no means the first time that she has taken part in such debates. Few Foreign Office Ministers have comparable knowledge of Cyprus. In opposition, she was deeply involved with the issue.

I chair the all-party Cyprus group. We are committed to helping the people of Cyprus—Greek or Turkish—to develop their country and live in peace and security. The debate is about the future of Cyprus. The hon. Member for Southend, West has outlined some of the events since 1974. We all look for progress on a settlement to the long-running tragedy, but we have often seen our hopes fall away. The tragedy of Cyprus is that its potential has never been developed. The island is popular with tourists from all over the world, creating vast income and employment. The island also has agricultural potential, bringing further income and employment. The skills of the Cypriot people, their education ability, their employment skills and the fact that there is an established democracy—that is Cyprus 1998, on which the future can be built.

Many of us have campaigned on issues that we regarded as vital to Cyprus over the years. Sadly, we have not made the progress that we all wanted. The hon. Member for Southend, West referred to Famagusta, which is one of the most beautiful towns on the island, as my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) can testify. It is now in the occupied area. It is a ghost town where no one lives. We have long hoped that Famagusta would be returned to the Republic of Cyprus. Promises were made that it would be returned, but they have been reneged on.

Mr. Cann: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cox: I am not giving way.

The people of Cyprus will never give up hope that their town will be returned. That would have been the real test for the future of Cyprus. The lack of progress on the return of Famagusta is disappointing, but there is a wonderful opportunity for the future of Cyprus—membership of the European Union. Its application is under active consideration. I am pleased that the Government and many other member states fully support that application. President Clerides deserves great credit for his repeated clear and honourable statements that Cyprus' application for membership is for the whole island, for the benefit of both Greek and Turkish Cypriots, and that membership of the European Union will benefit all Cypriots. He has repeatedly invited Mr. Denktas and the Turkish Cypriots to join him in the negotiating team on EU membership.

Mr. Gale: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cox: I cannot give way because of the time.

Sadly, Mr. Denktas has not co-operated with President Clerides's generous and honourable offers. Instead, further demands and criticisms have been made about the application. I have the greatest respect and regard for my hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that the Government will tell Mr. Denktas clearly that we shall not tolerate his attitude. We must tell him and his friends in Ankara that we fully support Cyprus's application for membership of the European Union. There is no reason why the other 14 members of the European Union should not give equal support.

My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have repeatedly told Turkey in recent months that it has a future in Europe and will one day be able to seek membership of the European Union. I have no objections to that, although, like other hon. Members, I have some reservations about Turkey and many of its actions, particularly within its own borders. The Government should tell Turkey that if it seeks a role in the Europe that is developing, we have a right to tell it to use its influence and friendship with those who can help to ensure that President Clerides's application is fully supported.

I shall close now, because many hon. Members want to speak. I warmly support the comments of the hon. Member for Southend, West in the debate. We know that Cyprus wants to develop its future for all the people of the island—Greek and Turkish. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say clearly that we support the application and President Clerides's generous and honourable offer to Mr. Denktas, because that is a real opportunity, which hon. Members on both sides fully support. I look to my hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to give full support to this opportunity for the future of Cyprus so that that beautiful island and its people, with their enormous skills, can develop the opportunity that membership of the European Union will give them.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. May I inform the House that this is a very short debate, in which many hon. Members wish to take part? Short speeches would therefore be appreciated.

10.9 am

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): I am very grateful to be called, and I shall be extremely brief. I shall make two points. Before I do, I should declare a recorded interest as a visitor to Cyprus as the guest of the Morphou municipality and the Greek Cypriot Brotherhood. Very recently, in addition to those visits, I was able, through the good offices of the British high commission, to visit, in the company of hon. Members from both sides of the House, the northern, occupied part of Cyprus—affording no recognition whatever to the illegal regime—and meet a representative of the leader of the Turkish community and leaders of other Turkish Cypriot parties in that part of the island. It is abundantly plain that there is a burning desire among many Turkish Cypriots to become involved in talks on accession to the European Union and to bring about the unification agreement that will benefit all Cypriots, to which the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred.

I hope very much that when the Minister responds to the debate, she will be able to clarify the British Government's position. My first point is that it is absolutely vital that the House sends a very clear message to the Turkish Government that they will be able to exercise no power of veto over Cypriot accession to the EU and that that accession will proceed on track with or without a settlement of the Cyprus problem. Once the Turkish Government clearly understand that, the block to Turkish Cypriot participation in accession talks will be lifted. At that point, the very generous and sincere desire of the president of the republic, President Clerides, for an all-Cyprus negotiating team will become a reality. That will be in the interests of all Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities living in the United Kingdom and on the island of Cyprus.

Secondly, I believe that I am right in saying that, yesterday, the time for a settlement by Turkey in the Loizidou case expired. As the Minister knows, Mrs. Loizidou took the Turkish Government to the European Court, which found in her favour and awarded damages. Turkey was given a period in which to honour the court's findings and to make payment. The Cyprus high commissioner informed me this morning that, as of last night, that payment had not been made. The United Kingdom is a member of the Council of Europe and a supporter of the European Court of Human Rights. It is also a guarantor power. We have an absolute duty to take action and seek enforcement of that European Court judgment. I would be very grateful if the Minister gave some indication of the Government's attitude and the action that we as a country propose to take.

10.12 am

Mr. Jamie Cann (Ipswich): We should at least try to get our facts right about this issue. Britain took over the governance of Cyprus in—I think—1878; it was certainly in the 1800s. At that time, Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriots were intermingled in villages across the island. At the back end of the 1950s, a Greek Cypriot movement in Cyprus—EOKA—called for the island to become a sovereign part of Greece. At that time, Greek Cypriots were the ones shooting British soldiers, and Turkish Cypriots the ones who sheltered, succoured and protected them. We seem to get that wrong nowadays. Does nobody read history any more?

When we left the island in the early 1960s, we left a treaty by which we, Greece and Turkey guaranteed we would abide. That treaty said that the president would always be a Greek Cypriot, because there is a majority on the island, that the vice-president would always be a Turkish Cypriot, and that the system would be bicameral. Within two years, that was broken. The Turks were dispossessed and herded into ghettos. I have seen the graves in some of those ghettos. There are no men in them because, as was the case with the Serbians after them, the men were moved on. God knows where they are. I saw only graves of Turkish Cypriot babies, women and old men. Nobody can tell me that warm words from President Clerides will alter any of that history.

When a fascist Greek junta, which some of our people do not seem to mind too much, took over the island in 1974, Süleyman Demirel, the president of Turkey, pleaded with my Prime Minister, Harold Wilson, and my Foreign Secretary, Jim Callaghan, "For goodness sake, do something about this. Our people have been herded into ghettos and massacred. The treaty of guarantee says that powers should operate to stop this." Did we do anything? No, we did nothing; so Turkey did, and I congratulate it on that.

The hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), who appears to be falling asleep, asked earlier why British troops are still in Cyprus. That comes down to a matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred. The treaty of guarantee said that guarantor powers would move in to stay and move out only when it was possible. It is not possible to move out.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): I am listening with interest to my hon. Friend's comments. I confess that I, too, have recently visited Cyprus. My trip was sponsored by Friends of Cyprus. I am curious about my hon. Friend's reaction to the behaviour of Mr. Denktas, the Turkish authorities and the military, especially given that there is now a minority of Turkish Cypriots in Cyprus, since they have been replaced by Turkish troops and Anatolians who were brought in by Mr. Denktas. Is not that worse than the events that my hon. Friend is discussing?

Mr. Cann: It is certainly not worse. Incidentally, I ought to mention—I apologise for not doing so before—that I am a friend of Turkish north Cyprus. I have also been to the south of the island—but that is another matter. What my hon. Friend has said is not correct. The vast majority of people who live in the Turkish republic of north Cyprus are Cypriots. It is a secular democratic republic on a western model. Hon. Members shake their heads. Perhaps they have not been there; perhaps they ought to go there; perhaps I ought to invite them; perhaps I ought to try to get them there.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I have been there.

Mr. Cann: My hon. Friend will know then that in shaking his head, he is very wrong.

Mr. Hawkins: Despite what the hon. Gentleman has been saying, does he nevertheless concede that, about two and a half years ago, the late Lord Finsberg, as a member of the Council of Europe, was required to report on people in the illegally occupied area? His report confirmed that quite appalling human rights abuses had been imposed by Mr. Denktas on those in the territory of the illegal regime. How does the hon. Gentleman respond to that recent history?

Mr. Cann: It must be very recent. It is also a total nonsense, as anyone who has visited the place knows.

Mr. Dismore: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cann: No; please let me make a little progress.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions will most definitely mean that some hon. Members will be squeezed out of the debate.

Mr. Cann: If I may, I shall continue making my argument.

This country let down the Turkish Cypriots. The Turkish army moved in to protect the interests of the Turkish Cypriots, and since 1974, there has never been a solution that would have been acceptable to both Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

Throughout those 24 or 25 years, all public opinion, and all the pressure in the press and from this place, has always been in support of the Greek Cypriots. Everything that the Turkish Cypriots do, and everything that the Turks as a nation do, is deprecated by the House. That is historically incorrect.

Finally—

Mr. Love: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cann: No, I shall not. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have his own say.

Turkey is a country of 70 million people. It is a buttress of NATO in the whole of that area, and has been a strong and good friend of this country. Turkish Cypriots have been strong and good friends of our soldiers, too, when Greek Cypriots were shooting them in the back in the name of EOKA.

As well as the justice of the case for the Turkish Cypriots, we should consider the interests of this country. If we try to bring a divided Cyprus into the European Union—

Mr. Love: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cann: No, I will not.

Would we be doing ourselves a favour if we brought in a divided Cyprus? No. Would we be doing the European Union or NATO a favour? No. The treaty that we left behind us laid down that Cyprus would be undivided, with bicameral government and a leadership split between the two communities. That has been abrogated for 25 years.

Until we get back to that situation, we must ensure that Cyprus does not join the European Union. It is wrong to do as my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting did and call Mr. Clerides "President Clerides", because under the treaty that we left behind, he is not the president. He is a minority leader, because the island is not united, and until it is, it should not be allowed to join the European Union.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): We can all put our own interpretations on past events in the beautiful island of Cyprus, but I want to look to the future. I shall be brief. There are two developments relating to Cyprus that I would like to see. First, I fervently hope to see the reunification of the island after 24 years in which 38 per cent. of it has been illegally occupied. Secondly, I want to see Cyprus's application to join the European Union succeed.

I listened carefully to Foreign and Commonwealth Office questions yesterday, and lest there be any misunderstanding, I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm that the reunification of Cyprus is a separate issue from Cyprus's application to join the European Union, and that one is not dependent on the other. She did not say that, but columns 143 and 145 of yesterday's Hansard give rise to some ambiguity. I would like the simple assurance that the accession of Cyprus to the European Union will not be held up because, and if, the island remains divided.

Cyprus is especially well qualified to join the EU. My research shows that it is one of the few countries in Europe—including most of the 11, from a total of 15, countries that are to launch the single currency on 1 January—that could meet the Maastricht convergence criteria straight away.

I am somewhat confused and perplexed about the initiatives now taking place. There seem to be three special representatives trying to do their bit to solve the Cyprus problem. First, there is the omnipresent Richard Holbrooke, President Clinton's special adviser—but as soon as the dust settled on his visit to Cyprus, I discovered that he was in Kosovo. I wonder where he is now.

Secondly, there is our own Sir David Hannay, a most respected diplomat whom I know and admire. I remember him in particular as the British permanent representative at the United Nations from 1990 to 1995. Third on the scene is Ann Hercus—to give her her proper title, the United Nations Secretary-General's alternate special representative.

I wish them all well in their endeavours, but it is vital that there be a co-ordinated strategy to tackle the Cyprus problem. I believe that the United States must play a key role in helping the co-guarantors to find a solution, because the best prospect for the reunification of Cyprus is to deal with it as part of wider international concerns. That is a question of realpolitik.

I share the view of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann) that Turkey is a valued member of NATO. It is also a valued member of the Council of Europe, and I want to see it as a member of the European Union—provided, of course, that it can meet the economic and human rights criteria. If Turkey can join, that will help to establish peace and security in that part of Europe.

Mr. Cann: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Sydney Chapman: I shall not, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind. I would prefer hon. Members to make their points in their own speeches, rather than in the middle—or rather, at the end—of mine.

For 24 years, the world has failed to deal with the division of Cyprus, and it behoves us to realise that we have a special responsibility not only as a co-guarantor, but because Cyprus is a Commonwealth country. What is needed is good will, as well as give and take on both sides of the green line which is the tragedy of Cyprus.

Mr. Eddie O'Hara (Knowsley, South): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on having called for a debate on the important subject of Cyprus. It is frustrating to have to be brief on such an important topic, but I shall do my utmost.

Much has been said, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann), about the legal, historical and constitutional situation, but let me explain that constitutionally, the treaty of guarantee still stands, and President Clerides is recognised as president of the Republic of Cyprus. Politically, the United Nations recognises the Republic of Cyprus and does not recognise the so-called Turkish republic of northern Cyprus; only Turkey recognises that.

As for the recent legal situation, the Loizidou case has been mentioned, and we must put on record the fact that an important by-product of the judgment at Strasbourg was that the judges held that Turkey was responsible for all that now happens in northern Cyprus because Turkey is in occupation. Turkey is in the dock, not the so-called Turkish republic of northern Cyprus, which has no constitutional or legal status whatever.

There has been much interpretation and reinterpretation of history, but let us accept that there were atrocities by extremists on both sides in the early days in the 1960s. It saddens me that all the literature that I receive from supporters of the so-called Turkish republic of northern Cyprus always refers back to them, and never forwards. There have been no atrocities since then, except officially sponsored atrocities by the authorities in northern Cyprus, such as the fairly recent events involving Tassos Isaac and Solomos Solomou.

In 1974 an illegal attempt was made by a Government outside Cyprus to overthrow the legally appointed Government of that island, including an attempt to assassinate the president. That attempt was overthrown within days; mercifully, it did not succeed. Under the treaty of guarantee, Turkey certainly had the right to intervene to restore the status quo, but it did not have the right to stay in occupation for 24 years and perpetrate the further waves of invasion that took in Famagusta.

I declare an interest in that, like my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), I am an honorary citizen of Famagusta. I am proud to say, "Epitimos Ammahostianos".

There was some justification for Turkey's actions in 1974. One might question the brutality of the intervention, but it would not be profitable to do so. The sad thing is that, since 1974, there has been a major exercise in ethnic cleansing in northern Cyprus.

Mr. Cann indicated dissent.

Mr. O'Hara: The Cuco report to the Council of Europe, some half a dozen years ago, expressed concern even then that the population of Epoiki—the immigrants into northern Cyprus—was on the point of exceeding that of the native Turkish Cypriots, who had emigrated to Australia, Canada, New Zealand and north London.

There have been assassinations of people in northern Cyprus who have dared to question the Government line.

Mr. Cann: Nonsense.

Mr. O'Hara: There have been assassinations—they are on record. There is a lot of evidence to show that typical Turkish Cypriots now feel like refugees in their own country.

All of that is negative, and I would rather be positive. Every day that passes matters in the solution of the Cyprus problem. That is the difference between the Cyprus and Northern Ireland problems. Time was always on the side of a solution in Northern Ireland and, please God, we shall get that solution sooner rather than later. However, the concrete is setting and the barriers are rising every day between the two communities in Cyprus—most of whom lived harmoniously with each other for hundreds of years. The danger is that they will lose the habit of living together, and they will be forced to lose that habit if the situation continues as it is.

It is negative to look back, and it is negative to talk about the confederation of two separate republics in Cyprus. There are positive opportunities, such as the accession of Cyprus to the EU. That offers benefits for all Cypriots, Greek and Turkish. It would be particularly beneficial to the Turkish Cypriots, because the situation over the past 24 years has done such grievous damage to the well-being of Turkish Cypriots. I remember going to the far north with my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting and seeing Turkish Cypriot villages where the people were living in absolute destitution. However, those people do not have the political means of expressing their opposition to what is going on.

I call upon the Turkish Government to stop their bellicose rhetoric. If they want a solution, and if they want the S300s out of Cyprus, they must accept the offer of President Clerides to demilitarise the island. That can be done in phases, and in ways that would ensure the confidence of the Turkish Cypriot people in their security.

Finally, I echo the words of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman). Important as the solution of the Cyprus problem would be—everyone in the Chamber today is desperately keen to have a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus problem—there are bigger benefits to be gained if the problem were solved. Without a solution to the Cyprus problem, we will never resolve the differences between Greece and Turkey. Greece and Turkey are neighbours—they live better together in peaceful co-existence. If Greece and Turkey could live together in peaceful co-existence and co-operation, the benefits for the whole of the western world—and particularly for south-eastern Europe and the Mediterranean area—would be inestimable.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I congratulate the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on securing the debate, but the great tragedy of our debates on Cyprus is that there is never enough time for the many hon. Members who have an interest in the subject to be able to express their views. That is a great shame, and I hope that we can have a longer debate at some stage.

[Mr. David Heath]

This is the third such debate in which I have spoken. I am a little bemused to find myself the only Front-Bench survivor, in that the Government and the Conservative party both have new Front-Bench speakers.

I make no apologies for repeating points that have been made on previous occasions, as I believe that they still hold good. It is essential for those Members of Parliament who speak with passion and knowledge on matters associated with Cyprus to recognise the fact that both communities have genuine fears and concerns about the other community and the other players in the region. Those have to be recognised and seen as part of the solution as it develops.

I still see the future of Cyprus as being the same as the position that I anticipate the Minister will indicate when she replies on behalf of the Government—that bizonal, bicommunal, federal solution which has been the basis of so much work over the years and remains the basis of the United Nations resolutions on the subject.

I also see the application of Cyprus to join the EU as an essential part of the process. It would be wholly beneficial for Cyprus to become a member of the EU, and it would be particularly advantageous to northern Cyprus, because—as the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) said—of the economic disadvantage that northern Cyprus has suffered during the years of partition. If there is any sector within the island that would benefit greatly from accession to the EU—which I hope will be at an earlier, rather than a later stage—it is the people in northern Cyprus.

There are some member states of the EU which are slightly embarrassed by the fact that the application from Cyprus is being treated in the same way as the five other current applications. They are wrong to be embarrassed and wrong to see Cyprus as a separate case. Cyprus has a significant problem in its recent history, but it has many attributes that would be of benefit to the EU and mutually beneficial to the island of Cyprus.

I look forward to the day when Turkey can be welcomed into the family of European nations. There are major obstacles to that, but I congratulate the British Government on maintaining contact with Turkey during the British EU presidency and on making sure that Turkey has not been excluded from EU affairs at a critical stage.

We all share the disappointment at the further militarisation of the island, the addition of military hardware, the overflights we have seen and the inevitable increases in tension which have resulted from that. We all share the view of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman), who wished the three special envoys well. I understand why Richard Holbrooke has had other priorities, but I hope that he will now give his full attention to the problems of Cyprus, because America is a key player.

Britain is also a key player. We are in a unique position in respect of the island of Cyprus as a guarantor nation. If I am to express any disappointment about the position of the Government, it is that I do not think that sufficient energy has been applied to the Cyprus question over the past six or seven months, and during the British presidency.

We last discussed the matter on 29 October last year—when we were nearing the end of the Luxembourg presidency—just after a summit at a place called Mondorf-les-Bains, a town which has slipped back into obscurity since that important meeting. I asked the then Minister for Europe what had transpired at the meeting and what progress the Government had sought and accomplished in terms of Cyprus. I expressed the view that the British presidency would put Cyprus at the top of the priority list, so key was the achievement of an acceptable solution there. Perhaps the guarantor powers should get together again to see what they can do to support constructively the communities in Cyprus as they try to achieve a peaceful solution.

An additional factor is the substantial Cypriot communities within this country. Perversely, those expatriates may be part of the key to the solution. If we can engender better understanding between the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities in London and elsewhere in this country, we might achieve a better solution in Cyprus. Hon. Members feel passionately about this subject and often express the views of significant communities within their constituencies. However, we do not assist the peace process if we become too partisan—if we become two groups of cheerleaders in the House for the different communities in Cyprus rather than seeing the common view, which is that peace there is to the advantage of both communities and that a peaceful solution is encompassed within the bizonal solution for which we have strived for so long and within an understanding between the two communities of the tensions that surround them.

On that note, I will sit down, but I hope that the Minister will be able to explain the positive moves that the British Government can make in the next six months, which are as critical to the future of Cyprus as the previous six months and the six before that. While the European Union application is on the table, we must make substantive progress towards arriving at a satisfactory solution to the problems in Cyprus.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I have also recently visited Cyprus as a guest of Morphou and the Friends of Cyprus. Time is short and I shall make only a couple of brief points.

First, on the Loizidou case, I also visited people in the north with the consent of the Government of Cyprus and, as a lawyer, I had discussions with northern Cypriot lawyers. I was concerned at the approach towards the rule of law, which seemed to suggest that the Loizidou case was political and could, therefore, be ignored. We must get over the message to the Turks and the Turkish Cypriots that one cannot pick and choose as regards decisions of the European Court.

Secondly, a number of other cases have arisen on the back of Loizidou, including that of a Turkish Cypriot paediatrician who is also taking action against the Turkish Government because he is prevented from visiting the south to talk with his fellow professionals. We must convince the Turkish Government and Turkish Cypriots in the north that the ban on bicommunal contact on the island between people in the north and south must be stopped. If we are to have any chance of getting the two sides together, there must be contact between the two communities. The authorities have been unable to prevent such contact off the island—there have been contacts between professionals, business people and students.

If we are to have any chance of securing peace, those contacts must resume and I hope that the Minister will make it clear that we will do all we can to ensure that Mr. Denktas's ban is lifted forthwith.

10.42 am

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on securing this important debate. In his excellent speech, he combined passion with clarity, which is a rare combination on such occasions.

Cyprus is a subject of deep concern to all parties in the House. It is an island with which the United Kingdom has had a long, historic association and a deep and continuing interest. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West and I regret the lack of progress in the matter recently, but the Cyprus question is a difficult one. Like many other contentious international areas that have been partitioned—Northern Ireland and Kashmir come to mind—Cyprus evokes heated debate, as the robust contributions from the hon. Members for Ipswich (Mr. Cann) and for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) demonstrated. Greece and Turkey hold different views on the status of Cyprus and so too do the legal Government of Cyprus and the so-called Turkish republic of northern Cyprus. Heated exchanges take place concerning the status of the various United Nations resolutions and treaties that govern the island. There are also tragic stories of atrocities and unfairness, displacement from homes and abuses of human rights. Pressure groups with their own agendas compete for political time and attention. They leap upon nuances of which speakers may be unaware. In short, it is a subject in which a misturned phrase can upset the best of intentions.

The Conservative party has paid close attention to developments in Cyprus. We condemned the brutal invasion in 1974. We drafted and secured the adoption of Security Council resolution 541 in 1984, which declared the Turkish Cypriot declaration of independence legally invalid. Since then, Cyprus has been discussed frequently in Parliament and elsewhere. The former Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), and both his Foreign Secretaries, Lord Hurd and Sir Malcolm Rifkind, raised the future of Cyprus with their Turkish and Greek counterparts. Sir David Hannay was appointed special representative to Cyprus to assist in bringing the two sides together.

Our high commission in Nicosia encouraged intercommunal contact. Britain provided soldiers to the UN force that was monitoring the green line. Malcolm Rifkind made the first bilateral visit by a Foreign Secretary to Cyprus in December 1996, when he held discussions with President Clerides and Mr. Denktash. Those positive developments have been preserved by the present Government. I also commend the work done in the area in the previous Parliament and since by our former colleague from Edmonton, Dr. Ian Twinn. May I also say how pleased the Conservative party was at the re-election of President Clerides. We work closely with the Democratic Rally party through the European Democrat Union and enjoy the electoral success of fellow centre right parties in Europe—it is rare these days. We will also await with interest the results of the elections in the north of the island and in Turkey, as they may materially affect the future of Cyprus.

Our concern for the future of Cyprus has not diminished since we lost office in May 1997. We want an overall settlement. We want peace and stability on the island, with the two communities confident in their own rights and responsibilities. A settlement would help both Greece and Turkey to normalise their relationship and reduce their defence spending. A settlement would reduce the tension between two NATO nations and that tension is very real. A number of disturbing events have taken place in the past few months. We do not want further militarisation of the island. The stand-off over the acquisition of missiles by the Government of Cyprus and the response by the Turkish Government are disturbing and highlight the importance of achieving a lasting settlement. We also understand the concerns voiced by Greek Cypriots about Turkish settlement in the north. A reduction in Turkish troops in northern Cyprus would improve the climate for a negotiated settlement.

All parties must accept that Cyprus is a great source of instability in the region. That is why the previous Government made great efforts to assist in providing a solution. Under the new Government, Britain should continue to be involved closely with the search for a solution and should support attempts to bring about a lasting settlement.

I must make it clear where the Conservative party stands. The UN "Set of Ideas"—bizonal and bicommunal—that was submitted in 1992 remains central to discussion of the island's future. Only the two communities can decide what is acceptable and what is likely to last. Britain's role should be to offer advice and provide support for UN operations on the island and for international attempts to mediate between the two sides. The Opposition do not support the confederation proposal of Mr. Denktas, nor do we favour measures that would perpetuate rather than remedy the present division of the island.

Britain, as one of the three guarantors of Cyprus with Greece and Turkey, has a special interest in the island's future. Our sovereign bases are of strategic importance. We will support the Government and the international community in attempts to bring about a peaceful and lasting settlement.

Conservatives support the European Union's decision to open accession negotiations with Cyprus, which was the main thrust of the speech by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox). We hope that a solution can be found so that the whole island can join. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) said, we are firm in our belief that no country outside the European Union should have the power to veto EU membership. The criteria for joining are set out and countries that meet those criteria should be allowed in. That is a clear message for those who may try to block the accession or intimidate the recognised Government of Cyprus to prevent them from pursuing their application for membership.

I agree strongly with my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman), who said in his excellent speech that we should also support Turkey's aim to join the European Union one day, but only when it clearly meets human rights and other criteria. However, the handling of Turkey was one of the less successful aspects of the British presidency of the European Union. Instead of considering Turkey as a potential member and friend, the Government treated it as a threat and in return, the Turkish Government have turned their back on the EU for the moment. Turkey is a key NATO ally and has an important geopolitical role. We do not want Turkey to be turned away from the path of the west, as that will only endanger stability in the region, especially the stability of Cyprus.

[Mr. Michael Trend]

The prize is great. Cyprus can expect to be host to almost a million United Kingdom tourists this year alone—perhaps more. It is a most beautiful island. More visitors will go there if it is reunited. Cyprus offers unique access to markets and a skilled, educated and energetic population of both Greek and Turkish origin.

The economic benefits of a settlement would act as a springboard for further growth and opportunity on the island. Overseas investment—from the United Kingdom, for example—would be strengthened and encouraged. We want a successful and united Cyprus, where both communities co-operate together freely, with confidence in their future and that of their shared island.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on his good fortune in securing this debate and on his choice of subject. There is no doubt, given his and other hon. Members' contributions, that this is a matter of keen interest, about which many hon. Members have a great deal of knowledge.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) said, although this is my first Adjournment debate on Cyprus as a Foreign Office Minister, I have spoken in similar debates from the Opposition Front Bench, and so I have been obliged to reflect on what has changed in the past few years. Since the de facto division of the island some 25 years ago, progress has been frustratingly slow, but some new elements in the current situation should encourage us to make strenuous efforts to ensure that a settlement is reached.

The Government's position is clear. We remain committed to working for a comprehensive political settlement that would bring the two communities of Cyprus together within a single, sovereign state. The international community has also made it clear that it wants that state to consist of a bicommunal, bizonal federation and that such a state would have its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded. Moreover, the political settlement should exclude any form of partition, secession or union—in whole or in part—with any other country.

I am glad that, in this debate, there has been cross-party support for that approach, to which we have subscribed for many years. I am also glad that there have been few efforts to make distinctions between the policies pursued by this Government and the previous Government—or, indeed, by other political parties. I noted a slight remonstrance from the Liberal Democrat spokesman to the effect that the Government have been back-pedalling or going slow, but I do not accept that that is so. Since I took up my current post at the end of July, I have been struck by the number of meetings and initiatives on Cyprus in which we are involved and the proportion of my time that is taken up with the matter, although I do not regret that. Now that the United Kingdom no longer has the presidency of the European Union, some of the initiatives may not receive as much publicity, but we are none the less actively engaged in a variety of ways, to which I hope, despite the shortness of time, I shall be able to refer.

We subscribe and determinedly keep to the policy that I have outlined for a number of reasons. First, in 1960, both sides agreed to a single state based on political equality between the two communities as the basis for the newly independent Cyprus; it seems reasonable to assume that, with international help and advice, they could do so again. Secondly, although I understand the fears and insecurities of people in both communities, we remain convinced that a united Cyprus in which the rights of both communities are respected is the best assurance of the future security and prosperity of all on the island of Cyprus. We believe that the two communities can create a way ahead that would allow a united, stable and prosperous Cyprus to enter the new millennium. We should be encouraged by the efforts that have been made in other situations across the world, including some close to home—in Northern Ireland—to achieve a settlement even when the historical circumstances have been difficult. We must focus on what we can achieve and bend all our efforts to that end.

As has been said, the United Kingdom is in a unique position, not only as a guarantor power, but as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council and as a member of the European Union. Given those three elements of responsibility, we are committed to using our position to do all that we can to bring about a just and lasting settlement. A solution must be achieved through peaceful dialogue, which is why we support the UN Secretary-General's efforts to broker a settlement. We believe that his approach offers the best way forward; indeed, we committed ourselves to making progress in that way at the UN General Assembly in September, when the Secretary-General and his staff held talks on Cyprus with the different countries involved.

The support of the Secretary-General's mission of good offices is important, and I was pleased that the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) referred to the work on the island of Dame Ann Hercus, to whom I pay tribute. She is a well-respected New Zealand politician, who we believe can make a real contribution; her efforts to develop on-island contacts between the parties to reduce tensions and promote progress are extremely important. Our representative Sir David Hannay, who was also referred to, continues to be extremely energetic and to work closely with Dame Ann Hercus, which we should all welcome.

On the new elements that I mentioned, we welcome all attempts to think constructively about a settlement for Cyprus, but we do not believe that Mr. Denktas's proposals are consistent with the objective of a bizonal, bicommunal federation. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting mentioned Cyprus's application to join the European Union, which we very much welcome. I have read the columns of Hansard to which the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet referred; they do not read ambiguously to me, but I assure him that we do not accept that anyone has a veto on the process of EU accession. Obviously, we want moves towards a settlement of the Cyprus problem to proceed as quickly as possible, but that is not a pre-condition of accession.

None the less, we attach importance to associating Turkish Cypriots with the accession process, however difficult that may be. We regret the continuing Turkish Cypriot refusal to take up the offer of participation in the team that is negotiating the terms of accession. We and our EU partners believe that it would be in their interests to do so, and we shall continue to point out the benefits of such participation.

Some hon. Members referred to the often very good relationships between Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities in the United Kingdom. When speaking to representatives of both those communities, I have often detected a great deal of support for the idea of Cyprus belonging to the European Union; they feel that accession would be in the interest of Cyprus's prosperity and that it should proceed constructively. It will be much better if the Turkish Cypriots take part in the process, but they do not have a veto and neither does Turkey.

Some hon. Members referred to military tensions. I agree that we do not want those tensions to increase either in Cyprus or in the neighbouring region, and we have urged restraint on all sides.

World Trade Organisation

11 am

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): As the only general practitioner among Labour Members of Parliament, my main area of interest is health policy: how we treat our citizens when they fall ill or are injured, and how the national health service is organised to meet their increasing needs.

A major plank of the Government's health plans is to improve our health through public health measures and preventive medicine, but it is becoming increasingly obvious that environmental factors have a significant impact on health. The incidence of asthma in children has risen by 50 per cent. in the past 30 years; the next generation is already suffering from the mistakes of the last.

The World Health Organisation claimed last week in The Independent that 30 per cent. of cancers of the breast, colon and prostate are associated with nutrition; the Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health has just published a report linking air pollution with some childhood cancers; and holes in the ozone layer are leading to an increase in skin cancer. The fact is that the incidence of cancer is increasing: breast cancer has doubled in the past 50 years, sperm counts are falling and there is increasing evidence that there is a close link with environmental factors; but we do not yet understand the scale and scope of the problem.

It is becoming increasingly clear that, if our initiatives on public health are to bring significant results, "Our Healthier Nation" needs to live within our healthier planet.

My constituents in Dartford regularly raise animal welfare concerns with me, through correspondence and meetings. We are an animal-loving nation and we have many organisations that do important work to protect animals. Environmental, animal welfare and health issues are inextricably linked. Wild animals rely on the environment for their habitats, and domesticated animals are affected by our attitudes to farming and meeting the world's food needs. Our responses to the challenges posed on environmental issues will have a direct impact on the health of individuals and populations throughout the world.

Over the past half-century, our food and the methods used to produce it have changed beyond recognition. The use of growth hormones, antibiotics, pesticides and other chemicals has hugely increased food production and yields but it also affects the health not only of our people but of the planet.

The revolution in food is not over. Scientific advances are bringing further benefits and further threats. Genetically modified food is already on supermarket shelves and seems set to increase rapidly in the future.

New farming methods used in raising livestock have taken our exploitation of animals to extremes that many—some quite literally—find unpalatable. Changes in food production and distribution methods have brought great advantages for consumers. The market now offers consumers an enormous range of food and drink from all continents.

Choice has never been greater, and the great British consumer has learnt to exercise that choice and to use his or her economic power to bring positive benefits. Notably,

[Dr. Howard Stoate]

CFCs in aerosols have been banned, thanks in large part to consumers who switched to buying the less harmful and, importantly, similarly priced alternatives. It is now difficult to find tuna that has not been caught with rod and line, which helps to protect dolphins. Producers have had to change their methods or lose their markets. Cruelty-free cosmetics are continuing their rise in popularity, reflecting the public's concerns over animal testing.

The consumer movement has had its successes and its failures. The markets for environmentally friendly detergents and fairly traded goods have not—so far—developed far enough to bring about the changes in buying patterns needed to transform production methods. Consumer-led changes in the market are possible only when alternative products are available and can compete in the marketplace on both quality and price. There will be occasions when Government action is needed, to offer incentives for certain production methods and disincentives for others.

The marketplace is now global; the problems are global; and solutions must also be global.

Trade is a good thing. Trade liberalisation is, in general, to be welcomed as it increases prosperity. Economic protectionism is almost always short-termist and short-sighted. It is better for all concerned if trade takes place in a rules-based system. A free-for-all leaves weaker economies at the mercy of the stronger. I support the general agreement on tariffs and trade—GATT—and welcome the creation of the World Trade Organisation.

I support the WTO's desire to press liberalisation further in the millennium round, as that could have a positive impact on existing protectionist practices such as the common agricultural policy; but I called for this debate because, in my view, the WTO has failed adequately to address the social, environmental and animal welfare issues in our global trading network.

In fact, I do the World Trade Organisation a disservice. Rather than simply failing to address the issues, it has, through its actions, worked against the implementation of measures introduced to protect our environment.

The essential principle of the GATT system is non-discrimination. Countries are not allowed to discriminate against imports on grounds of country of origin, or to favour their own producers. That does not mean that there are no grounds on which they are permitted to discriminate. Article XX of the general agreement allows exceptions to World Trade Organisation rules under certain circumstances. One such exception is for "measures necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health."

Unfortunately, WTO rulings in practice have often led to judgments that have not protected humans, animals or the environment.

There are many examples: legislators and citizens throughout the European Union have expressed concern over the use of growth-accelerating hormones in cattle. Although there is no absolute proof, there is strong evidence to suggest that those chemicals can cause an increase in cancers and male infertility. In reaction to that concern, the European Union introduced a ban on the sale of meat and meat products from animals on which six specified hormones had been used to accelerate growth—a ban which, it should be noted, was to apply equally to domestic and foreign producers in an entirely non-discriminatory manner.

The ban was challenged by the United States on the grounds that it imposed unfair trade barriers. The World Trade Organisation panel ruled that the ban would violate world trade agreements and was not scientifically justified, but it admitted that the hormones in question have a carcinogenic potential. That decision favoured the US in allowing its hormone-saturated beef into the European market, but the US does not always get its own way. In 1990, environmentalists in America passed an amendment to the Clean Air Act requiring oil refineries to produce cleaner petrol. The law would affect areas such as Los Angeles that are classified as grossly falling below clean air standards. Required improvements were to vary depending on a baseline of standards achieved in 1990.

The problem, and the reason for World Trade Organisation involvement, was that it was impossible to obtain accurate baseline figures for petrol produced in refineries outside the USA. It was decided to use as a base figure the US industry average, which ensured that imported petrol sold from 1990 onwards in areas with specific clean air problems would have to be cleaner than the US average of 1990, while the US industry would have to clean up its own supply in order to access the same markets.

The appeal this time came from Brazil and Venezuela, which claimed that the system unfairly excluded their dirtier and more polluting fuel from the US market—and they won. The World Trade Organisation again sacrificed environmental and public health concerns on the altar of unrestricted free trade. The US Environmental Protection Agency was forced to introduce less effective regulations, thus setting back the aim of cleaner air for American cities.

It must be galling for environmental campaigners to have worked hard for years within the democratic process to implement legislation, only to have all their good work undone.

Much publicity has been given recently to the so-called shrimp-turtle case, in which US measures to ban imports of shrimps caught in nets that also trap and kill turtles were deemed illegal. Free trade ideologues argue that under GATT, a state is allowed to protect only its own wildlife, not that of other countries. The situation is more complicated than it seems, and charges of protectionism have been levelled at the US.

On closer inspection of the details of the shrimp-turtle ruling, it appears that the judgment was not as damaging to environmental protection as the headlines suggest, and that the US was guilty of banning all imports from particular countries without distinguishing between those caught in turtle-friendly nets and those not. I look forward to hearing the Minister's views on the implications of the shrimp-turtle ruling, and a statement from the British Government on their approach to the problem.

This may sound an arcane or academic dispute, but far from it. News came last week that Canada is taking the French Government to the WTO to complain about a French ban on white asbestos, yet in France alone, 2,000 people a year die of cancer caused by asbestos. I urge the Government to support the French case robustly and, more importantly, to introduce a ban on white asbestos in the UK as soon as possible.

There have been threats from American-based multinationals to take the UK Government to the WTO if they seek to limit the introduction of genetically modified crops or food to the UK. I hope that the Government will resist that pressure. If there are concerns about the impact on either human health or the environment, our Government have not only the right but a duty to act.

I accept that the WTO has a difficult job to balance its judgments between extreme protectionism and total free-market deregulation. A third way needs to be found between those two positions; note that I got the third way in there—I thought it important to do so. The WTO must draw a line when deciding which restrictions are justified and on what grounds. It has acted decisively and strongly and drawn a line in the sand, but unfortunately it is in entirely the wrong place.

In these decisions, the WTO seems to be saying that it will not allow Government to have any control over production methods of imported food. It will intervene only when we can prove that food kills people. The bias is weighted too far in favour of unlimited free trade and against our health and environment.

The WTO fails to distinguish between non-product process and production methods. Those are methods of producing goods that cannot be seen in the final product. I could not distinguish by sight or taste between two bananas, the first grown on a small farm in the Caribbean, providing essential jobs and a strong economy for the home nation, and the second grown on a huge, intensively farmed plantation using large quantities of pesticides and owned by a multinational corporation.

The WTO can recognise the differences in process and production methods, but chooses not to. Current practice does not allow distinctions based on different production methods to be made, irrespective of the damage that some methods may cause. My criticism of the WTO is that it has taken anti-protectionism too far and effectively banned the legislation that is needed to improve our environment.

I want the Government to press our European Union partners and other GATT signatories to recognise the right of nations to take action to discourage socially and environmentally damaging processes. It is already accepted that it is allowable to ban goods that are produced by slave or prison labour. It should be equally allowable to ban goods that are produced in an environmentally destructive manner. The Government should press strongly for the right of states to take measures to protect the health and well-being of their populations and environment.

The primary purpose of GATT is to "raise the standard of living, ensure full employment and economic growth, develop the full uses of the resources of the world and expand the trade in goods".

I do not believe that that purpose and social and environmental protection are mutually exclusive. The essence of the third way—I put it in again, please notice—in this and other sectors is that, although we cannot have the best of both worlds, we can eradicate the worst. We can have environmental legislation without preventing the global market from operating effectively. We can accept the reality and the benefits of trading within a world market economy without sacrificing social and humanitarian values.

Considering its power over everyone's lives, the WTO is a shadowy and secretive body; the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England is a model of democratic openness by comparison. The WTO is staffed mainly by trade professionals who place the goal of liberalisation above all else. It is resistant to the notion of dialogue with civil society. Its appellate body, which adjudicates on disputes, is shrouded in so much mystery and jargon that few outsiders have a chance of understanding what is going on, let alone influencing it.

The British Government should lead a campaign to open up the WTO's workings. These issues are too important to be left to professional trade negotiators. We all have a stake in the outcome. We have a right to know what is going on and to make representations if we do not like the way things are going.

The key to the operation of any rules-based system is, first, how the rules are written and, secondly, who interprets and applies them. There is certainly scope for the GATT clauses on social and environmental protection to be made clearer and less ambiguous, but there will always be room for dispute about the precise meaning, so the role of the WTO and the way in which it adjudicates on disputes is crucial.

Developing countries' Governments are often suspicious of talk of building environmental protection into global trading systems. They see it as yet another way in which the rich north will exploit them: a smokescreen to hide economic protectionism to keep their goods out. There is no doubt that some of those who argue against trade liberalisation on ostensibly environmental grounds are motivated more by selfish than by altruistic concerns.

We need to find ways to structure the system so that developing countries' fears are reduced. More openness would help here, but there is a still greater need for some acts of good faith by the developed world to demonstrate a willingness to dismantle protectionist barriers. In effect, there is a need for a new global bargain, in which the developed world ends some of its existing, unjustifiable discrimination, in return for the developing world accepting the legitimacy of discrimination against products and processes that damage the environment or involve unacceptable social practices.

Financial incentives for environmental, social and animal welfare production methods can be introduced. Technology transfer, aid, grants and loans should be used to assist developing nations to attain the economic growth that they need without a similar growth in pollution. Consumer power must be enhanced with mandatory labelling schemes, so that shoppers are aware of how the products that they are choosing reached the shelf; the emphasis of the WTO must be moved from suppliers to consumers. Most importantly, we must work to establish multilateral agreements on a wide range of issues to ensure that pressure for action on environmental and animal welfare issues is broad based and international and can deliver results.

I ask the Minister to address these issues, in partnership with our friends in Europe, the Commonwealth and the rest of the world, in the next WTO round next year. I believe that a reasonable balance can be found between trade liberalisation and environmental protection and animal welfare. I urge the Government to make that a high priority in their negotiating objectives for the next WTO round and to take the lead in persuading our partners throughout the world to do likewise.

Matters of this importance to the entire global economy and environment must not be left in the hands of unaccountable trade negotiators; such delicate matters must be under democratic political control. Last year, the EU trade commissioner called for a high-level meeting to take the trade and environment agenda forward. I look forward to hearing from the Minister what has happened since, what the UK is doing to ensure that such a meeting takes place and what he proposes to offer for our side of the bargain.

The Prime Minister said at this year's WTO ministerial meeting:

"Governments need to consider the environmental impact of everything they do, including in the trade sphere".

I wholeheartedly agree. We also need to ensure that further liberalisation does not undermine existing, hard won standards of social protection. How then do the Government propose to ensure that environmental and social concerns are at the heart of the millennium trade round?

If we get the agenda right, the next 50 years can be as successful in promoting trade as the last fifty. If we do not, we will see a gradual but steady erosion of free trade as the backlash takes hold. We have already seen the beginnings of that with the American public's hostility to the North American Free Trade Agreement. A Government committed to freeing the global economy from restrictive practices cannot afford to ignore people's legitimate concerns to safeguard the environment and social protection. I am confident that this Government will not make that mistake.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): May I first say how pleased I am that this debate is taking place and congratulate the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on his comments? I agree with virtually everything he said. He crammed a lot into 15 minutes. I hope that, today, we will receive some assurances from the Minister that the Government view the matter with the same gravity as the hon. Members who are present in this reasonably well-attended debate on a Wednesday morning. I hope also that he will tell us how they intend to tackle this hugely important matter.

May I remind the Minister that an early-day motion on this very subject, which I tabled with other Members earlier this session, has now been signed by almost 100 Members? It shows clear support and concern for the thrust of this debate—concern that is cross-party, I think—and Members' determination to ensure that the Government take this issue seriously.

I believe that the Government's intentions are honourable and sensible in this matter, but I wonder whether they have the will power; I hope that I will have the assurance today that they do.

The hon. Member for Dartford mentioned genetically modified food. I raised that matter with the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who has responsibility for food safety, in the Select Committee on Environmental Audit. There was great sympathy from him on that occasion, but he said, "We are not in the driving seat"—that was his exact phrase.

That may be true, but the Government must get into the driving seat and ensure that they control events. It may not be easy. There may be opposition from the American Government and others, but the Government have to force this issue and ensure that the environmental, animal welfare and social concerns that all hon. Members share, I think, are taken into account. They must not throw up their hands and say, "We cannot do anything about it." I hope that the Government will take that seriously; I am confident that they will.

Of course my party supports free trade—that is nothing new from Liberals—but we are not Manchester Liberals. We think that the market has to be regulated to achieve social, environmental and welfare ends. Part of the problem with the WTO is that it could stand for Welfare Taken Out, for the reasons cited by the hon. Member for Dartford. We must have free trade, but we must not be afraid to regulate it. There would be no reason for our being here if we simply let the market rule without trying to influence it. That is why we have specific concerns about the WTO and the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Environmental, social or welfare concerns raised by any nation or group of nations are being challenged across the world. The lowest common denominator will triumph unless our Parliament and the world community prevent that. The basic rules of GATT are being manipulated towards that end, although that is not GATT's purpose. The original purpose of GATT must be re-emphasised.

The hon. Member for Dartford set out his several examples extremely well. There is a conflict between different international agreements. We have WTO and GATT on one hand, and other agreements such as the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species—CITES—and the biodiversity convention on the other; and we should overcome this disparity. The hon. Gentleman referred to turtles, a case in which the Americans—the good guys this time—are trying to honour CITES and to protect the turtles. Opposition has made protection difficult, however. We must clarify these international agreements.

Then there is the ban on the import of fur derived from the use of leg-hold traps. Hon. Members on both sides find it abhorrent that animals can be trapped in that way. They suffer for days on end, and either have their limbs chewed off by the traps or chew their limbs off themselves so that they can escape. We are importing fur to satisfy consumer demand, but even those consumers who want fur do not want animals to be captured in that way. However, we appear to be stuck with it. European Union attempts to introduce a sensible animal welfare policy on fur trapping have been challenged. It cannot be right that a small group of people who have a narrow vested interest in retaining the status quo can wipe out the rest of the world's concerns. The Government and the EU must have the backbone to challenge that opposition.

Social, environmental and animal welfare concerns also raise what might be called selfish issues for United Kingdom producers. Participants in Monday's agriculture debate may have heard me mention that our farmers produce chickens to given standards, but are being undercut by the import of chickens from Thailand that are processed in the UK, then labelled British. Whenever we accept a lower welfare standard, we fail to raise welfare standards in other countries, and we face the danger that the higher standards that apply here will be driven down. Consumers believe that those chickens are British because of their labels. The consequence will not be that Thai farmers will stop keeping chickens in poor conditions, but that British chicken farming, which has higher standards—although conditions for British chickens are not brilliant—will close down because it is uneconomic.

Parliament should set an example, and should set out the ideals towards which we should strive. Basic decency says that animals should be treated acceptably. We must look after the environment, too. We cannot have standards driven down by international agreements that have been misinterpreted and skewed by small interest groups. If we are not successful in changing international rules, what is the point of having higher standards?

We should take a warning from the case of veal crates. We banned them, but the veal consequently imported from Europe is reared to much lower standards. We must get international agreement on such matters; otherwise, the good work done in the UK will be undermined elsewhere.

I want to mention two measures that the Government could take. First, article III of GATT could be amended to allow countries to distinguish between products on the basis of the way in which they have been produced. Secondly, article XX could be strengthened to allow trade measures to protect human, animal and plant life. Many hon. Members wish to speak in this debate, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) will be able to catch the Speaker's eye.

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): I want to deal with animal welfare, which is close to my heart. I am a trustee of Animal Defenders, an interest I declare now.

Aside from great political issues, the issue most raised in my postbag, and in those of most Members of Parliament, is animal welfare. Animal rights have come to the forefront over the past decade, and increasingly so during the past year or two. Many of us will remember the recent emotional debates on hunting with dogs, and the substantial vote against it. I was fortunate to be drawn to ask a question at the last Prime Minister's Question Time before the summer recess, and I asked my right hon. Friend to undertake to honour our party's pledge to deal with hunting with dogs, and to bring in a total ban on that detestable and despicable activity. I do not forecast that that will happen in the next Queen's Speech, but I expect it to be in the one after because of indications that have been floated. I am disappointed that the time has not yet come, but it will come over the next couple of years. The House will have another free and democratic vote on hunting.

Debates of this type are understandably emotional. However, we have all witnessed the cruel treatment of animals on our televisions. Experimentation and the transport of live animals for slaughter are unbearable to many people, especially young people—from students to primary school children. The advance of computers and new technology into the classroom has created a growing potential for involvement by those youngsters, and that augurs well for the character of British society. That—if I may use the phrase—is the British way.

Our minimum standards for the export of animals mean that sheep are packed in by the hundred. Huge transporters, four tiers high, are used in Europe. There is supposed to be a mutual agreement that sheep must be watered after eight hours, but it does not happen. The average time without water is between 18 and 24 hours. I am told that sheep sometimes go 36 hours without feed of any kind.

Horses and ponies are sent in their thousands for slaughter abroad. As deputy leader of the British delegation to the Council of Europe, I know that countries have joined that organisation from eastern Europe where, with all due respect, people are indifferent to animal welfare. There are many circuses in that part of the world. We have tried to plead with delegates to introduce a code of conduct and to bring humanity to the care of animals.

To return to an earlier point, because of appalling slaughtering standards, the Government do not allow certain animal exports. The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) noted the existence of conflicting standards.

I cannot mention the establishment in question because it is in the constituency of another Member who is not present, but I recently tabled an early-day motion:

"That this House condemns the appalling and deplorable trade practice at establishments that breed cats and kittens for the vivisection industry and sell them to laboratories worldwide; notes that some of these kittens are only six weeks old when they are subject to horrific experiments; and calls upon the Home Secretary to investigate this cruel trade".

Police protection for the establishment concerned has cost £1.5 million of taxpayers' money. There are others, unfortunately, involved in a cruel trade with barbaric practices that puts profit before humanity.

More and more people believe that it is morally wrong to cause animals to suffer and die in the laboratory. We know that laboratory animals feel pain in the same way that we do. The law acknowledges that and science accepts it, too. Thousands of animals suffer and die in research laboratories to test cosmetics and toiletries such as lipstick, soap and shampoo. Many such products, which we use every day, have been paid for with suffering. Drips are put into the unprotected eyes of animals, rubbed into the raw, shaven backs of guinea pigs or forced down the throats of rats. I do not want to describe such things because the result is obviously not beautiful. We must consider when purchasing such things whether we should give the producers concerned our custom.

I want to say a few words about circus animals. Many hon. Members will have seen the recent video "The Ugliest Show on Earth". Only last week, a circus came to the field next to my home. No matter how well housed the animals were, or how much the circus tried to say that their welfare was assured, I could hear animals howling during the night. It was obvious that they were bored. It is a contemptible method of subjecting them to something unnatural. I went to the local authority, which is Labour-controlled, and which I used to lead, and pleaded. I asked why it had given these people a licence but there was no law that could stop it. The land was private. The circus was to stay for seven days. It could apply for 10 days; it stayed a fortnight. Unfortunately, we cannot control these things unless we want to legislate.

[Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe]

Animals do not smoke, drink alcohol, drive, use paints or drop bombs, but we do. If we do those things, why should they suffer for our weakness?

11.33 am

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): I declare a general interest in that I advise Novartis, a multinational company. It may have an interest in the matter, but I do not know its particular views. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on his excellent summary of the problem. He reflected the concern of many hon. Members and many among the general public.

We recently debated the multilateral agreement on investment. A broad spectrum of people mobilised opposition to the agreement as it stood, because of concerns about its impact on developing countries and their ability to protect their development in an environmentally friendly way that would be acceptable to most people in Britain. Many were surprised by the breadth of the opposition to the agreement in the form in which it stood, yet the discussion on the MAI was largely on the relatively narrow issue of the rights of developing countries. That is an important issue, but it engages only a certain number of non-governmental organisations.

In the Word Trade Organisation debate, concern comes from a very broad range of NGOs. There are the groups concerned with the environment. We all recognise now that the environment of one country affects the environment of all others. There are groups concerned with development and social issues, both in the third world and closer to home, and groups concerned with animal welfare. The hunting debate showed that the animal welfare organisations can mobilise massive popular support.

I predict that in many countries, but especially in Britain, if those groups together come to the conclusion that our policy on free trade is against the interests of their collective concerns, there will be a massive backlash against free trade, which is not in anyone's interests, because free trade has brought enormous benefits. We must ensure that the free trade agenda is not hijacked by narrow interests that are contemptuous of or indifferent to the concerns that we have raised. In the long run, that will damage us all.

In principle, the WTO and the organisations that expressed concern enjoy broad consensus. Nearly everyone agrees that free trade within reasonable limits is a positive thing, which has brought many benefits. Most people agree that environmental concerns are appropriate. We are all periodically nasty about ruthless capitalist companies that try to exploit the environment, but the reality is that relatively few companies have an active interest in eradicating life and destroying the environment around them, because it is bad for business. The companies accept in principle that they benefit from sensible environmental rules if they are stable, fair and non-discriminatory.

In the same way, in western Europe and north America, but in many other countries as well, it is accepted that it is desirable that production methods do not inflict great harm and suffering on animals. In particular, it is widely accepted that consumers should have the option of avoiding products of whose production methods they do not approve. It is not widely recognised that it may be illegal to inform consumers about the way in which products are produced in certain circumstances.

Most people believe that the rules on free trade simply mean that we must not be discriminatory, that we cannot pass a law saying that we will buy only British beef and stop anything else at the border. Most people accept that that is reasonable. It is not so broadly recognised that, under the rules as currently interpreted, production methods cannot be the subject of national legislation.

The classic example is the battery hen. One cannot tell by looking at an egg whether it was produced by a battery or free-range hen. Under the interpretation commonly applied by the WTO and the general agreement on tariffs and trade, we are not allowed to discriminate against battery hens or battery hen production, because we are allowed to consider only the end product.

The problem is that the overwhelming majority of ethical concerns—social, environmental, third world and animal welfare—relate to the means of production. I do not know anybody who wants to ban eggs, but I know many people who are concerned about eggs produced by intensively reared hens. I should like the Minister to accept that, in the interests of the long-term development of free trade, there is a need to seek a non-discriminatory way of addressing the problem of the means of production.

There are precedents for this. As the hon. Member for Dartford said, when the general agreement on tariffs and trade was set up after the war, prison labour was specifically excluded from the areas in which discrimination was not allowed. It is possible to say that we will not take goods produced by prison labour. That was a specific exemption created during the post-war period, under the shadow of Nazi work camps, and it stands in isolation. As I understand it, it is thought not to be possible to introduce discrimination against products from bonded labour or child labour. There is a clear inconsistency, which I hope will give the Minister some leverage to enable him to make progress.

I should like to ask some specific questions of the Minister. I shall be brief, because I know that other hon. Members want to speak, and I hope that we can leave the Minister time to address the issues.

First, what does the Minister see as the main obstacles to progress? If he accepts that there is a problem, how does he envisage tackling them? Secondly, the European Union has said for some time, through the Commission, that it has been considering raising these issues at a high-level meeting before the next WTO conference. Will Britain take the initiative on the Council of Ministers to instruct the Commission to include these topics in its negotiating package and to prepare proposals to address the problem? In that way, Britain and Europe could be seen to be taking a lead.

Thirdly, will Britain support proposals along the lines urged by Compassion in World Farming and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which have been active in these matters, to reinforce article XX of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, allowing nation states to take account of these matters? That was mentioned by the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker). I also agree that article III needs attention.

Will Britain promote discussion of a framework for mandatory labelling schemes for consumer information? Even those who feel reluctant to accept a relaxation in the rules to allow for welfare considerations accept that there is a reasonable case for consumers to know what the hell is going on, and how a product is produced. We need to be able to do that without being subject to international legal challenge. We should accept that the WTO would be able to examine a labelling scheme to ensure that it is not deliberately discriminatory, so that labels do not say, "British" or "Horrible foreign goods". We need to have the possibility of mandatory systems that will provide consumers with the choice they need.

With the failure of the multilateral agreement on investment in the present round, there is now a vacuum in fair trade and fair investment rules. The debate on the multilateral agreement on investment and the current WTO debate show the need for a multi-pronged approach, balancing increasing liberalisation with adherence to agreed minimum standards.

To take a slightly far-fetched parallel, it is a little like the Northern Ireland talks. It is difficult to make progress in one area unless the participants are confident that there will be a balance of progress in another area. The argument that we should agree to total liberalisation, and that the rest can be delegated to some animal welfare organisation, is not accepted by the groups involved, because they suspect, probably correctly, that they will be blocked in the later discussions.

The time is right for the Government to take a lead internationally, and to perform a real service for the world trading community by looking for a framework in which liberalised trade can be supplemented by ethical standards. I believe that most people would be extremely pleased if the Minister and his colleagues would take the initiative. We would all be proud of our country if we could bring about something along those lines to help solve this problem, which ultimately concerns so many people.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) for selecting this topic, and for his coherent and comprehensive introduction to an important debate. He touched on a number of issues, which I hope that the Minister will address in some detail when he replies. In one of those issues—the current case being fought by the Canadian Government against the French on white asbestos—I hope that the Government will do all they can to support our French colleagues in resisting what Canada has done.

I can draw on a recent example in the Council of Europe. The Committee chaired by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), produced a report which would outlaw the use and manufacture of asbestos throughout the Council of Europe area. There was a pathetic display by the Canadian Government, who propped up the Russians. The Canadian Government tabled amendments on which the Russians had not been briefed, and they got the Russians to express points of view which contradicted their own standpoint on many of these issues.

The Canadians and the Russians did all they could to frustrate what was universally accepted in the room, except by those two nations, as something that would benefit the people of Europe. As has been said, asbestos has killed people by the thousand in our country every year, and many of us felt that its continued use was a breach of human rights. It is as much a death sentence as any execution carried out in the Ukraine or elsewhere.

We must be vigilant, and support nations who are prepared to tackle this issue. On this occasion, the Government should do all they can to support the French. More importantly, I hope that the British Government will show initiative in taking on board the resolution of the Council of Europe pretty damn quickly, and bringing it into law in this country.

The hon. Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) spoke for the overwhelming majority of hon. Members when he mentioned his frustration at not being able to pursue the hunting Bill. Since we have been back from the recess, we have had two non-working Fridays—presumably there will be another next week—and the House has gone home early three times. There would have been enough time to see that very good Bill go through all its stages. We would probably have had sufficient time to frustrate the frustraters.

That Bill could have become law if the Government had had the resolve that they suggested when they were in opposition. I hope that the Bill will come back. I should like to see it in the next Queen's Speech, but, if the whispers that it may appear in the one after next are correct, I hope that that is a commitment that the Government will not shirk, and that we will see the Bill come to fruition in the lifetime of this Parliament.

For the past 30 years, I have campaigned in my city for the banning of the export of live animals. It came to a head in the late 1970s, when we opened our own ferry port. Nobody who has travelled by car on a ferry containing animals in transit can fail to be moved and emotionally embarrassed by the fact that human beings can allow animals to be transported in such a way. I have been on ships in force eight or nine gales, during which the ferry companies have been embarrassed to allow people back to the car decks because of the noise of the animals. That continues.

Hon. Members have talked about the four-tier lorries transporting sheep across Europe. I witnessed an accident on the border between Romania and Hungary at the end of the winter. A lorry containing sheep had overturned, and 30 or 50 dead sheep were sprawled across the road; blood was pouring into the sand. That was the horrific consequence of a nasty accident. There were at least twice as many animals on the lorry as the law would have permitted in this country.

The ironic thing is that those sheep had originated in the United Kingdom, and had been moved on to the lorry that crashed on the Romanian border. Their onward transhipment was through Romania, Bulgaria, Turkey and then into the middle east. Animals reared in the UK and subject to the law of this country are being taken 2,500 miles across Europe and down into the middle east, and we do nothing about it. Most reasonable people would be horrified to know that such things go on.

In March, I tabled a written question

"To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will raise the issue of the effect of the GATT on EU animal welfare directives during the World Trade Organisation Ministerial Conference in May".

[Mr. Mike Hancock]

The answer was:

"The European Communities' final position . . . is still under discussion."—[Official Report, 24 March 1998; Vol. 309, c. 110.]

We held the presidency at that time. Why on earth did we not take that initiative on?

In July, I tabled a written question to ask the Minister of Agriculture what plans he had to raise the export of cattle from the European Union to middle eastern countries. The answer was:

"The Government have no plans to seek an end to the payment of export refunds on live cattle."—[Official Report, 24 July 1997; Vol. 298, c. 707.]

It was implied that we should wait for the value of dead meat exports to catch up.

What a pathetic response from a nation that is supposed to care, and a Government who, in opposition, said that they would tackle these issues. It is no good saying that we cannot do it. I am grateful that we have signed up to the convention on international trade in endangered species. It is right that we are able to ban trade in endangered species, but surely we have a right and a duty to ban the cruel and inhumane transport and exploitation of animals that have been raised here. We cannot hide behind others any longer: we have to tackle this issue.

I am bitterly disappointed that, when we held the presidency of the European Union, we did not do more. Organisations such as Animal Defenders, the National Anti-Vivisection Society and Compassion in World Farming have campaigned for decades to make the public understand the cruelty that goes on. The hon. Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) talked about just some of the examples, including cosmetic testing and the blinding of animals to make sure that humans do not suffer. Most reasonable people are horrified when such practices are exposed, and rightly turn away from those products when they know.

Many people—the Body Shop is a classic example—have made a virtue of establishing their credibility within the marketplace by showing that it is possible to make a profit without inflicting cruelty. It can and should work. We have to make sure that such issues are not ignored in the House.

Too many of the people we represent believe that we have a direct responsibility to do something about animal welfare. I never cease to be amazed at how many times the issues are raised in the House and how little happens. In my previous existence as a Member of Parliament, the Conservatives were in power. What a pathetic example they gave of a party that is supposed to care. Their caring started and ended with the profit motive. They did nothing to establish proper care and responsibility for animal welfare. At the end of this Parliament, I do not want Labour Members who have loyally supported the Government to feel that they have been let down. I hope that the Labour Government have enough resolve and backbone to tackle animal welfare issues.

With so much human talent around, we do not need to exploit animals for our entertainment. Circuses that include animals should become a thing of the past—a thing that people talk about, but are delighted to know no longer exist. The exportation of animals and cruelty in the rearing of animals should be high on the Government's agenda. As many hon. Members have said, it is high on the agenda of many of the people we represent.

I hope that today the message will go out that once again, the House of Commons has spoken on behalf of the overwhelming majority of British people, who believe that it is the right time for the Government to do the right thing, to get behind the public, and fight on animal welfare issues. If that means fighting through the courts of the world, we should do so.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I shall make a short speech, because it is important that other hon. Members make some of their points, and that the Minister has time to respond.

I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on obtaining this important debate. I wish to highlight one or two things, but first I want to set the debate in context. The issues on which we all receive most letters in our postbags are animal welfare and the social and environmental concerns that affect world trade.

When I visit schools or meet children elsewhere, they say things like, "Why is it that we continue to export animals in this way? Why is it that we continue to rape the rain forests? Why do we continue to use child labour to produce footballs or carpets?" When they say that sort of thing, it challenges me as a Member of Parliament or, indeed, as an adult. It challenged me when I was a teacher. I say, "You have to understand that it is a complicated situation. It is difficult to deal with the problem. There are all sorts of laws and difficulties in understanding how trade organisations work. There is something called GATT, and something called the World Trade Organisation." They reply, "But it's cruel. It's not right."

Such challenges from children to Parliament put the debate in context, and show that we really need to be judged by our actions. I sometimes feel that I am making excuses and explaining away something that it is difficult to explain away. I know that the Government are desperate to do something. Ministers do not believe in cruelty. They want to do something about it.

The purpose of today's debate is to generate even more passion, more desire and more determination in the Government to take on people who use—let us be frank—the cloak of free trade and the liberalisation of trade to continue practices that we regard as barbaric. They do not do so because they want to improve the lot of the people they pretend to represent. They do not do so to increase the prosperity of ordinary people. They do it to protect the profit of individuals in those areas, and they want to continue the exploitation.

None of us is opposed to trade. We all know that trade means prosperity. We do not want to pull up the ladder and say, "We are prosperous and well off, thank you very much. We don't want you to develop your industries." It is in that context that we need to discuss the issue.

In the approaching WTO negotiations, it is important that we understand and accept the key argument that the way in which something is produced or made is an important consideration for this country. We want the right to determine whether products are allowed into this country. That requires fundamental changes to our trading arrangements.

Free trade is one thing; the liberalisation of trade is another; but the exploitation of children, cruelty to animals and the rape of rain forests are something else entirely. We have to ask ourselves some serious questions if we, as part of the civilised world and as a civilising influence on the world, are unable to sit down at the table and help to produce an agreement that protects the environment, supports decent labour standards for people in other countries and improves animal welfare standards, while simultaneously promoting prosperity and enhancing worldwide trade arrangements.

When the children I meet ask me what the Government—not the Labour Government, or the Conservative Government, but our Government, and our Parliament—are doing to address those serious issues and to ensure that we no longer have to witness some of the scenes described by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South, I want to be able to tell them that we are trying to achieve something better.

12 noon

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover): I shall concentrate specifically on live animal exports. In a previous life, I spent almost 30 years in the Merchant Navy, sailing on ships to the far east and crossing the channel. I have seen some of the suffering close up; I have felt it and smelt it and I know what it is all about.

The general agreement on tariffs and trade acts against our ability to ban live animal exports. Every year, about 500,000 animals are exported from the European Union to the middle east. We know about their suffering during the voyage and during their discharge at the end of the journey, in high temperatures and uncontrolled conditions. We know some of their suffering during the act of slaughter. It is beyond belief that the EU does not have the power to stop that evil trade.

That trade takes place much closer to home: every week, many thousands of live animals are exported through my constituency of Dover. I pay tribute to the local animal welfare organisations—especially Kent Against Live Animal Exports, of which I am a member—which have picketed, day and night and in all weather, over the past two years to try to bring an end to the evil trade. Dover harbour board wants to stop the trade and has tried to do so; the mainstream—one might call them "legitimate"—ferry companies want to stop it; yet still the trade continues.

The ordinary people who turn out, day and night, many without a political thought in their head other than the welfare of animals, cannot understand why our Government are unable to ban the trade. They cannot understand why the EU is unable to ban the trade from Europe to the middle east. They cannot understand why the free trade regulations completely ignore any principles of ethics or morality in their application.

I join in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on having covered the subject in depth and on managing to mention the third way twice—now it has been mentioned for a third time. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to take to the negotiations the message that there is an urgent need to inject morality, ethics and fairness into all future negotiations.

12.3 pm

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I speak as no supporter of free trade, and I take some comfort from the fact that the WTO does not believe in free trade either. The latest American research shows that at least 200 international cartels of major corporations are involved in global price fixing, but the WTO has absolutely nothing to say about that. The difference between my position and that of the WTO is that I believe that the next century will demand that we address two issues: one is the agenda for sustainable economics; the other is the need to establish responsible trade and production, rather than have a deregulated world economy that causes greater climate change and plunges us into climatic crisis.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take account of four principles in the negotiations on the revision of WTO rules in which the UK is to be involved. First, we have to make a commitment to honour the achievements of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister in the Kyoto negotiations. We must ensure that environmental responsibility and sustainability take precedence over all forms of international treaty that would undermine our ability, both locally and globally, to meet environmental protection targets.

Secondly, after the international triumph of organisations that scuppered the multilateral agreement on investment, which was secretly negotiated within the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the UK must not entertain the notion of that being introduced into the WTO by the back door.

Thirdly, we must enter the negotiations with the aim of questioning one of the key forms of protectionism written into WTO rules, which relates to intellectual property rights. The objections of countries in the developing world to the use of biotechnology patents to rape and pillage their genetic inheritance must be heeded. In India, half of the essential herbs that form the basis of ayurvedic medicine have been the subject of patent applications from European and US companies. We must restore the rights of self-development and sustainable development to the third world.

Fourthly, we must extend the rights of consumers to demand protection from the introduction of genetically modified crops, for which there is no public demand and which are the subject of large-scale environmental, health and social concerns that have yet to be adequately answered.

I ask that the UK's negotiating stance be based on the following commitments. Sustainability should take precedence over market deregulation. The precautionary principle, long established as the cornerstone of society's right to protection from adverse environmental and health consequences of new inventions, should take precedence over environmental exploitation. Democratic accountability should take precedence over the price mechanism. Finally, human, environmental and animal health should take precedence over the demands of corporate dividends and stakeholder demands. If we adopt such a stance, we shall be better able internationally to adhere to the amazing achievements of the Deputy Prime Minister in Kyoto, and to turn GATT into something with which the world can live, rather than something by which it will be destroyed.

12.7 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on securing the debate. He has done the House a service in drawing attention to the increasing conflict between the globalised free market and the need for environmental protection. I am sure that the debate will continue over the coming years and will be the main subject of political debate in the next century.

The timing of today's debate is significant, given that yesterday my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister published a document outlining the way in which the Government will deliver their Kyoto commitments; and that last week the French Government decided to withdraw their support from the multilateral agreement on investment. It is worth dwelling on those two points because, in two weeks' time, the Government will be pursuing the Kyoto agenda at the Buenos Aires conference. Securing an agreement between the demands of the United States, China and the developing world on the setting of emissions limits, while keeping the wheels of free trade turning, will not only require great political skill, but will again heighten the tension between free trade and environmental protection.

On the subject of the MAI, I draw the attention of the House to early-day motion 1700, which appears on today's Order Paper. I urge hon. Members to read it and sign it if they feel able to do so. Although the MAI was only a small part of the much wider GATT agenda, it was significant, reflecting the changing climate in thinking on globalisation. Increasingly, the thinking now—not only in the United Kingdom but abroad—is that we can no longer accept the orthodoxy that we have been asked to accept for the past 50 years. Environmental concerns are increasingly at the heart of worldwide economic debates.

I want to ensure that the Minister has ample time to reply to the debate, so I shall conclude. However, I endorse the specific questions asked by my hon. Friends the Members for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) and for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), which I hope that the Minister will be able to answer in detail.

Today, we have discussed reform of the World Trade Organisation and its limitations in dealing with environmental matters. Perhaps a much bigger issue is the nature of the international institutions that have developed in recent years, and whether those organisations are capable of dealing with the new economic situation that we now face. I wonder whether the WTO, for example, can ever be reformed to deal fully with the sustainable development agenda, or whether—given that we have not only a World Health Organisation but a World Trade Organisation—we now need a world environment organisation.

12.10 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): I, too, welcome this debate and congratulate the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on the way in which he introduced it. I do not know whether he admitted to this, but I suspect that the debate was much inspired by a stimulating report by the RSPCA entitled "Conflict or Concord? Animal welfare and the World Trade Organisation", to which I shall refer later.

We have had a wide-ranging debate, which included references to circuses and hunting. I shall concentrate my remarks on the main subject of the debate—world trade—and welcome the general support for free trade that has been apparent in hon. Members' speeches.

I should like to concentrate on one specific example, so that we might try to draw some lessons from it. I make no apology for referring, again, to the issue of the plight of the British pig industry.

Pigmeat is the United Kingdom's most popular meat. Last year, consumers spent an estimated £5.9 billion on pigmeat—pork, bacon, ham and other pigmeat products—which represented almost 40 per cent. of all spending on meat and meat products. The previous, Conservative Government, with all-party support and support from consumers, introduced regulations that have given our pig industry the highest welfare standards in Europe and probably in the world. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) was not prepared to give credit to the Conservative Government for the progress that they made on that matter.

This morning, some hon. Members had the privilege of attending the pig industry's "Big Pig Breakfast". I was delighted that that gathering was attended by the Agriculture Minister, as a demonstration of his solidarity with farmers in their concerns. At the breakfast, a Scottish pig farmer—it is relevant that I should refer to him, as the Minister who will reply to this debate is a Scot through and through—made the important point that he is losing £23 pounds per pig. Those losses include about £4 per pig in additional welfare costs that he, unlike his competitors, must pay; £3 per pig to dispose of the meat and bonemeal that he is not allowed to feed back into his pigs, although farmers on the continent can do so; and £7 per pig because of the high value of the pound.

There is a grave danger that, from 1 January 1999, when the new welfare regulations on stalls and tethers are fully implemented, the number of pigs reared under those improved conditions will fall. Pigs reared abroad to lower standards and at lower cost will be substituted for the premium British product, resulting in reduced market share for our own producers. All those who have campaigned, quite legitimately, for higher welfare standards in pig production will find, ironically, that fewer pigs are produced to those standards because of our unilaterally introducing the regulations. That is not what the House intended or what British consumers or farmers wanted. I ask the Minister what the Government will do about it.

We should be able to differentiate our product and make consumers aware of, for example, the fact that only about 10 per cent. of Danish pig units are said to be free of stalls and tethers, and that as little as 2 per cent. of Dutch units are said to be free of stalls and tethers. If consumers are concerned about pigs produced in unpleasant and cruel conditions, they should not be buying Danish or Dutch pork products.

The Opposition believe that there should be greater scope for informed consumer choice. However, as the regulations are very confusing, how can consumers receive the correct information? Although British pork is reared under the highest standards in the world, how can we know that British pork is really British produced? The pork from a pig that is produced and slaughtered on the continent and brought to the United Kingdom to be used in pork pies or sausages can be sold as British pork. Consumers may very well be under the illusion that animals from which that "British" pork came were reared according to the high welfare standards that we require of our own pig producers.

What will we do about that serious problem, which has been exacerbated by some European Union regulations? As so often in our debates, we learn that the EU stands between legislators and consumers. The Opposition wish to legislate to enable consumers to make an effective choice, but discover that regulations on protecting food names, which were introduced in 1993, seem effectively to be designed to undermine the status of nation states within Europe and to prevent products being labelled as, for example, "British pork". One cannot label a product as "British pork" and therefore imply that it has been produced to higher welfare standards.

The RSPCA makes in its document some interesting points on the importance of labelling and letting consumers decide. I hope that the RSPCA, which is itself concerned about animal welfare, will help to promote British pork, and that, from the beginning of next year, it will say that buying and eating British pork will be promoting pork that has been produced to standards that are much higher than those of our European counterparts. If we let consumers have the information, I am sure that they will make the right decision. I hope that the RSPCA will join in the campaign to promote British pork.

There is much concern also about the genetic modification of food, which the hon. Member for Dartford mentioned in passing. I recently saw a guide for consumers, entitled "Foodsense: genetic modification and food", produced by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. On page 13, it states:

"the Government is determined to ensure that all foods which may contain genetically modified material are clearly labelled. These would include foods which contain genetically modified products used as food ingredients such as GM soya, maize and tomato paste."

That is all very well. However, on page 14, it states:

"How will genetically modified food be labelled?

Under the EC Novel Foods Regulation a genetically modified food will be labelled if it is judged, on the basis of a scientific assessment, not to be equivalent to an existing food. Foods will also require labelling if there are any ethical concerns or if it contains a genetically modified organism, even if it is equivalent to an existing food."

That statement is not the same as saying that the consumer will be given the power to make an informed choice, because the information that foods are subject to genetic modification will be given only in certain circumstances.

The document continues:

"The Government"—

rightly—

"believes that all foods should be labelled so that consumers are made aware when they contain any genetically modified material. The UK will be pressing for this when foods are approved under the regulation."

I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us today how he will secure that outcome for the British consumer.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Brian Wilson): I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) for securing this debate and also to all the hon. Members who have participated and who have made constructive contributions. I include among them the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), although I could not help feeling that the "Big Pig Breakfast" came as a rather timely research source for his speech. I undertake to get for him the information that he wants about the labelling of British pork, and labelling is a subject to which I shall return later.

To be frank, I am grateful for the debate not least because I am new to my current responsibilities. I have never been one to pretend that there is a seamless transition of knowledge and wisdom that accompanies Ministers or, indeed, Opposition spokesmen from one job to another. I have been more than interested to hear the well-informed comments of hon. Members from all parties, who clearly bring to the debate long and distinguished backgrounds of interest and research in the subject.

Perhaps more than in other debates, everyone who has spoken today shares the same objectives. In an ideal world, we should like everything that we imported and exported to be safe and humanely produced in an environmentally responsible manner by people who have been paid a fair rate for the job. I am sure that we could all unite around that wish. It certainly contains a very laudable set of aspirations. The problem begins of course with the fact that every word in the mission statement—to use a terrible phrase—that I have just set out is open to endless discussion about definitions. That is what makes the subject genuinely complex.

The calls for action may be perfectly reasonable on the surface. Indeed, from the perspective of a sophisticated, developed economy, they might seem like modest environmental prerequisites for trade; but exactly the same call for action, viewed from the perspective of a developing country, might well appear as no more or less than crafty rich-world protectionism.

It is not necessary to be a free trade ideologue—to paraphrase my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford—to recognise the very real pitfalls that may quickly appear if we introduce sanctions against products of which we do not like the look or the smell. As my hon. Friend and others recognised, the argument falls overwhelmingly in favour of liberal trade policies. In principle, no hon. Member supports the opposite, as protectionism inhibits liberal trade. I think that I can include among those hon. Members my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson). He fairly points out that cartels exist, but I do not think that he adduces that fact as a reason for believing that cartels should exist. It is a perfectly reasonable argument for pointing out that rhetoric does not always match reality. I do not think that my hon. Friend would dissent from the view that, if rules are fairly applied and set, a liberal trade world is a much better proposition than a restrictive one.

As many hon. Members have said, the debate is not about absolute principle but is a matter of balance. Again, everyone agrees that trade is not the ideal or the primary instrument through which social or environmental objectives, however desirable, should be pursued. That takes us back to the question of balance and the identification of spheres in which it is appropriate to limit trade, as that is the only apparent way of achieving the desired objectives. I assure the House that it is a highly legitimate area of debate, which I have a genuine interest in exploring.

It is in all our interests to get the answers right from a United Kingdom perspective so that we have a trade policy that is both consistent with the principles that we pursue and that is sensitive to the concerns that have been expressed today. I in no way underestimate the difficulty of getting that balance right. In the rhetorical flourish at the end of his speech, the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) urged us to have enough backbone to tackle those issues. That is fine, but the first example that he adduced of where we—I presume that he meant me—should have backbone involved performing animals in circuses. My responsibilities are wide, but I am not sure that the matter to which the hon. Gentleman referred is one for the World Trade Organisation.

There are some topics for which I want to put down markers of agreement. For example, the call for greater openness and transparency in the WTO is one with which I readily agree. There has been growing recognition of the need for greater dialogue with the general public and non-governmental organisations about the principles that underlie trade liberalisation and the multilateral trading system operated by the WTO. It has to be explained why they are advantageous for developed countries as well as less developed countries and for jobs, growth and prosperity. All dialogue on such matters should be conducted openly.

In that context, we can welcome measures taken by the WTO to be more open. They include the de-restriction of documents, the use of the internet and so on. They show a welcome desire on the part of the WTO to be more open, but I do not believe that the process has gone far enough. We can play a leading role in urging greater transparency within the WTO.

One point on which I can perhaps bring some optimism among hon. Members who have spoken today is the shrimp-turtle case. The appellate body has come out not against the measure, but only against the way in which the United States chooses to pursue it. I shall not, as one hon. Member requested, give the Government's definitive position on that issue today. Because of its importance, it may become the definitive trade and environmental case study in terms of WTO jurisprudence. We have to consider it carefully and discuss it circumspectly until a position emerges. It is an example of a case being pursued by a wide range of opinion and countries, and the WTO has not categorically come out against the action taken. We have to consider the implication of the appellant body's ruling.

It is for the same reason that I cannot say too much about the Canadian asbestos case, although I wholly agree that it is interesting and highly relevant to the way in which the WTO discharges its functions. It is, of course, subject to appeal by the Canadians. Again, it will have a marked impact on perceptions of how the WTO approaches such matters.

Another matter on which we can find agreement and on which I can offer something to hon. Members who have spoken today is the UK's role in taking forward those issues within the European Union and the WTO. We are actively encouraging a high-level meeting on trade and the environment. The EU's proposal to that effect is now being considered by our partners in the WTO. In order to make progress, we obviously have to agree an agenda that will attract wide support and involvement.

Mr. Baker: We are running out of time. The Minister was asked some specific questions—I counted about 10—which he will not have time to answer. He was open about being on a steep learning curve, so will he undertake to write to hon. Members with the answers that they seek?

Mr. Wilson: I have no difficulty in giving the hon. Gentleman that absolute assurance. It is much more useful to write to hon. Members than to gabble through the replies in front of me. I have every intention of trying to address the concerns.

I believe that broad philosophical agreement exists on the problem. The objectives are not in doubt. For instance, there is consensus that the best way to tackle labour standard issues is through the International Labour Organisation. If we tried through the World Trade Organisation to create a framework of labour rules for developing countries, the subject would hardly get on to the agenda, far less have a prospect of early success. If we are to make progress, it is important to be much more specific in defining those aspects that are within the WTO's remit—that is, within trade. In the case of issues that are not, we should consider whether another avenue exists.

This interesting debate will continue. I assure hon. Members that I shall take a close interest in the matter.

Black Watch

12.30 pm

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to raise this important national and constituency issue on the Floor of the House. With the Minister's agreement, I shall restrict my comments to allow my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) to speak.

The Black Watch Territorial Army Battalion, which has its headquarters in Perth and which recruits widely throughout Perthshire, Angus and Fife, is the volunteer arm of one of the most distinguished regiments in our armed forces. I understand that it was raised in 1746, so it is also one of the oldest. The House may recall that the Black Watch regulars were the regiment that oversaw the lowering of the union jack over Hong Kong last year. It is my hope, of course, that the regiment and its full complement of volunteers will be present at the raising of the saltire at the independence ceremonies for Scotland in a few years' time.

Hon. Members will be aware of the broad thrust of the proposals for the Territorial Army throughout the United Kingdom and in Scotland—a cut of some 30 per cent. across the UK, but, I am informed, a fall of some 47 per cent. in the highlands. However, we have been left in the dark about the impact on individual TA battalions and companies.

Before the recess, the Government assured the House that consultation on future TA deployment would take place over the summer, and that an announcement would be made in the autumn. That announcement, as I understand it, has been delayed. My information is that we are unlikely to hear the fate of our individual TA units until December. That is an appalling way to treat the volunteers. Will the Minister please explain the reasons for the delay? One conclusion is that it is intended to delay the news until just before Christmas, in the hope that the bad news will be swamped by the seasonal preparations.

If the Minister departs from his prepared response in only one area today, I hope that he will do so to answer the following questions. Has he personally seen the Army's recommendations on the TA? Does his Department have a copy of those recommendations? If the answer to either of those questions is yes, when did he or his Department receive the recommendations? What is the reason for any delay in the final announcement? Can he today give us a date for the publication of the final details of the TA cuts? Over the past few days, I have spoken to many members of the Territorial Army at every level. They, too, have asked those questions, and it is insulting to them that the Government are not coming clean with the proposals right now.

What is most demeaning, and what has caused almost 300 volunteers in the highlands to leave the TA over the summer, is the fact that the likely outcome of the so-called review seems clear. Those men know that their battalions are facing large cuts and loss of identity, so there is little incentive for them to remain in them.

It appears that, in my area, the Black Watch will be merged with the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders TA and the Highlanders TA, with the Black Watch reduced to one company and the others possibly escaping with two each. The Black Watch cap badges will remain, the red hackles may still be there, but, when that cap badge covers a company of as few as 100 men, that can be seen as little more than a sop.

In my area, it is hoped that Perth itself will retain the battalion headquarters, but information suggests that it is likely that the Black Watch TA presence will go from Forfar and Kirkcaldy—two of the most modern TA centres in the country. That at Forfar opened as recently as this year, at a cost of £800,000, and that at Kirkcaldy was renovated three years ago, at a cost of more than £2 million. If Kirkcaldy goes, it will be an end to the infantry presence in Fife. I do not consider that a saving; it seems more like a scandalous waste.

Overall, the Black Watch TA is bracing itself for a cut of some 69 per cent. in its complement—a loss of some 150 men. In 1995, the Black Watch alone of the highland regiments had its complement cut. Perhaps the Minister will explain why it seems to have been singled out for such draconian measures.

The current cuts are reflected elsewhere in Scotland and the UK. Obviously, I cannot stray too far from the subject of the debate, but hon. Members will appreciate that my comments on the Black Watch are intended as an illustration of a wider problem. This is not only a plea for the Government to change their mind on the Black Watch, but for them to rethink the whole review of the TA and to ensure that Scotland maintains a minimum complement of 7,000 volunteers.

The Minister is likely to argue that times have changed, and that volunteers do not play the role that they used to in our national defence. He may wax lyrical about the potency of Trident, rapid deployment forces and large aircraft carriers in allowing the UK to project its supposed might worldwide, but in my view such arguments are akin to a mid-life crisis, bringing to mind the man who craves the roar of a Ferrari when he needs a good four-wheel drive vehicle. This analysis does not take into account the real impact and importance of the Black Watch and the other TA battalions.

The Minister must consider two points. First, it is clear from the strategic defence review that the role of the armed forces has switched more heavily toward rapid deployment overseas and away from defence of the home territory. That is a strategic judgment, but in so reconfiguring the regulars he has left a role for the volunteers—home defence—which should mean keeping the TA units at current strength instead of slashing them. The Black Watch and the other battalions are the framework around which a home defence force can be raised. The Government's proposals threaten to turn that framework into a skeleton. That is not only my view, but that of senior members of the TA, to whom I have spoken in recent days and weeks.

Secondly, the Ministry of Defence recognises that the Territorial Army will play an increasing role, alongside the regulars, in some overseas deployments. I believe that about 10 per cent. of current UK forces in Bosnia are volunteers, providing additional skills to complement the regulars. Obviously, if the TA is cut, the burden of those duties will fall on a smaller number of increasingly demoralised volunteers. Is the Minister confident that the cream of the TA battalions will remain in service when their battalion identities are destroyed, and when recruitment areas are being cut? In the Black Watch area, the cuts will effectively mean freezing out Fife and Angus. Is the Minister confident that employers will be happy to see their staff called away increasingly often and bearing the additional burdens imposed by the cuts? Is he confident that he can find 1,500 volunteers for Bosnia from a pool of 40,000 men, when I am told that it is difficult enough to do so from a pool of 60,000?

The Territorial Army is, by its very name, a territorial body. Has the Minister forgotten that Scotland covers more than a quarter of the UK land mass? Surely there is an unanswerable case for that land mass, and the highlands in particular, to retain territorial units. There is no reason why the Black Watch should suffer a cut of twice the UK average. There must be a rethink on the deployment of volunteer engineers in Scotland. Although that matter is not directly related to the Black Watch, I should say that my hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) has been pressing for the retention of the two units in her constituency. Recent floods across the country should serve as reminder enough of the role that such units can play in such community and natural disasters. When the River Tay flooded in Perth in the early 1990s, the local infantry TA made a major contribution.

Finally, I want the Minister to consider the impact of the proposed cuts on my area and on communities throughout the country. It has been estimated that the economic loss throughout the UK from the slashing of 20,000 volunteers will be some £50 million. In Perthshire, Angus and Fife, the cuts could result in as much as £400,000 being removed from the local economies. They will result in fewer opportunities for young people in the towns most likely to lose their TA centres. They will impact on the recruitment of Army cadets. The two battalions of cadets in the Black Watch area will undoubtedly be affected by a loss of more than 60 per cent. in the manpower of their main source of military support. Given that much Regular Army recruitment comes from those serving in the TA, we may find an even bigger recruitment problem a few years down the line.

The Territorial Army takes up a mere 2 per cent. of the UK defence budget. That 2 per cent. provides a skills base for the regular forces, a pool of troops for overseas deployment, a link with local communities and a framework for home defence. That is money well spent, when other parts of the defence budget are being wasted on resources such as the unusable Trident nuclear system.

My plea to the Minister is to take heed of his short-sighted TA cuts in the Black Watch and the other volunteer battalions and invest in the backbone of our national defence, not in the grandiose delusions of nuclear power.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) on securing this debate and thank her for allowing me to make a brief contribution on my constituency interest.

I am concerned about the rumoured cuts in the strength of the Black Watch and the likelihood that the exercise will result in a 69 per cent. cut in numbers. My constituency interest relates to securing the future of the Strathmore TA centre at Forfar, where the anti-tank platoon of the third volunteer battalion of the Black Watch is based. The new centre, in Castle street, Forfar, was opened by the Earl of Airlie, the Lord Lieutenant of Angus, in April 1998, following an investment of nearly £800,000 in refurbishment. The premises have several attributes unique to the presence of an anti-tank platoon, notably the weapons store. Closing that centre would be short sighted, resulting in the loss of the investment made in those unique facilities.

When I visited the centre last Friday, I heard some cautious optimism about its future, but that contradicts the reports leaked earlier in the year suggesting that it was to be closed. Will the Minister settle that speculation today?

However, that is not the end of my concerns. I am acutely worried about the impact in my constituency, but there is also grave unease in the wider area of Fife and Tayside about the implications of the proposed cuts and how they might affect centres in Kirkcaldy, Dundee and Perth. Existing personnel have given great commitment to the Territorial Army. As a result of the proposals, they will simply be told that their commitment has been in vain. We do not want to lose that commitment and those resources.

My hon. Friend the Member for Perth referred to the important role of the Territorial Army in contributing to the local economy. I want to stress that strongly. There are implications for remuneration in the local economy and purchasing power in the Angus area.

The Territorial Army has an important role in recruitment at local level for the Regular Army. The traditional recruiting areas of the Black Watch in Angus, Dundee, Fife and Perthshire are closely associated with the regiment. There is a danger of the Government's proposals destroying that vital local link. I hope that the Minister will reassure us today about the regiment and my constituency interests.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): I congratulate the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) on securing a debate on the potential implications of reductions in the Territorial Army on the third battalion of the Black Watch, which has its headquarters in her constituency. She alluded to the creation of an independent Scotland, but did not say how she would pay for the TA while setting up a separate Army, Navy and Air Force for Scotland. Her sneering references to a mid-life crisis made clear her contempt for our armed services. However, despite her tone, she made some arguments that should be dealt with.

The debate is about the potential implications—I say potential only because no decisions have been taken. Indeed, no proposals have yet been put to Ministers. The Government fully appreciate that this is a period of uncertainty for those in the TA in Scotland and elsewhere in the UK. We are keen to make an announcement as soon as possible. The hon. Lady asked me to depart from my prepared response, which says that she would be the first to criticise us if we did not consult carefully all those concerned before reaching our decision. That is what we are doing and why we do not have a final response. The issues have not been decided before consultations with the Territorial Army have been completed. If we came with a prepared response while the consultation was still under way, the instant accusation in the Chamber would be that the consultations were a meaningless smokescreen.

We deplore the way in which internal consultation documents were leaked and then presented as Government proposals. As my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces told the House last week—and will no doubt say again in this afternoon's debate on the Army—the Government will return to the House with a statement when a decision has been made. We shall try to do that as soon as possible, after giving proper consideration to all the responses.

The hon. Member for Perth rightly drew attention to the long and distinguished history of the Black Watch, Scotland's senior highland regiment. The Highland Regiment of Foot was formed in 1740 and was known from the beginning as the Black Watch—derived, I understand, from the colour of the tartan and the original task of the companies in keeping watch over the highlands in the aftermath of the Jacobite rising. The regiment now contains one territorial battalion, with a headquarters at Queens barracks in Perth. The battalion has two companies, in Dundee and Kirkcaldy, with a platoon based in Forfar. The Government fully understand the important role that the Black Watch plays in the local community, which the hon. Members for Perth and for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) have articulated so forcefully.

When considering the potential implications of the reduction in size of the Territorial Army on battalions such as the Black Watch, and how best to minimise the negative impacts for any units that have to close, the Government have a responsibility to bear in mind the full implications of not making the changes. In short, as we said in the strategic defence review, we are looking to the future, not the past.

The current structure of the Territorial Army is based on cold war planning for defence in the event of a major Warsaw pact invasion of western Europe. That role is no longer realistic or credible and the TA must adapt to the new world. The structure is based on the role of territorial defence, particularly of key strategic installations, in the event of a major conflict in central Europe and the need to backfill into such a conflict. That is no longer part of the Ministry of Defence's strategic planning. We must ensure that the TA remains relevant and usable in the current strategic reality and that it is an integral part of the defence capability that the strategic defence review, following wide consultation in the services and beyond, has sought to identify. The TA can no longer have a structure based on the need to meet the threat of general war in Europe—a threat that no longer exists in the short or medium term. It is wasteful and demoralising to maintain forces for a non-existent role. That is why change is required.

We want a Territorial Army that is more fully integrated into the Regular Army and structured to meet today's security concerns. We seek a TA that is properly resourced, and provides career development and educational opportunities for those who wish to volunteer and to serve. We seek a Territorial Army that is trained to operate key battle-winning equipment, such as Challenger, AS90, the multiple-launch rocket system and Rapier, and which offers skills that can be of benefit in civilian employment both to the individual and their employers.

As part of the approach, we shall look to make greater use of the TA for the conduct of military operations than we have in the past. As was made clear in the strategic defence review, we need to be prepared to mobilise the TA more frequently. We did not compulsorily call it out for the Gulf war, but plan to do so for future operations of that scale. In seeking to strike the appropriate balance between the size of our regular forces and that of our reserves, however, we must take into account that, with few exceptions, we cannot expect our reserve forces to undertake operations at short notice or meet on-going day-to-day commitments. The hon. Member for Perth mentioned that greater use of the TA would not be attractive to employers. We know from discussions with employers that the greater level of training that will be provided will be attractive to them.

For the TA as a whole, therefore, the change in its character and role is important and good news. Instead of large numbers of forces planning and training to meet the implausible threat of an imminent strategic attack on the United Kingdom or our NATO allies, we see a force that will contribute to our ability to project military power abroad. The challenge is to prevent the Territorial Army becoming a symbol of the cold war, with no place in the new strategic setting.

The Government are keenly aware of the importance of maintaining the link between the Army—indeed, all the services—and the wider civilian population. That link has been fostered both nationally and locally by the presence of TA units in the community—not least by their support of local cadet forces, to which both the hon. Members for Perth and for North Tayside referred. The training that TA units offer, the values that they instil and the support that they provide in times of civilian crises are all vital functions.

In seeking to introduce such an important change, we are carefully considering all the issues—including those raised by the hon Lady and the hon. Gentleman in this debate. We hope to preserve as wide a presence as possible of the TA—as well as the other voluntary services in the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy, which I regret are sometimes forgotten in these debates—throughout the country. To assist us in reaching decisions, we have consulted widely on how the changes should be implemented. In particular, the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association, which has important local knowledge, has been fully involved.

It is tribute to the geographical coverage of the Territorial Army that there is a TA centre in the majority of constituencies. That understandably and rightly accounts for the interest that so many hon. Members take in plans for the TA and prospects for their local units, which are an important part of their communities. As well as ensuring that military requirements are met, it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that, as far as possible, the geographical spread should continue, and that all those who wish to offer their services are able to do so.

The geographical footprint of the services is one of the important criterion in evaluation of the proposals. As a result of the Secretary of State's announcement only last week, we have of course increased the visibility of the services in the community by allowing our forces to wear uniforms in their local areas. That is very important. We recognise the TA as a further important part in such visibility, and will consider it in our decisions.

[Mr. John Spellar]

If we are to be successful in implementing the change that is so important, some TA units will have to close or change role. For the reasons that I have given, we can not perpetuate the status quo, nor has there been a realistic argument that the TA should stay as it is.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) indicated dissent.

Mr. Spellar: That is so, even when individuals have argued points of detail.

The hon. Members for Perth and for North Tayside raised the question of cadets. Of particular importance, and a further criterion in our evaluation of particular sites, is the support often provided to local cadet forces by TA centres, such as the one in Perth. The cadets of all three services represent an important national youth movement. Although some will be affected by the planned changes in Territorial Army centres, we aim to minimise disruption wherever possible. Indeed, we are looking to increase the direct financial support that we offer them.

The hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) indicated that he thought that there was a realistic argument for the TA to stay as it is.

Mr. Menzies Campbell indicated dissent.

Mr. Spellar: He denies that. I am pleased to have his agreement, in the spirit of constructive opposition.

The hon. Member for Perth referred to the percentage of reserves and cadets who provide recruits to the armed forces. I understand that 25 per cent. of Regular Army recruits—officers and soldiers alike—have Army cadet experience. About 8 per cent. have TA experience.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will make clear in the debate later today, recruitment to the Army has much improved under this Government. We do not believe that our proposals for the TA will affect that to any significant degree. We recognise that the changes envisaged will have an impact on many members of the TA, including those whose units will not be closing, as well as all those who have contact with it. We are working hard to provide a sensitive package of measures for volunteers who leave the TA, and hope to be able to announce more about that later in the year.

Several other opportunities will be made available for volunteers who are unable to continue serving with the TA. Those will include service with the Regular Army, membership of the Royal Naval Reserve, or the Royal Air Force Reserve, and posts as officers or instructors with the cadets. In the event that suitable vacancies arise, the volunteers will of course have the opportunity to rejoin the TA. There will also be provisions concerning travel allowances. We recognise the geographical problems in Scotland to which the hon. Member for Perth drew attention. The hon. Lady also referred to Trident. Given the Scottish National party's opposition to Trident, it is slightly ironic that it campaigns vigorously on where Trident submarines should be refitted. Perhaps that is a further example of the SNP's inconsistency.

The implementation of changes in the TA will be difficult, but it important that we have a modern, relevant and usable Territorial Army which is fully integrated into the Regular Army and has much to offer those who wish to volunteer and serve, but are not able to serve full time.

The hon Member for Perth has drawn attention to the potential implications for the TA unit of the Black Watch in her constituency. I assure her that those and the many other representations that we have received from hon. Members and those involved with the TA will be taken into account in the decisions that Ministers will be taking over the next few weeks on its structure and our investment in the future of a strong, relevant and usable Territorial Army.

Pay-per-view Television

12.59 pm

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): It may seem strange to introduce what may be thought of as a rather marginal debate, but I believe that its subject will grow in importance, and that we shall come back to it.

Last week, at the all-party group on cricket, Tim Lamb, chief executive of the Test and County Cricket Board, said that the awarding of the contract for broadcasting cricket to Channel 4 might be the last such negotiation between broadcasters and sports bodies.

As pay-per-view and digital television grow, there will be a complete change in the way in which not only sports coverage but other coverage is negotiated. As David Elstein, former director of programmes for Sky, said, in 10 to 15 years' time, when pay-per-view is fully developed, we shall be paying for each individual programme. I am not sure that that is the way in which we should be developing. Is that really what we want?

At the moment, the scope of pay-per-view is limited by economics—how to make it pay—and technology, but, with the convergence of technology, it will spread. It is estimated that 10 million homes will have digital television in the next 10 to 15 years. As shown by the Select Committee report on the convergence of technologies and the Government's response to it, which I welcome, the debate will be more important in future.

Companies are now looking at ways of broadcasting visual images along old-fashioned copper wire—the old telephone links—so the ways of distributing visual images will change. It is not only television that will be affected. I have heard one person say that there will soon be pay-per-listen radio. All the hottest and latest releases—not that I can remember them—will be on pay-per-listen radio, and the rest of us will have to wait a few weeks or months to hear them.

There is great uncertainty about the way in which technology in general, including pay-per-view, will develop. I shall concentrate on football today, but what I say applies to other sports and other types of television too. The Office of Fair Trading is now investigating the deal between the Football Association and Sky Television, alleging that a cartel operates, and that each club should negotiate individually. I cannot understand how a cartel can be operating when 31 clubs have appeared in the Premier League over the past six years.

If we take that idea seriously, however, and the Office of Fair Trading gets its way and clubs start negotiating individually, a series of questions will arise. What happens if clubs negotiate with different broadcasters operating different systems, with one on pay-per-view, one on digital and another on terrestrial television? When will sport be televised, and will pay-per-view get the premier slots? If we take that to its logical conclusion—

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): Does my hon. Friend share my opinion that pay-per-view is just one aspect of the growing concern among football supporters about the commercial exploitation of their game? Does he agree that pay-per-view is one element of the increasing commercialisation of sport, and of football in particular, that the football task force must address?

Mr. White: I certainly agree that the football task force should address that question. It is interesting that, in Italy, where the four top clubs have renegotiated their contracts to obtain a higher percentage of the revenue, that has led to a widening of the gap between those clubs and others. I fear that, were that arrangement to be replicated in England, we would see the same phenomenon. Lower division clubs are already struggling, and that would exacerbate the situation.

I shall not dwell upon the proposed BSkyB takeover of Manchester United, but it raises many questions about pay-per-view. The Sky contract ends in 2001, and I suspect that much of the background to the Sky takeover is connected with the fact that it wants a place at the negotiating table then. It is conceivable that Sky would have been outside the negotiations on multimedia promotions and suggestions for a European super-league, but the purchase of Manchester United will give it a place at the table.

Pay-per-view for the top clubs in Europe would lead to a diminution of choice. As I have said, some Italian clubs have negotiated their contracts. Italy and a couple of other countries are further down the road than Britain in terms of digital and pay-per-view television. Before pay-per-view becomes fully established in this country, we should look at the effect that it has had in other countries.

In Italy, for example, supporters of a club can subscribe to pay-per-view and get all the away matches, but one cannot switch teams. Ordinary football supporters who are not avid fans of a particular club cannot mix and match; they are tied to one club. That limits choice.

I do not oppose pay-per-view television, but I want it to add to choice. As I have already said, the primary reason why pay-per-view has not yet taken off is economic—the problem of making it pay. If it is to make money—and there is no other reason why companies should introduce it—it has to take the market away from current broadcasters.

There are already 16 live football matches available, and if the Nationwide league suggests setting up a few extra pay-per-view matches later this year—that is, if pay-per-view is additional to what is already available—I do not oppose it. For my sins, I am a Tottenham supporter—somebody has to suffer. If I want to watch Tottenham, I can watch the team live on a Saturday afternoon, or if I am lucky and the live match is on Sky, I can watch it at home. If neither of those options was possible, and pay-per-view was available in addition, that would be a reasonable way to progress. It would make for additional choice.

However, if, on the contrary, pay-per-view replaced the live broadcasting, or, worse, if the time of the match were changed and moved from Saturday afternoon, when I can get there, to a prime slot at 4 o'clock on Sunday, say, when I cannot, that would lead to less choice.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey): I do not share all my hon. Friend's views on pay-per-view. However, I am not sure whether digital television will work commercially. We already have pay-per-view pop concerts on the internet, and it is not clear how regulation in the United Kingdom would affect regulation of the internet.

Secondly, I hold shares in Charlton Athletic on behalf of my son Jack, and I would happily pay for a season ticket to watch all the away games, because I cannot travel to see them. That would give me more choice. If there is a concern about cash, with digital television as with the American National Football League, for example, screens can be blacked within 60 miles of a game, so takings will not be affected. Has my hon. Friend considered that?

Mr. White: My hon. Friend has obviously read my speech, because I was about to make that point. He is right to say that, in the United States, NFL games are not allowed to be shown live unless the ground is full. There are also deals whereby merchandising and television rights are shared between clubs. Pay-per-view would therefore be an additional choice there.

If you wanted to watch Charlton, that would be reasonable as an additional choice. My fear is that the economics of pay-per-view would mean that, although you might get your way on that issue, the choice for everybody else would be diminished. That is the kind of regulation that I am looking for. You also mentioned—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, in using the second person, he is referring to me. If he is talking to his hon. Friend, he should use the third person.

Mr. White: Apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My hon. Friend mentioned the internet. One reason why I introduced the debate is that the converging technologies mean that the traditional way of broadcasting programmes is changing. I am not opposed to pay-per-view on the internet or television, but I want a level playing field so that pay-per-view can compete with the internet, terrestrial television and digital television.

Pay-per-view is not only about sport—it also relates to films, although it is probably too late to stop the rot for films. However, a number of social questions need to be raised. The proponents of pay-per-view have said that paying for films is just like going to the video shop. I am concerned that, if pay-per-view becomes the norm and video shops go out of business, people who do not have access to pay-per-view and cannot afford it will suffer. There are suggestions that, in those areas where pay-per-view is available—some cable companies have been running it for about six months—people are choosing five or six movies a month, and their habits are becoming quite regular. That may be true for some, but others might not be able to afford it. We must get the balance right.

There is also the question of what happens in clubs and pubs showing sport or films. If pay-per-view becomes the norm, the deals that pubs and clubs have at the moment might become much more difficult to sustain.

I have referred to the principal reasons why pay-per-view is not prevalent in sports broadcasting at the moment. However, there is one exception—boxing. I am not a boxing fan, but ITV used to have a good Saturday night fight programme. Now the only place one can see a decent boxing match is on pay-per-view. Sky subscribers who pay £30 or £40 a month for the full package will have to pay £10 extra to watch McCullough beat Naseem on Saturday night.

When I became involved in the debate, I was happy to say, "Let's ban all pay-per-view television, because it is absolutely disgraceful." However, I was quickly brought up by my researcher, who said, "Hang on, I like watching pay-per-view. I am quite prepared to pay extra for a film or sports match. I don't want the whole package—I want the additional choice." That emphasises the point I am trying to make. If it is a question of additionality, pay-per-view is reasonable.

If the economics of pay-per-view means that the existing broadcasters of sport and films lose—if all we are left with is a 10-minute highlights programme—there will be a problem, and the quality of broadcasting that we have become used to in this country will be diminished. It is easy to destroy what we have, but it is hard to rebuild it. If pay-per-view destroys some of our broadcasting quality, I would hesitate to say that we could get back to where we are now.

Before we go much further, we need to debate the appropriate level for pay-per-view, and its regulation. We must discuss the content versus the technology. If we do not regulate, we could end up in an anti-competitive position, and we would all lose. If we get it right—and if pay-per-view is competitive and adds choice—the new technologies will give their full benefit. However, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the Select Committee report, and to ensure that, when new technologies are discussed, the question of regulation is brought up.

1.13 pm

The Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting (Janet Anderson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) on securing a debate on pay-per-view television, and on setting out his views with such clarity. He speaks with some authority on the issue, as I understand that 40 per cent. of people in Milton Keynes are already on line—a figure far in advance of other areas.

My hon. Friends the Members for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) and for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) also contributed to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West rightly pointed out his concerns about the increasing commercialisation in sport, and the need for the football task force to look at that matter. I can assure him that I will pass on his comments to my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport, who will take them on board.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey spoke with great authority on the issue. He referred to regulation of the internet and how that might be achieved, and he mentioned the situation in the United States. He eloquently set out some of the important issues that we will face in the future.

This subject is of interest to many hon. Members, and many people outside. In discussing the matter, we should remember that pay-per-view is not only relevant to sport—other pay services, including films, could well be vital in television's digital future. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East referred to that. However, he is particularly concerned with sports broadcasting.

The Government's main concern in sports broadcasting is to ensure that everyone has access to those events which have a clear national resonance, and we have recently reviewed the protected list to achieve just that. Having said that, we do not believe that our responsibilities to viewers end there. Our public service broadcasters have a responsibility to provide programming for all tastes and interests, and sport should clearly be part of what they offer. We will continue to monitor the position as the television market develops.

The shape of that market is starting to become clear. Digital satellite broadcasting has already begun, and digital terrestrial will follow shortly. Viewers will have a wider choice of channels than ever before. Those services may well include specialist sports channels, and pay-per-view may be one way for broadcasters to fund these new services for the committed sports viewer.

Pay-per-view may also bring benefits to sport, with new services covering events which broadcasters would not be able to transmit on a general channel, because of the costs of coverage or the small size of the likely audience. I shall return to that point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East is concerned—he is not alone—about the possible consequences of BSkyB's takeover of Manchester United. He feels that this may lead to United's fans being asked to pay for access to coverage of the club's matches in the premier league after 2001. I can assure him that his concern on that point has been noted.

As the House is aware, the Director General of Fair Trading is presently considering his recommendation on the merger to the Secretary of State. He will announce his conclusions before 2 November. It is right that the Office of Fair Trading should be left to make an independent assessment of the issues involved, and the Government should not speculate on the outcome at this time.

My hon. Friend also noted that the restrictive practices court is considering the validity of the premier league's collective broadcasting arrangements early next year. He will understand that I cannot comment in detail on that for the same reasons. However, it is clear that the shape of the market for the rights to top league football may be very different come the spring. Given those uncertainties, we need to come to a balanced view on the subject of pay-per-view services for all sports—not just for football.

Pay-per-view sports services in this country are in their infancy, and have so far been confined to boxing matches. There has been much talk about pay-per-view in other sports, but it seems that the industry is still not sure about who will watch them, and how much they will be prepared to pay.

I believe that broadcasters and sporting bodies are right to be cautious. The issues involved in pay-per-view are complicated. It is not enough for a broadcaster to identify a potential audience for an event. Sport is an equal partner in any contract, and it must find a balance among a number of considerations—the need for wide exposure of flagship events, the impact of television coverage on attendances at grounds, to which my hon. Friend referred, and the requirements of sponsors and advertisers.

All sports wish to stay in the public eye, not least to encourage the interest and participation of young viewers. I speak with some authority on that—I have three teenage children who are fanatical Blackburn Rovers fans. Sponsoring companies often demand the exposure that only free-to-air television can bring. As a result, many sports organisations, including the International Olympic Committee and UEFA, have publicly committed themselves to free-to-air coverage.

For example, the governing body for the formula one championship has also indicated its preference for free-to-air coverage. That is despite surveys that suggest that a substantial number of viewers in the UK would be prepared to pay to watch grand prix races.

Sport must also guard against eating into its own audiences by rushing into pay-per-view. Football still takes the largest part of its income through the turnstile, and it must guard against alienating the fans who make the effort to attend matches.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, football must consider the lessons learned by overseas leagues. He mentioned Italy. When the Italian football league embraced pay-per-view, its attendances fell by more than the number of viewers watching the games on television. I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister for Sport would put that down to the decreasing appeal of the Italian league compared to those of other nations, such as our own premiership—much of Italy's national team now plays here, after all. British football must be careful, and the Government are sure that the point is not lost on those deciding future broadcasting contracts.

Broadcasters themselves acknowledge the complexities of pay-per-view. BSkyB decided against charging viewers to watch a specially arranged snooker tournament earlier this year. Although top snooker players have great appeal for viewers, BSkyB and other broadcasters realise that people want to watch meaningful and established championship events. In making arrangements for their flagship events, sports bodies usually want a balance between revenues and maximum exposure.

The tendency to self-regulation in the broadcasting market is reassuring, but we should recognise that there is a market for pay viewing of certain sports events, and that pay-per-view can bring benefits both to sport and to the armchair fan.

Mr. Wyatt: My hon. Friend may be interested in a number of other pay-per-view events—the Spice Girls were on BSkyB. However, I am more concerned with the launch of the digital channel, Film Four. If the Hollywood moguls decide to launch a film on pay-per-view ahead of its theatrical release, it will seriously affect the economics of television and of the multiplexes that are being built throughout the world. Given that Sony produce wide-screen computer screens and television sets, one can envisage which way it will go with its films. I would welcome my hon. Friend's comments on that.

Janet Anderson: My hon. Friend is right, and I am sure that he would agree that, throughout the world, we are embarking on a broadcasting revolution. We will have to wait and see how it develops. I am sure that his concern about the likely effect on theatrical productions is well founded. We shall have to guard against that, and I thank him for raising the issue.

Matches shown on pay terms will be additional to the 60 games a year shown by BSkyB. The league believes that coverage of those matches will reach a new audience of football fans committed to—dare I say it—less fashionable clubs. Those fans may be unable to travel around the country to follow their teams' away matches. Of course, there are fans who, for one reason or another, cannot get to matches at all. Many of those matches would not be shown on BSkyB's general subscription service—or anywhere else, come to that—because the potential audience is small. Pay-per-view may have the potential to bring a new choice of services to football supporters, and there is no reason why that should not apply equally to fans of other sports.

We have to consider the position of top sports events, especially in football, which will, at least initially, attract broadcasters and sports bodies wishing to experiment with pay-per-view. Listing offers a good level of protection for free-to-air access to the very top occasions in the sport, such as the world cup, the European championships and the English and Scottish FA cup finals, but there are many other important matches. In considering the case for pay-per-view, football must be sure that it is not alienating its core audience. The Government believe that sport can and should act responsibly in making its broadcasting arrangements.

Finally, it is important that we consider the possibilities for pay-per-view football in a proper perspective. Live coverage of club football in this country is a comparatively recent phenomenon, but the free-to-air television viewer now has access to a larger number of matches than ever before. Last week, the free-to-air viewer had access to live or full delayed coverage of five top European club matches, including Manchester United's match in Denmark, which was shown by the ITV network. Two of the matches were broadcast simultaneously, but, armed with a video recorder, the viewer could have watched more than 16 hours of top football. All four of the universally available channels—and Channel 5—contributed to that figure.

The Government believe that it is important that pay-per-view should not develop at the expense of the general viewer, although we are not opposed to pay-per-view in principle. However, we also believe that free-to-air channels will continue to offer first-class sport, whatever the future shape of the broadcasting industry.

I hope that that will reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East. I am grateful to him for giving me the opportunity to set out the Government's position, and I again congratulate him on securing this important debate.

Agriculture (Regulation)

1.25 pm

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): I am pleased to have secured this debate. I was born and brought up on a farm—my brother now runs the family farm—and farming is very much in my bones. I am lucky to represent a constituency with such an important agricultural industry.

Farmers and agriculture are in a dreadful state. The small family farm and the livestock and poultry industry are particularly vulnerable. Pigs are being destroyed, poultry farmers are losing money, the ban on beef on the bone remains and sheep are nearly worthless. Figures produced by the National Farmers Union show that, in the past two years, the price to the farmer of pig meat has fallen by about 57 per cent., of lamb by 40 per cent., of feed wheat by 31 per cent., and of milk by 22 per cent. Many farmers and processors face bankruptcy. The implications will be felt throughout the countryside. Rural unemployment will rise and mixed farming with extensive grass will be particularly vulnerable, with all the resultant environmental effects.

The Government do not seem to care about that. They seem to have washed their hands of the farming industry—perhaps there are simply not enough votes in farming. They are guilty of utter complacency. Farmers and processors deserve, and need, a level playing field and that is why I have chosen to focus on regulation. Over-regulation is playing straight into the hands of imports, undermining our exports and threatening the viability of much of our industry. We all know that some regulations are necessary, but they should be proportionate, sensibly and consistently applied and they should not discriminate against British producers. I shall take each of those four principles in turn.

On the first—that regulation should be proportionate—it is perhaps understandable in the aftermath of E. coli, salmonella and BSE that we should err on the side of caution, but the ban on beef on the bone is, as the Selkirk sheriff court put it, a "manifest absurdity", which is out of all proportion to the risk involved. It is a triumph of emotional over rational argument. Indeed, the on-going ban may damage the potential for exporting British beef—a classic case of the law of unintended consequences at work. A continuing ban sets just the wrong context for the proposed Food Standards Agency. Of course, consumer safety is paramount, but let us keep some sense of proportion. By all means disclose the facts to consumers, but let them, and not the nanny state, decide.

The second principle is that regulation should be applied sensibly. In the past 18 months, my dislike of the officious bureaucrat has increased daily. These days, it is almost as though officials were trying to catch out farmers and food processors. I shall give three examples. The first relates to the integrated control and administration system forms. I have heard from numerous farmers who have been massively penalised for making tiny and obviously innocent mistakes in filling in their IACS forms. Is there any discretion at MAFF? Apparently not. Is there any question of turning a blind eye? Again, apparently not. Simple mistakes happen and British farmers are penalised, but it is hard to imagine that happening in the olive groves of Spain, Italy or France.

The second example—I have written to the Minister about it—concerns a small, family-owned abattoir in my constituency. It operates for only 12 hours a week—on two separate days—dealing with small farms and supplying small butchers. It is a traditional business in a traditional Norfolk market town. I have been around the abattoir. The inspection regime since the implementation of the 1998 EU meat hygiene and inspection regulation means that, on occasions, there are four supervisors in charge of two slaughtermen. My constituent says:

"The supervisors fall over each other to find work to do which is not available, so more expense is incurred through constant tea making."

More seriously, such high and absurd levels of inspection will lead to the demise of small abattoirs and food processors, and will do nothing for public safety or animal welfare. The knock-on effect on small farms and retailers will play straight into the hands of large producers and supermarkets, for which regulation is a positive competitive benefit. British meat will be replaced by imports that are not subject to our high standards of welfare and hygiene, and British farmers and animals will be the losers.

I give one more example of a crazy application of an EC directive, about which I know my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) is also deeply concerned. In its wisdom, the EC introduced the fresh red meat directive, which provided for increased veterinary supervision in red meat abattoirs. What do the Government do? They voluntarily decide—I quote the words of chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service in a letter dated September 1998—that to the same standard. That is the kind of gratuitous nonsense that infuriates British producers and undermines their competitiveness. The extra cost of compliance is estimated at 3p per bird—often the difference between making a profit and making a loss—and the quality, variability and cost of the official veterinary surgeons service are deeply resented.

"supervision levels should also be increased in poultry slaughterhouses"

The third principle is that regulation should be consistently applied—there should be one standard for British farmers and processors, and that standard should be applied consistently to imports. I was struck by a report in the Financial Times of 26 October that claimed that EU vets had found Australian slaughterhouses and cold stores "generally weak". They witnessed "cruel treatment of animals" and they found that "vermin proofing was inadequate, maintenance and cleanliness was neglected", all of which had consequences for public health. Australia had been given a six-month ultimatum, which one might think fair enough until one realised that that was at the end of a six-year dispute.

In East Anglia, we have a big poultry industry. One of my constituents showed me a box of imported whole frozen turkeys from Italy. The birds had clearly been thrown—unwrapped except for some newspaper—into a cardboard box, which breaks all known hygiene regulations, specifically the one that states that birds should be "enclosed in a sealed protective covering".

Regulations are not properly enforced in much of Europe. Most of us have seen at first hand the way in which in European countries, cheese and meats are kept without refrigeration. I have seen cheese kneaded by sweaty, hairy-chested, bare-headed Italians—very good it was too—when such methods would be totally disallowed in this country. There is no consistency, and we are allowing our farmers and processors to be unfairly penalised.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Is not another example of the hon. Gentleman's point the fact that pig farming is much more stringently regulated in the UK than among our European competitors? The abolition in the UK of stalls and tethers, for example, amounts to an attack on pig farming here.

Mr. Prior: I fully agree with that point, with which I shall deal in a minute.

The fourth principle is that regulation should not be discriminatory against British products. In a press release issued earlier this year, the Minister called for higher welfare standards across Europe—I agree with that whole-heartedly, as I believe that welfare standards should be constantly improved. He said that there were no common EU rules on the treatment of animals on farms. For example, the Conservative Government banned pig stalls and tethers in this country, but in the rest of the EU the restrictions are fewer and will not be phased in until 2006. Why should we continue to import pigmeat that has been produced in conditions that we have rightly banned in this country? I could make the same point about the production of veal in veal crates, which were properly banned by the previous Government.

In this country, meat and bonemeal have been banned from the feed ration. Why should we import poultry and meat products from other animals that are fed with animal protein? We are even exporting bones to France to be rendered down into bonemeal, so that the French can feed it to poultry and export the product to us, giving them approximately a 3p per pound cost advantage. That is crazy, but the same applies to antibiotic residue testing, which should be applied to all imports.

Our farmers and processors need a level playing field. Imports should match our high standards and regulation should be consistently and sensibly applied rather than disproportionate to the risk involved. At the very least, imports should be properly labelled, so that consumers know what they are buying. The label should state where the meat is produced and not only where it is packaged, which can be misleading—often deliberately so.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): The hon. Gentleman mentioned risk analysis. How would he assess the risk analysis of some of those products, and in whose interests would he do it—those of the consumer, the European hairy-chested Italian, about whom he racistly talks, or his farming friends?

Mr. Prior: I dislike the hon. Gentleman's pejorative use of the words "his farming friends". Frankly, the farmers should be the friends of all hon. Members. There must be a balance and some common sense. Of course the consumer must be properly protected, but not disproportionately so. I accept that risk assessment is extremely difficult, but it cannot be left only to scientific experts—common-sense judgments must be applied.

There must be full disclosure, so that consumers can make up their own minds about what they are eating. Labels should clearly state the health, hygiene, feed and welfare standards to which the product conforms. Let the consumer then decide. However, in a written parliamentary answer, the Minister of State said that he had no intention of requiring imported meat to be labelled to show whether it had been fed on animal proteins. He went out of his way to say:

"There are no proposals to extend labelling requirements to cover compliance with national animal health and welfare standards."—[Official Report, 29 June 1998; Vol. 315, c. 106.]

That is disgraceful. Many consumers will be horrified to know that they are eating imported food products produced in welfare conditions that have rightly been banned for years in this country.

We all want the British farmer and food processor to produce safe, high-quality and tasty products, and of course regulation is necessary to achieve that and to give the consumer sensible protection. However, we are running the risk of regulating ourselves out of the market. If we are not careful, it will not be economically possible to produce poultry, pig, lamb and beef products in this country. Instead, we shall end up importing products from countries where welfare standards are much lower than ours and where quality and food safety are less reliable.

1.38 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior) on raising serious concerns about the impact of regulation on British agriculture. I agree that excessive and unnecessary regulation must be avoided, but it is difficult to avoid a certain amount of regulation, for all sorts of reasons.

As a Government, we recognise the difficulties facing many sections of agriculture, especially in relation to prices. I was disappointed that the hon. Gentleman, in what was generally a reasonable and well-argued speech, came out with the nonsense that the Government do not care about what is happening to agriculture. That is most certainly not true. Farmers and rural organisations know very well that we care and that we are giving all the support that we can, including the extra £78 million for the beef and sheep sector last winter and a range of other support.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the ban on beef on the bone. The risk of BSE getting into the food chain is not theoretical: so far, 30 people have died from new-variant CJD and others are suspected to be suffering from it. It would be ridiculous for any Government—let alone a Government who have made it clear that we intend to put consumer safety before all other considerations—to allow material that was known to carry a risk of infection to go into the food chain; to have done so, we would have had to put a warning on beef on the supermarket shelves saying that there was a risk to consumers, and we are not prepared to do that.

All beef that is on sale in this country—and that which, I am glad to say, is now being exported from Northern Ireland—is absolutely safe; we are absolutely confident about that. It is not good enough to say that we should take risks. It is difficult to give people choices when beef on the bone could be used in stocks and gravies and consumers in catering establishments would not know what was in their food. We have to ensure that consumers are protected. I am hopeful that the ban will be a temporary measure. We shall certainly review it again under the date-based scheme, following appropriate advice from our expert scientific committees.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): If that is the case, why are the bones that are removed from the meat not classified as specified material? Why, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior) said, can they be exported, turned into bonemeal and fed to animals the products of which can come back into this country? Either the bones are dangerous, or they are not.

Mr. Morley: It is not my understanding that that happens. There is a restriction on what can be used in meat and bonemeal. Bones from the pig industry, for example, are allowed to be exported if they are from dedicated plants.

I appreciate the point that the hon. Member for North Norfolk made about welfare standards. We have been pressing for improved welfare standards throughout the European Union, and we want to achieve common standards on, for example, battery cages.

We support better labelling, as we want consumers to have as much information as possible. Part of that has to be negotiated through the European Union, as we need common agreement, which can sometimes be difficult. Retailers have the freedom to label, and many already have detailed labelling linked to quality assurance schemes, and we very much welcome and support that, because it gives our producers, such as those in the pig industry, who have the highest welfare and quality standards in Europe, a marketing advantage, in that they can meet the quality assurance criteria that the retailers set.

I strongly disagree with the hon. Gentleman when he talks about turning a blind eye to regulations. I am sure that he did not mean that quite as it sounded. We cannot turn a blind eye to regulations, and especially not those that are designed to protect consumer safety or to ensure that taxpayers' money is used appropriately in the various support schemes. The schemes must be monitored, run and audited properly.

Whenever I hear it said that regulations are not enforced in Europe, I say let us see the evidence. Where there is evidence that other European Union member states are not enforcing the rules, we will take action.

Mr. Prior: Part of the evidence is the massive fraud that goes on in the common agricultural policy. Is that not some evidence that the rules are not being applied on the continent?

Mr. Morley: There is certainly fraud in the CAP; indeed, there have been irregularities in CAP payments in our own country, which have quite properly been pursued. The fact that the fraud is identified demonstrates the fact that the European system works. The European Court of Auditors is becoming increasingly successful in tracking down fraud, and quite rightly so.

I repeat that, where there is evidence of other countries not complying with regulations, we will not hesitate to raise the matter with the European Commission and, if necessary, take it to the European Court—we have made that clear time and time again—but the idea that only the UK enforces the rules does not stand up to critical examination. Indeed, the previous Government were in breach of European regulations by not applying the directive on slaughterhouses. The hon. Gentleman spoke about veterinary inspections, but the relevant directive was not applied by the previous Administration. We have been warned by the Commission that it will take action against us if we do not comply as other member states do.

European Union and domestic support measures put £3 billion a year into agriculture, leaving aside the special sums for BSE-related measures, which alone amounted to £800 million in 1997–98. Those are large sums, and we need regulations to ensure that the money goes to those who are eligible and that the benefits are properly verified.

We need regulations to safeguard public health. I accept that they have become more complicated with the changes in food preparation and production methods, and there has to be a balance between proper enforcement and targeting risk areas to avoid the exploitation of loopholes by the unscrupulous.

We are prepared to review the controls at regular intervals so that they can be modified to achieve what they are designed for. Specified risk materials regulations are a case in point. We have amended the regulations on removal of the spinal cord to allow the trade in unsplit carcases to be resumed. That has been warmly welcomed by the sheep industry. We can still meet the regulations, so the spinal column can be removed but the carcase can be sent directly to French cutting plants.

We want to protect consumers and producers by ensuring that there is public confidence. Without that confidence, markets will fall. We have witnessed that with BSE, which has been a catastrophe for the livestock industry, devastating the beef industry and having knock-on effects on the sheep sector. We have been struggling to get to grips with the BSE problem and bring it to an end, and we are confident that there is light at the end of the tunnel.

Last April, we needed to implement new specified risk material controls. That would have cost the industry £35 million, but, recognising the pressures on the livestock sector, the Government have absorbed those costs and not passed on that £35 million to the livestock industry.

The Government want to ensure that we sustain a good environment to maintain biodiversity. As agriculture covers some 75 per cent. of our land, it has a key role in that. In 1997–98, payments of £14.7 million were made under the countryside stewardship scheme alone, and we support agriculture in its efforts in 22 designated environmentally sensitive areas. However, sometimes, genuine mistakes are made in all sorts of forms, be it special premium or IACS forms. The Government understand that. However, the regulations are laid down. These are European Union payments through CAP. The regulations come from the EU and we have little room for manoeuvre in relation to them.

Many IACS forms are being sent in and the applicants are receiving in return many thousands of pounds in relation to arable area payments; in many cases, large payments are made. If farmers are not confident about avoiding mistakes, professional advisers and consultants will do that for them. Obviously, there is a charge, but, when dealing with thousands of pounds of money, that is something that some farmers could and, indeed, do consider.

Mr. Öpik: On that point, sometimes the payments are delayed through no fault of the farmer—in other words, it is the responsibility of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to try to bring those payments up a bit. In those circumstances, will the Minister consider investigating the possibility of interest payments on lost earnings as a result of the delay of the payment to the farmer?

Mr. Morley: I accept that there have been cases of slow payments. Particularly in present financial circumstances, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture Food has made it clear that we shall consider trying to speed up payments, so that money gets to farmers as quickly as possible. That is being done at present. All our regional service centres are aware of the Government's desire to ensure that the money gets into farmers' hands as quickly as possible and that we do not have undue delay, so I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are dealing with that point.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk mentioned his concerns about the abattoir sector. It is true that regulation has been changed to increase veterinary supervision of such premises. That does have an effect, particularly on small slaughterhouses; the Government understand that. We share many of those concerns, but I emphasise that the Government do not advocate regulation simply for the sake of it; simply because we want more of it. We support requirements on meat hygiene that can be justified on public health grounds.

The safety of food is one of the Government's priorities. We believe that meat should be produced to the highest standards in this country. I remind the hon. Member for North Norfolk that one of the reasons why BSE went on for as long as it did and at the level that it did, is that, even when controls were introduced by the previous Administration, in many cases, they were not being properly applied in slaughterhouses or meat plants. Those are important issues, and they have to be dealt with properly.

We did not lightly take the decision to increase veterinary supervision but, as I have mentioned, it was necessary to implement the previous Government's under-implementation of the harmonised EU meat hygiene rules. The European Commission has initiated legal proceedings against the UK for its failure to implement fully the specific veterinary supervision requirements that are laid down in the fresh meat directive.

That relates to poultry as well as to red meat. It is not a question of the Government saying, "Wouldn't it be a good idea if we applied that to poultry as well?" It is laid down by EU directive and we have to comply with that.

We have taken steps to raise supervision levels towards those required and believe that those steps are essential to improve control over meat-licensed premises, to avoid a European court case, as well as to support our efforts to have the beef export ban lifted for the whole of the UK. Hon. Members can appreciate that we are in the final stages of getting the ban lifted. We are very confident that we have made significant progress on that. It is our objective to get that ban lifted before the end of the year.

[Mr. Morley]

If we were not implementing EU directives on slaughterhouses, there is no possibility that we could get that ban lifted. We can go to the EU and make it clear to it that we are complying with all EU directives, as well as the tight regulations that we have to protect the consumer.

The regulations come from the EU. They set out in great detail what is required of member states and are tightly drawn. I accept that the regulations are sometimes complex, but controls are necessary to protect EU and Exchequer funds from fraud.

I have mentioned the fact that we do not have much discretion over how those rules are implemented. We are exploring the scope to cut bureaucracy whenever we can. An example is that we are consulting with the industry on a proposal for producers no longer to have to apply for a separate document to accompany beef special premium scheme claims. Under that proposal, producers will be able to apply for premium using existing cattle passport documents, which we have recently introduced.

As to the future reform of livestock schemes under Agenda 2000 proposals, one of our objectives in negotiation is to look, wherever possible, for simplification of current arrangements. That may be difficult to achieve. Indeed, as long as we have subsidies, we have to have some regulation to control them. That goes with the CAP and it goes with subsidies.

We have a range of priorities in negotiations, such as the need to ensure that Agenda 2000 addresses restructuring of the sector. Current Agenda 2000 proposals do not look promising in terms of simplifying regulations, but we shall continue to push for that wherever possible.

We want to look at cases where farmers feel aggrieved. We do that when farmers make appeals, through regional service centres, that they have been unfairly treated.

I have spoken about why we need to have regulation, but we recognise the impact that it can have. For that reason, we have sought to ensure that many of the recommendations on regulation are included in the Department's efficiency scrutiny study to reduce the burden of paperwork on farmers. Although, in many cases, it has been difficult—because of the overriding need to get consumers and EU confidence back into our beef production—we have made considerable progress in simplifying regulation. So far, about £5.4 million worth of farmers' time should have been saved through changes to procedures and an additional £1.1 million should be realised next year when new simplification comes through.

When introducing new schemes or revising existing ones, we consult the industry. We keep careful control on forms. We check that every question is essential and that the forms are clear. We trial them wherever possible and aim to keep the burden of time spent on filling them in proportion to the benefits to be gained.

We are increasingly using modern electronic technology to save farmers time. Many forms are now sent out to producers with basic information, such as names, addresses and holding numbers, pre-printed on the form. For the suckler cow scheme, we also pre-print figures on the number of animals notified for the preceding years' scheme. In that way, farmers need notify us only of changes, instead of going through the whole procedure. We have a system in place so that all forms that we use in the Ministry are reviewed for need and content at least once every three years, to ensure that there is still a role for them and that they are not just a waste of time for farmers.

A further consideration is that most regulations in the UK are an integral part of the CAP or the EU's single market. EU schemes have to take account of operating systems in all member countries to ensure as far as possible an even playing field and consistent enforcement. That can also affect the complexity of regulations.

We consult with those involved when we bring in regulations. We seek to adjust regulations after criticisms or suggestions. For example, we recently conducted a survey of the beef suckler cow premium scheme form. Much of it was found to be reasonable, but we are considering a few troublesome points to find out what changes we can make. We consulted on the SRM regulations, which allow exports of unsplit sheep carcases.

All the inspectorates and enforcement agencies that come under MAFF are reviewing their standards of practice to ensure the full spirit of the Government's enforcement concordat initiative. That concordat will, I hope, be adopted by local authorities and, to the extent that their activities impinge on agriculture, the benefits of better enforcement will also be felt there.

The regulation issue is important. An element of regulation is unavoidable to help to protect public health and safety, to ensure proper controls of animal and plant diseases and to safeguard taxpayers' money, as well as to boost the economic health of our industry through providing confidence to consumers and a fair framework. We do not introduce regulations lightly. We shall review them, but we believe that what we have at the moment is fair and balanced.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Irish Language Schools

1. Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): What plans she has to increase the number of Irish language schools. [54760]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Paul Murphy): Following the Government's commitment in the Belfast agreement, the Department of Education has a statutory duty to facilitate and encourage Irish-medium education and is drawing up proposals for the funding of a body to promote its development. In addition, arrangements are in place to enable Irish-medium pre-school provision to be grant aided within the pre-school education expansion programme for Northern Ireland. Around 1,250 pupils are currently enrolled in grant-aided Irish-medium schools in Northern Ireland.

Ms Moran: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer, and for the requirement in the education order to encourage and facilitate Irish-medium schools. Does he acknowledge that an impediment to achieving that objective remains in the school numbers criteria, which restrict several Irish-medium schools, such as the Meanscoil Dhoire in Derry, from receiving registration and funding? Will my hon. Friend undertake to reconsider the school numbers criteria so that the agreement's laudable objective of increasing the number of Irish-medium schools is achieved?

Mr. Murphy: I thank my hon. Friend for her comments. We recently reduced the viable entrance criterion from 100 to 80 for secondary schools. The school to which she referred does not, unfortunately, meet current viability thresholds, but we are considering setting up an Irish-medium unit at St. Brigid's secondary school. The school to which my hon. Friend referred is receiving £120,000 from the European Union, and there is a possibility of further capital funding.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): The Belfast agreement refers to the Council of Europe's charter for regional and minority languages. Can the Minister confirm that it states that the promotion of Irish should take place only where it is desired, and that Irish will not be generally promoted throughout Northern Ireland, where only 3 per cent. of people are fluent in it?

Mr. Murphy: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point. Irish-medium education depends on viability and on whether people want to be taught through the medium of Irish. As far as general use of the Irish language is concerned, the Government are committed to ensuring that there are no obstacles in the way of those who desire to learn it and use it.

Peace Process

2. Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Which parties in the Northern Ireland Assembly she has met to discuss the level of public support for the peace process; and if she will make a statement. [54762]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Marjorie Mowlam): My ministerial colleagues and I have met all the political parties represented in the Assembly several times, and I met most of the parties yesterday to discuss support for the Good Friday agreement and how we can maintain momentum.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. Will she join me in congratulating the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) on winning the Nobel peace prize? The prize confers great honour on the House, and every hon. Member should recognise that. Will my right hon. Friend tell us what hopes she has for the initiative taken by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to find a consensus among all the parties in Northern Ireland on progress towards the next stage of implementation of the Good Friday agreement?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend for that question and join him in congratulating the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) on their tremendous achievement. They both deserve it royally. The initiative mentioned was launched on Monday and I understand that it will commence tomorrow with discussions with all the parties in an attempt to resolve a number of outstanding issues under the Good Friday agreement. I wish them every success in that effort. It is important that they are dealing with the issues between the parties on the ground and discussing them themselves. I wish them luck.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): May I refer the Secretary of State to ceasefires by paramilitary organisations? I am sure that she wants to ensure that the Government operate even-handedly. In particular, I refer her to the ceasefire by the Loyalist Volunteer Force, which has held for several months and appears to be just as genuine as any other paramilitary ceasefire. What is the attitude of the Northern Ireland Office to that ceasefire? Has she received recently any fresh assessment from any element in the security forces with regard to it?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that question. I assure him that I want to act even-handedly with all groups associated with trying to find a ceasefire. He particularly referred to the LVF. I have said before that I will keep the situation under constant review, and I have. I have received a recent report from the security forces which I am reviewing. I have said that I will make a judgment in the following weeks on whether I think that the situation needs to be reviewed. It is a serious, difficult issue and I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I am not dragging my feet.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): We in the Northern Ireland community greatly rejoiced at the award of the Nobel peace prize to my party leader and the leader of the Ulster Unionist party. We have made our exaltation known to them personally already. The Secretary of State will share my disappointment that this phase of the Belfast agreement is not likely to be implemented by 31 October. Does she agree that the immediate cause of the impasse is the failure to agree on the departmental structures of the north of Ireland and on the implementing bodies north and south? While both communities desire at least token decommissioning of weapons by both republican and loyalist paramilitaries, that thorny and emotive problem was handed by the agreement to an international, independent decommissioning body.

Marjorie Mowlam: It is important to have deadlines to focus people. I hope that we continue to work to 31 October even though it is close and it may be difficult to get there. That does not mean that we should not try. Several issues are creating difficulties: decommissioning and the Executive body. Then there is the progress that I hope that the parties will make with the work done by the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the parties tomorrow. It is important that progress is made in parallel on all aspects of the agreement so that confidence can be built and we can get more momentum back in the process.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): What would the Secretary of State regard as satisfactory and significant progress by the 31 October deadline, given that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister have been working hard over the summer, especially in the past few weeks, to make the progress that we need for a lasting settlement?

Marjorie Mowlam: It is difficult for me to set an absolute baseline. Obviously, we want as much progress as possible, but what is happening more and more—and this is what is important—is that it is the parties, their leaders, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister who are trying to take the process forward. Of course, the Government will do all that we can in terms of pace, help and encouragement—as, I am sure, will the Irish Government—to help make progress.

Deadlines are important. We have missed them before. We missed the one for the Good Friday agreement by a number of days, but everybody managed to live with that and make progress afterwards. We are still working at it.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Bracknell): Will the Secretary of State accept that all reasonable people would expect there to be no further early releases of terrorist prisoners until there is substantial and verifiable decommissioning of all illegally held weapons and explosives?

Marjorie Mowlam: I appreciate the support of the right hon. Gentleman and his party for the Good Friday agreement. I look forward to that support extending to its contents. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, neither he nor I—no one—can renegotiate the Good Friday agreement. It is there and it says that there must be progress in parallel on all the different dimensions. It also says that if progress is not being made on different dimensions, it can be reviewed. I have not forgotten that. This is not about grabbing headlines. This is about the work taking place on the ground by the parties trying to make progress. We should give them the support, encouragement and space necessary to do that.

Mr. MacKay: Will the Secretary of State accept that, from the Dispatch Box, her Prime Minister made it clear that decommissioning was part of the agreement and part of the renunciation of violence? We have now had over six months and not one single gun or one ounce of Semtex has been handed in. Over the same time, over 150 hardened terrorist prisoners have been released early. That is not parallel.

Marjorie Mowlam: I have made clear to the right hon. Gentleman on other occasions the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I shall repeat them. He said that decommissioning is crucial, that it is a central part of the agreement and that we want all dimensions to move in parallel. If there is no progress, we will review it. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that the previous Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), gave a commitment that we would support the parties, the people and the Parliament when they made a decision. That is what we intend to do.

Mental Health Provision

3. Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): What plans she has to improve mental health provision. [54763]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Marjorie Mowlam): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will know that the plans for the development of mental health services are set out in the document, "Regional Strategy for Health and Social Well-Being 1997–2002". That document sets out quality targets and time scales so that we can be sure that we do all we can to meet the needs of the most vulnerable in society.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome that response, but will the right hon. Lady accept that, while there are those of us who have been supporting care in the community, there is also deepening concern that there may not be enough secure units for people who need special help? Will she also accept that the changes suggested for Muckamore Abbey hospital—taking the power of decision from parents and guardians—are causing great concern in relation to children and young people, who are particularly vulnerable?

Marjorie Mowlam: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, there are six traditional hospitals with secure units for people with mental health difficulties and there are wards within the major hospitals. The plan that is being put together will look at the question raised by the hon. Gentleman—need in relation to community. The hon. Gentleman will know from his constituency that beds have been moved from one institution that helps people with mental health difficulties to another. It is those specifics that are being considered by the regional strategy to ensure that the aims stated by the hon. Gentleman are those achieved. There is a section addressed particularly to young people because, as the hon. Gentleman and I agree, that is a crucial part of the future development of mental health care in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the House will welcome her robust defence of the entirety of the Belfast agreement? Will she ensure that that applies also to the proposed powers—

Madam Speaker: Order. This question is about mental health. Perhaps I will look to the hon. Gentleman on a more appropriate question.

Educational Standards

4. Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): What steps her Department has taken to ensure high educational standards in Northern Ireland. [54764]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Paul Murphy): Educational standards have improved substantially in recent years, but they could be higher still. The school improvement programme and a number of other initiatives, including a reduction in class sizes for the youngest pupils and the expansion of pre-school education, have been introduced to ensure that standards continue to improve.

Mr. Hope: Does my hon. Friend agree that educational standards and, probably as important, wider community development would be greatly enhanced if we could promote integrated education much more widely in Northern Ireland? Can he assure me that every effort is being made by the Government to promote the transformation of schools into integrated schools so that many more of our children in Northern Ireland can grow up in an atmosphere and culture of co-operation and learning across the religious divide?

Mr. Murphy: I agree with my hon. Friend. Integrated education provides an opportunity for young people in Northern Ireland to be educated in a unique way. I am glad to tell the House that there are now 40 such integrated schools in Northern Ireland. We have also set up a co-ordinating group to improve the further development of those schools and we intend to spend a further £30 million in the next three years on integrated education in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Minister agree that the provision of a pre-school place for every child whose parents seek one will eventually increase the achievement of children at primary and post-primary level? Does he further agree that greater collaboration between grammar schools, secondary schools and colleges on local education provision could enhance standards? Does he agree that there is now a unique opportunity under the Labour Government for secondary schools to embark on providing lifelong learning for the whole of the communities that are served by them, thereby raising standards for every individual?

Mr. Murphy: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Much of what he has said is the policy of my party. Across the board—from pre-school to further education—the Government are committed to the points that the hon. Gentleman has made. We are ensuring that there are 2,200 extra pre-school places from September. That is the largest increase ever. We have spent £50 million extra in Northern Ireland on education. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's questions. I agree with every point that he has made.

Economy

5. Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, South): What progress has been made towards strengthening the economy in Northern Ireland. [54765]

8. Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): What progress has been made in promoting a strong and sustainable economy in Northern Ireland. [54768]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Northern Ireland economy is performing very well. Unemployment continues to fall and is at its lowest level since 1980. Manufacturing output is outpacing the United Kingdom average. The Chancellor's economic package announced in May offers major benefits, and the current north American investment tour has attracted significant interest. These measures will greatly assist us to exploit the economic opportunities presented by lasting peace and stability.

Mr. Pearson: I spent time working in Northern Ireland in the late 1980s encouraging enterprise. The business climate is now transformed and the economic prospects are far better. I welcome the north American investment tour. What indications are there of its success? What other measures are planned to ensure that more Northern Ireland companies do more business in our European home market?

Mr. Ingram: It is too early to say what the outcome of the 11-city tour, or north American investment tour, will be. We have attracted more than 1,000 business interests from the cities that we have visited. We have had a high-quality input from the business community in north America and we have had a high level of endorsement from existing United States investors in Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to everyone who participated in that north American tour, including the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), and the hon. Members for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) and for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson).

Clearly, the whole of Europe is an important marketplace for the Northern Ireland economy. It is for that reason that we are targeting that market as well, through a number of initiatives. I can advise the House that all the Assembly Members have been invited on, and most of them will participate in, a visit to the European Union next week so that they can get up to speed on this important issue.

Mr. White: I left Northern Ireland at the age of 18 because of the lack of job prospects. Does the Minister agree that structural unemployment is one of the key issues facing Northern Ireland, and will he outline the success of the new deal in Northern Ireland, with particular reference to the environmental task force and community and voluntary groups?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend has touched on an important range of matters. He is right about structural unemployment, which is an endemic and deep problem within Northern Ireland's economy. One of the initiatives we have taken is a £40-million package announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor earlier this year, which is to be targeted on long-term unemployment among those aged 25 and over. That will provide schemes covering up to 30,000 unemployed people and will go a long way toward redressing much of the structural unemployment-causing imbalance inherent in the Northern Ireland economy. The scheme represents one third of the total UK schemes for the 25-plus group. It sits alongside other initiatives covering 18 to 24-year-olds and the new measures the Government are taking through the targeting social need initiatives.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Does the Minister agree that strengthening the economy requires long-term planning? Will he tell the House what long-term plans were made in respect of prison officers who, inevitably, would be made redundant as a result of political progress in Northern Ireland? Will he tell us how many prison officers are likely to be made redundant over the next two years; and what efforts have been made to put in place fast-track retraining facilities to deal with those officers who are likely to be thrown on the scrap heap of the unemployed?

Mr. Ingram: My feeling is that many of the prison officers who enter the employment market will not be thrown on the scrap heap of the unemployed, if we can increase the level of job opportunities in Northern Ireland. To achieve that, we need to have peace and stability. The number of prison officers who are likely to be made redundant is rather indeterminate, depending as it does on the pace of prisoner releases and changes in the approach taken toward the whole prison regime in Northern Ireland. A review is currently taking place of the long-term needs of the prison regime as it serves Northern Ireland's interests. In addition, through the Prison Service, we have entered into negotiations with prison officers to look at some of the issues—indeed, all of them and more—the hon. Gentleman raises.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire): Given that the agri-food industry is the largest industry in Northern Ireland and that farming faces its biggest crisis this century, with farm incomes down 50 per cent. in two years and agricultural bank debt increasing to £500 million, when are the Government going to act to prevent a major collapse in the rural economy; or is that yet another price worth paying in the fight against inflation?

Mr. Ingram: To hear any Conservative Member bleating on behalf of farmers is a bit rich, given what the Conservatives did to the farming community during the many years they were in power. The Government have set out to deal with the problem of BSE that we inherited; to return confidence to the meat and livestock markets; to take new initiatives to give support to the farming community; and to ensure that a local purchasing approach is taken within Northern Ireland's economy. That last measure is important, because farming is an important part of the overall economy in Northern Ireland. We have grasped the issue firmly and we are making progress. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. We can barely hear what is being said.

Women's Involvement in Politics

6. Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): What steps she is taking to encourage more women to become involved in elected politics. [54766]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Marjorie Mowlam): In dealing with that question, we should be careful not to make the mistake of thinking that, because no women from Northern Ireland have been elected to the European Parliament or to the House, women in Northern Ireland are not politically active. Over the years, women in Northern Ireland have done a lot to build the peace process, and to build trust from the bottom up. Of the 108 Assembly Members, 14 are women. Ultimately, it will be for the parties to decide whether women manage to come through and win election.

We have done everything that we can on the issue. Northern Ireland hosted the conference of women European Union Ministers. Earlier this year, we also held the women's national commission regional conference. A couple of months ago, Hillary Clinton and I hosted a conference, "Vital Voices", to encourage more women to seek office.

Maria Eagle: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, and warmly welcome the progress that is clearly being made in Northern Ireland to ensure that more women participate in elected office. Does she agree that further progress towards gender equality in elected office could only assist the peace process, and that such equality will be a clear and visible indication that all sections of both communities are participating and being represented in the on-going peace process?

Marjorie Mowlam: I agree with my hon. Friend, and assure her that what we can do in monitoring, targeting and encouraging movement in the public sector, particularly the civil service, is being done. It is the political parties themselves that will be involved in making progress, and I am sure that they have heard her message.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Although I welcome any action to encourage more women to stand for elected office in Northern Ireland, may I ask the Secretary of State whether she will resist the temptation to revert to a former socialist policy of single-sex lists for nomination—bearing in mind that most women wish to be elected not only because of their ability, but because of what they stand for and can offer to the electorate?

Marjorie Mowlam: I am sure that the hon. Lady heard me say that the matter is for the individual political parties, whether they are in Britain or in Northern Ireland.

Equal Opportunities

7. Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): What measures her Department has taken to promote equality of opportunity in Northern Ireland. [54767]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Paul Murphy): Parliament is currently considering the Northern Ireland Bill, which provides for a new equality commission and for a new statutory obligation on public authorities to perform their functions with due regard for equal opportunities.

Mr. Pond: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. I also welcome the establishment of the equality commission—as, I am sure, will the recently established Northern Ireland Low Pay Unit, which, I am sure, will receive the House's support. Does my hon. Friend accept that, in addition to those developments, the new deal—about which we have heard much today—and the national minimum wage will have a major impact in Northern Ireland by reducing the disproportionate impact of low pay and the gender pay gap between men and women in Northern Ireland? Will he tell the House when the national minimum wage will be introduced in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Murphy: I assure my hon. Friend that the national minimum wage will be the same across the United Kingdom and that the Northern Ireland Assembly will have no power to vary it. I can tell him also that discussions are continuing on other aspects of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 for which the Northern Ireland Departments are currently responsible.

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): Will the Minister confirm that, in Northern Ireland, there must be equality of opportunity between democrats and the representatives of gunmen, and that there can be no progress in the peace process by placing the representatives of armed terror in government while terrorists remain fully armed with explosives and guns?

Mr. Murphy: It is very important that, as my right hon. Friend said, we implement all aspects of the Good Friday agreement, which was a package in favour of which the people of Northern Ireland voted by a very large majority. Events in the next few days in Belfast—with talks between the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and all the party political leaders, including the hon. and learned Gentleman—will go a long way towards ensuring that those problems are resolved.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister said that the agreement had to be implemented in full. Will my hon. Friend therefore give an undertaking to the House that all the direct powers given to the equality commission and to the human rights commission and outlined in the agreement will be put in place, specifically with regard to victimless crimes?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is aware, because we met earlier today to discuss these matters, that I and my right hon. Friend have had many meetings to consult on various aspects of the Bill—probably an unprecedented amount of consultation. I assure him that the agreement will be implemented in the Northern Ireland Bill.

Drumcree

9. Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): What is the estimated cost of the security forces' deployment at Drumcree in 1998. [54769]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): The additional cost of the Royal Ulster Constabulary operations at Drumcree, including the consequential impact elsewhere, during July 1998 amounted to approximately £11 million. Since July, additional costs have continued to be incurred by police at approximately £400,000 per month, due to the continuing protest.

Mr. Thompson: I thank the Minister for that reply. Does he agree that had the Parades Commission taken the right decision and allowed the parade down the Garvaghy road, the expenditure would have been much less. Does he further agree that had the proper decision been taken, the subsequent deaths and injuries might not have occurred? Finally, will he acknowledge that, as a result of the bad decision, community relations are at an all-time low in the Portadown district?

Mr. Ingram: It is worth while reflecting momentarily on the fact that one Royal Ulster Constabulary officer has lost his life as a result, and many others have been driven from their homes because of thuggery and brutal actions against them and their families. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not refer to that.

There can be no question but that there is a need to uphold the rule of law at all times. That is something that this Government and previous Governments have done throughout the long history of Northern Ireland. The cost of that is one that the British taxpayer is prepared to pay because upholding the law is fundamental to all of us. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the decision was wrong. It was a properly arrived at decision. Of course, we are now seeking to move it forward by bringing the two sides of the community together. The Government are very active in achieving some reconciliation within that community with the help of people from that community.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [54790] Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 28 October.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Flight: I am sure that the Prime Minister will agree that a common European Union withholding tax would be disastrous for employment and for the earnings of the City of London. Will he agree to use our veto if necessary to stop that happening?

The Prime Minister: We will certainly use our veto to stop any measure that will harm the City of London.

I have to say that not all measures that we agree with our European partners would do that, but if any measure did do that, we would certainly not hesitate to use our veto.

Q2. [54791] Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): My right hon. Friend will be aware that in the House last night the Conservative Opposition attempted to prevent British workers from being protected by basic minimum standards for hours of work, rest breaks and paid holidays. Will he assure me that the Government will continue to promote fairness in the workplace, thus ensuring that the Conservative party, which opposes the minimum wage and minimum standards, will remain a very minimum party?

The Prime Minister: We will certainly introduce the minimum wage. We believe that the Opposition's calls for the minimum wage to be cancelled next year are wrong and do nothing for people on very low incomes, for their families or for the economy. We believe that basic, fair, decent standards in the workplace are fully compatible with an effective and dynamic economy.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): The Prime Minister committed himself at the election to a referendum on the voting system in this Parliament. Is he still committed to it?

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear that we will state our position when the Jenkins commission reports tomorrow.

Mr. Hague: What is wrong with answering a question in this House yes or no? Does not the Prime Minister's answer reveal that he has got himself into something that he does not know how to get out of? He now has the Foreign Secretary, wherever he is, passionately in favour of proportional representation, the Leader of the House passionately against it, and himself passionately concerned to avoid answering the question, not knowing whether to betray the Liberal party or the Labour party. He has got himself into an indecisive position, like the late—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister has become as indecisive as the late Lord Wilson, who also had a faithful dog called Paddy, although not on this particular subject. On 11 February 1997, he said in the Financial Times:

"We have made it clear all the way through that we are committed to a referendum and we are committed to it as part of our programme for the next Parliament".

Does that apply—yes or no?

The Prime Minister: As indeed I said a few days ago, we have always envisaged holding a referendum this Parliament, but we have also said that we shall wait for the Jenkins commission, to see what precise system of voting change it proposes. I should have thought that it was sensible to wait for the Jenkins commission to report before stating a view on it.

Mr. Hague: How is it that a commitment in the Labour party manifesto depends on the writings of the former leader of the Social Democratic party; and that the Prime Minister now envisages keeping a promise, but will wait to see whether he is going to do so? [Interruption.] Even he is laughing at the silliness of his own answers.

Is it not time the right hon. Gentleman stopped blundering into constitutional upheavals without knowing what they will lead to, and are there not higher priorities for the Government, with jobs being lost every day and with hospitals facing a crisis this winter? These are the real people's priorities. Should he not be dealing with them instead of trying to gerrymander a system that has served our country well?

The Prime Minister: First, we have made it clear that it is sensible to wait for the Jenkins commission to report, because obviously, the system that Lord Jenkins proposes will be relevant in determining the position of the Government and the referendum.

As for the people's priorities, since the Government came to power we have reduced the unemployment that we inherited from the Conservatives. There are now 400,000 extra jobs, and 100,000 children are being taught in classes whose size has been reduced since the Conservatives were in government. Under the present Government, after years of lengthening waiting lists, waiting lists are shortening. Under the Labour Government, thanks to the new deal, 140,000 young people are off the dole. That shows this Government addressing the mess inherited from the Conservative Government.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the women in Stourbridge on taking a stand against domestic violence and joining the NSPCC and the police locally tomorrow, at a meeting, to bring attention to the appalling reality of violence in the home? One in 10 women suffered violence in the home last year, and one in four have done so at some time in their lives. Is my right hon. Friend aware that—even worse—in 70 per cent. of cases where the woman was abused, the child was also abused; and that, in 90 per cent. of cases where the woman was abused, the child was in the room or next door? This cannot go on.

The Prime Minister: Yes, domestic violence has been a problem that has probably been going on for a long period, but we are more aware of it today than ever before. I am pleased to say that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the police are taking it far more seriously now, and will produce, over the next few months, a plan to try to reduce domestic violence and help its victims.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that loss of life on a substantial scale, starting with children and the elderly, is now only weeks away in Kosovo? [HON. MEMBERS: "Not again."] I am amazed to hear that from the Conservative Benches. Of course it is right that President Milosevic should have responded to the credible threat of the use of force, and that NATO should now preserve that on a hair-trigger. Should not our urgent attention now turn to the pitiful plight of the refugees who are suffering as a result of President Milosevic's brutality? Is not the scale and urgency of the international effort nowhere near what is necessary to preserve them and prevent a catastrophe yet to come?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is still an awful lot more to do. We have provided £1 million to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for co-ordination and shelter for the people who have been displaced. We have also given extra money to a range of non-governmental organisations. In addition, we are sending our own assessment team to ensure that supplies get to the people who need them.

A few weeks ago there were 50,000 people living outside. That has now been reduced to 10,000, so we are making progress; but I agree that we have to keep the activation order in being so that we can take action at any time if it looks as though Milosevic is not going to comply with the agreement into which he has entered. If he does not comply, we shall remain of the view that we must act, if necessary by military force.

Mr. Ashdown: The fact that the people are coming out of the forest does not mean that their lives will be saved. They are moving to appalling disease, overcrowding and, in many cases, homes that have no roofs and food that has been wasted and exhausted in the past few months. Britain has taken the lead in pressing for stronger action in Kosovo.

Will the Prime Minister now give us an undertaking that Britain will take the lead in pressing for the resources and urgency necessary to resolve the humanitarian problem? In particular, as we have used NATO aircraft to such good effect to persuade President Milosevic to comply, could we not use NATO aircraft to ship in the resources and materials necessary to ensure that those who have suffered from his brutality are able to survive the coming winter?

The Prime Minister: I certainly can give an undertaking that we shall do whatever we can. I am advised at the moment that we do not think that the delivery of humanitarian assistance would be helped by the use of NATO planes, but I understand that additional measures are being taken to try to ensure that daily relief convoys reach the parts of the country that they are currently not reaching. We shall keep the situation closely monitored.

The 40,000 who have come in from the outside have not just been left. They are being provided with the medical and food assistance that they need, but there is an awful lot more to do. I understand that, and we shall keep up the pressure all the way. It is a pity that we did not show the same international will that we are showing now six months ago, when this could have been dealt with far more easily and when we could have managed to get together exactly the right type of international co-operation that we needed. This country was taking a lead throughout that time.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Has my right hon. Friend seen the disturbing report in today's issue of The Journal of Newcastle, using figures compiled by the Northern Development Company, that we are losing five manufacturing jobs in the northern region for every one being created? I therefore welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend has forced the issue of jobs and growth to the top of the European agenda, but I urge him to go further and please his friends in the north by working with the French and the Germans to forge a consensus around new Keynesian economic and financial policies.

The Prime Minister: We should do what is sensible for the long-term strength of the economy. There are three essential elements to the economic policy that we have outlined, which I believe to be in the interests of the north as well as of the rest of the country. The first is an end to the disastrous boom and bust of the Conservatives. Interest rates at 15 per cent. for a year or more and manufacturing output falling by 7 per cent.—that is the Conservative record. The first thing is to end that boom and bust by the new fiscal and monetary rules.

The second thing is the new investment that we need, particularly in education, skills and technology—the Conservatives are opposed to it—because that investment raises productivity. The third thing, which has been of particular value in the north-east, is the new deal, which tackles social exclusion. All those measures are opposed by the Conservatives; all of them are in the interests of the north-east economy. We shall have difficult times, but we shall be in a better position to weather those difficult times if we take the right decisions for the long-term strength of the economy.

Q3. [54792] Sir David Madel (South-West Bedfordshire): Will the Prime Minister confirm that nobody still requiring medical treatment has been taken off national health service waiting lists?

The Prime Minister: People who are on national health service waiting lists and require medical treatment are dealt with in the normal way. I am not aware of any change at all to that practice.

Q4. [54793] Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to tell my constituents who live around Wembley stadium about his discussions with the president of FIFA earlier this week? Will he assure us that Mr. Blatter did not leave these shores without being fully aware that England, in its bid to stage the world cup, has some of finest club grounds anywhere in Europe, and that Wembley stadium will be the finest new national stadium anywhere in the world?

Will the Prime Minister confirm that our Government will do everything in their power to ensure that not only the national stadium but all the transport infrastructure necessary for people to get there safely and securely are ready on time, in order that nothing stops football coming home in 2006?

The Prime Minister: Yes. There is a £300 million redevelopment project at Wembley. Wembley will be the finest stadium anywhere in the world. Mr. Blatter made it clear that, although he obviously recognised the strong case for an African country hosting the 2006 world cup, given the right facilities and infrastructure to do so, he also recognised England's very powerful case—with the finest stadiums in the world, massive new investment going into those stadiums and, as he pointed out, England of course being the motherland of football.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Since last week's Question Time, Ernst and Young has predicted that 500,000 manufacturing jobs will be lost in the next two years and the CBI has said that business optimism is at its lowest for 18 years. Does the Prime Minister still think, "Crisis, what crisis?"

The Prime Minister: I still think, as I said last week, that what is important is to get the issue in balance. Third quarter growth figures just reported show an annual rate of growth of 2.5 per cent. Since this Government came to power, 400,000 net new jobs have been created.

I agree that there will be a slowdown. I agree, too, that we are inevitably affected by what is happening around the world. I should point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the International Monetary Fund and the European Union have all downgraded their growth forecasts for next year. We will be affected by that. The best way of getting through that difficulty is to hold firm to strong fiscal and monetary rules and the additional investment in education and our public services—not to cancel Bank of England independence or that investment, which is his policy; that would simply lead us back to boom and bust.

Mr. Hague: Well, I am glad that the Prime Minister has begun to realise that there is a problem. Business optimism may be at an all-time low, but Government complacency has so far hit an all-time high. A job is being lost every 10 minutes, and the Prime Minister has been inventing a new excuse every two minutes. The CBI has called for a cut in interest rates. We have called for a cut in interest rates. Even the Chief Secretary has been calling for a cut in interest rates. Will the Prime Minister instruct the Chancellor to announce when he comes to the House next week a change in policy sufficient for the Bank of England to cut interest rates by a full 1 per cent.?

The Prime Minister: I assume that we just heard the right hon. Gentleman's policy announcement that he wants us to scrap Bank of England independence. Half the Conservative Members are nodding their heads and the other half shaking them. As I told the right hon. Gentleman last week, and as I repeat today, all international institutions have downgraded their growth forecasts. However, as I also told him last week, a net 400,000 additional jobs have been created. His alternative, cancelling investment in schools and hospitals next year and cancelling Bank of England independence, would be a disaster for the British economy. When his policies were last implemented, interest rates were at 15 per cent. for a year or more and our schools and hospitals did not have the investment that they needed. That may be the right hon. Gentleman's policy to weather these difficulties; it is not ours.

Mr. Hague: Businesses in this country need a change of policy from the Government, not a history lesson from the Prime Minister. I can tell the Prime Minister that there is a serious problem out there, the economy is heading in the wrong direction, and the Government now have limited time to do something about it. Will he now put in place the conditions for lower interest rates, and does he realise that unless he does so he will have been fiddling with the voting system while jobs burn?

The Prime Minister: First, may I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that interest rates are coming down? Secondly, with the coming slowdown and the world economic situation that I have described to him, our choice is to adopt either the policies that we have adopted or the policies that he advocates. The question therefore is: is scrapping Bank of England independence the right thing for the economy? We say no. We do not have a policy from the Conservatives—or rather, we hear two inconsistent policies at the same time from them.

We believe that in the circumstances that I have described, it is sensible to put extra investment into our schools, our transport, law and order and the health service. What is the right hon. Gentleman's policy? As far as we can find out from his shadow Chancellor, it is to cancel that spending. That is wrong. The third part of our policy is to keep in place the new deal, which is giving young and long-term unemployed people the chance to get into work. The right hon. Gentleman's policy is to cancel that.

Those are the choices. Are those policies—Bank of England independence, strong fiscal and monetary rules, extra investment in our schools and hospitals, and the new deal for the unemployed—the right ones? We say that they are—and we still have not had an answer out of the right hon. Gentleman as to what he proposes.

Q5. [54795] Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government remain fully committed to the introduction of the working families tax credit, and that such a policy, alongside the national minimum wage, is crucial to the low-paid in constituencies such as mine? Does my right hon. Friend not find it incredible that at Question Time on Monday last week, the shadow Secretary of State for Social Security advocated cutting that tax credit before we have even introduced it?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has, of course, rightly corrected me. I said that the Opposition had not said what their policies were, but they have made one very specific policy commitment. They have said that their answer to the economic crisis—the Leader of the Opposition looks puzzled; he should check on what his shadow Ministers are saying. The Opposition have now said that they would cancel the working families tax credit.

The vast bulk of that would be family credit for 800,000 families. Working families tax credit will mean that from next October, low-income families, if there is anybody working in the family, will have a minimum income of £180 per week, and they will be able to have an income of £220 per week before paying tax. For some of the poorest income-earning families that will be a £23 a week incentive to get into work. The Conservatives are saying that we should cancel that.

What possible response is it to any economic difficulties to say that the price has to be paid by low-income families who need help to get back into work? Since the right hon. Gentleman has not used up his quota of questions, he should get up and tell us whether he stands by his shadow Minister, or whether he disagrees with him.

Q6. [54796] Sir Raymond Whitney (Wycombe): Is the Prime Minister aware that when General Pinochet handed over to the democratic government of President Aylwin, the Chilean people decided to draw a line under their turbulent past? Does he understand that the crass way in which the British Government have handled Mr. Pinochet's latest visit to this country is threatening democratic stability in Chile and damaging British interests?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman's question is based on a misunderstanding of what has happened. The judicial process has not involved the Government issuing warrants for arrest. That is done by the Spanish authorities through Interpol to the British magistrates, who take it from there. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman's question is misjudged and wrong.

Q7. [54797] Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, at the end of this month, the BBC—through its agent, Television Licensing—will withdraw from hundreds of pensioners in Dundee their entitlement to concessionary television licences because, it says, they no longer qualify following changes to the local council's house letting policy? Does he agree that the question of who is to blame for this matters not at all when set against the disgraceful reality that frail and elderly pensioners—who have done nothing wrong—are now facing a surcharge of £96 which they cannot afford and which they should not be asked to pay?

Will my right hon. Friend use his influence with the BBC to ensure that all existing concessions are preserved; more importantly, will he instruct my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to initiate an immediate review of the dog's breakfast of concessionary television licences so that some sanity and justice for the pensioners can at last be brought to bear on another mess that we inherited from the Tories?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend has particular concerns about the way in which the scheme is operating for some of his constituents in Dundee. All Members of Parliament know that the way the concessionary scheme operates is an aching and continual grievance that pensioners feel. It is for that reason that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has recently announced that the scheme—including the concessionary television licence—will be reviewed next year by an independent review panel. That will report by the end of July 1999, when we will consult on the proposals and on how the scheme can be improved.

We need to be aware that in proposing changes to the concessionary licence scheme, people will never want to lose money through it; and that if everyone gained the same amount, it could be very expensive. That is why the system needs to be looked at as a whole, and that is what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced.

Q8. [54798] Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford): What contacts has the Prime Minister had with Lord Jenkins to discuss the recommendations of his commission for fiddling the voting system?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept in any way what the hon. Gentleman says. I have discussions with Lord Jenkins, as I have with lots of people. However, most people think that it is entirely sensible to proceed as we are so that we can get a proper report on an alternative to the present system, which people can then discuss. If the Conservatives do not want to be a part of the debate, that is up to them. They opted out of the constitutional debate on Scotland and Wales, but were then forced to accept it. They have opted out of the debate on the House of Lords now. They are wrong—it is sensible to have the debate.

Q9. [54799] Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it remains the intention of the Government to introduce a Food Standards Agency, despite the rumours and speculations emanating from so-called informed sources?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can certainly confirm that. The establishment of a Food Standards Agency is a commitment by the Government which we intend to honour and carry out. My hon. Friend will know that we must put our legislative programme together taking account of all the various issues. However, we remain committed to doing it as quickly as possible. We all know the reason why we are having to set up an independent Food Standards Agency: because the party of BSE and E. coli never took the decisions necessary—but we will.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Last month, unemployment—according to the statistics used by the previous Government—rose. [Interruption.] Went down, rather. However, according to the figures that the Government now use, unemployment increased. Which one is right?

The Prime Minister: That question was muddled from beginning to end. On the International Labour Organisation count, there was a marginal increase; on the benefit count, there was a decrease. Since we came to office, there has been a substantial decrease. All I am telling the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues about unemployment is that it is important to get it in balance. New jobs are still being created the whole time. Faced with the world economic downgrading of forecasts of growth, the economic financial crisis and the slow down, the question is: what are the right policies? We believe for example that cancelling the new deal would have a disastrous effect on unemployment.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): You have said that four times.

The Prime Minister: That is because at some point I hope to get a response from the Opposition and to find out whether they are in favour. I agree that there should be an economic debate and argument, but the Conservative party would be in a better position to conduct that debate and argument if it had some serious policy position of its own; it does not.

Q10. [54800] Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the proposal of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to call a meeting in Barnsley on 10 November to discuss the distribution of lottery funds in the former coalmining areas? Records show that we have lost out considerably as regards those funds. The meeting is welcome, but it must be meaningful. Will he impress on the Secretary of State the fact that, following the loss of culture and sporting facilities and of jobs and job opportunities, there is every justification for the miners and mining communities requesting that meeting; and will he give it his blessing?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I am delighted that the meeting is taking place; of course, it was organised by the Government. My hon. Friend will know that the coalfields task force, which the Government established, said in its report in June that an increased share of lottery proceeds had a significant party to play in helping to regenerate the coalfield areas. Obviously, we will do what we can to ensure that any lottery moneys that come into those areas help to regenerate them. New deal money, too, will help by giving retraining and re-skilling opportunities to many of those people who have lost their jobs to industrial restructuring. That is an important part of the Government's programme which, as ever, is opposed by the Opposition.

Welfare Reform

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Darling): With permission Madam Speaker, I should like to set out the next phase of the Government's plans to reform the welfare state and to deal with the annual uprating of benefits.

When we came to power, we faced two huge challenges—to raise standards in education and to reform the welfare state. Today, we rise to the challenge of welfare reform. Today, we put words into action.

Welfare reform is essential because many people are poorer than they need be, many are dependent on benefits when they need not be, and others are neglected when they should not be. Our central objective is to provide work for those who can and security for those who cannot. Our plans will be based on our belief in fairness, will give greater help to those with the greatest needs, and will ensure that benefits go only to those who are entitled to them. All reforms will be undertaken after consultation.

The vast majority of people who responded to the principles and success measures that we set out in the Green Paper earlier this year endorsed them, and I am happy to reaffirm them today. I have placed in the Library a copy of the list of respondents. What I announce today will be the first of a series of announcements that will form the basis of legislation during this Parliament, beginning early next year. Legislation will take effect over a number of years, but all existing claimants who are eligible for their benefits when the changes are introduced will be protected.

Today, we are publishing three documents to show how we are putting the principles that we set out into practice. The first is a document that shows what we have done so far on welfare reform—the new deal, child care, the working families tax credit—the principles that guide our reforms and the new measures that we are planning.

The second document sets out our plans for a single gateway, a something-for-something deal for those out of work that will change the culture of the welfare state. The third is a consultation document on our plans to reform disability benefits to give more help to those in greatest need and to tackle the abuses in the current system.

On the benefits uprating, I can announce today the largest ever increase in child benefit. As a result of the uprating, child benefit will rise from next April by £2.95 to £14.40 a week. That represents real security for our children provided by the Government. I can also announce new help for the poorest pensioners in the introduction of a minimum income guarantee. The poorest pensioners will receive a minimum of £75 a week and pensioner couples will receive £116.60. Again, that represents real security provided by the Government for today's pensioners.

Most national insurance benefits will increase in line with the retail prices index—3.2 per cent. Means-tested benefits will generally increase by 2.1 per cent. in the normal way. I have placed in the Vote Office the details of the uprating of benefits.

We have plans for a single gateway to the benefit system for people of working age. When I looked at the way in which the Department of Social Security handled our claims, I was amazed to see that people of working age could receive benefits without even having to turn up for an interview and without being given any help in finding work. That will change.

Through the £195 million for the new deal for disabled people, the £190 million for national introduction of the new deal for lone parents and the first ever national child care strategy, we have created new opportunities for people to work. We are ensuring, through the new minimum wage and the working families tax credit, that work pays.

We believe that, in return, it is reasonable that people of working age—lone parents, the unemployed and people claiming incapacity benefits—should be required to attend an interview to discuss their options for work. There will, of course, be people—such as the terminally ill—for whom an interview would clearly be inappropriate and for whom the rule would not apply.

We are not forcing people into work, but the interviews will give real opportunities to people who have been written off by the system. Our plans will create a fundamental change in culture. People will no longer ask of the system, "What can you do for me?" They will ask, "What can I do to help myself?" We will improve the quality of advice that we give as we learn from the new deal. We will proceed carefully, starting with pilots. The full scheme will be in place in April 2000.

Similarly, in disability benefits, we aim to provide work for those who can, and security for those who cannot. When the severely disabled are not receiving the help that they need, when 1 million disabled people say that they want to work but are not being given the chance, when a quarter of men over 60 are on incapacity benefit because the previous Government used it as a way in which to hide the unemployment figures, we know that the system has to change.

We promised in the Green Paper that disabled people should receive the support that they need to lead a fulfilling life with dignity; we shall keep that promise. The foundation for all that we do is an unshakeable commitment to comprehensive civil rights for disabled people to ensure that those people are respected not only in the workplace but in all areas of life.

We need to do more. Today, I can announce a £30 million programme, extra to the new deal, of new help for disabled people seeking work. We also want to improve disability benefits. Disabled people with the greatest needs are not receiving the support that they need, whereas others are receiving support that they should not. People disabled young in life with no hope of work receive so little through the severe disablement allowance that 70 per cent. of them have to claim income support. Disabled people on low incomes who need day and night care do not receive enough help to meet their extra needs, and young children with little mobility receive no recognition from the system. Meanwhile, claims to disability living allowance are not always supported by medical evidence. Some people have been awarded benefit for life even though they have conditions that are expected to improve.

Today, we set out for consultation proposals to provide more help for the most severely disabled people in greatest need and action to ensure that disability benefits go to the right people. First, we propose for new claimants a change in the way we support severely disabled people and others disabled young in life so that they receive greater help. People aged 20 and over can already qualify for incapacity benefit, if they have worked, or for income support. Severe disablement allowance will no longer be available for them.

However, many young people disabled before they were 20 have little hope of work. Today, I can announce that we will give them the biggest ever rise in support, with an extra £25 a week in benefit.

We propose a fundamental reform to incapacity benefit for future claimants only. The benefit is meant to be for people who are unable to work, yet the number of claimants has risen threefold over the past 20 years, at a time when the nation's health has been improving. We are concerned that the benefit is being abused as an enhanced early retirement subsidy.

For future claimants, we will discourage the use of incapacity benefit as an early retirement subsidy. People who have a private pension or health insurance payment of more than £50 will receive less support. Every pound of private income that they have in excess of the £50 limit will reduce their benefit by 50p. We will restore the benefit to its original purpose as an insurance benefit for people who have worked. Too often, it has been abused as a more generous form of support for the long-term unemployed.

We will strengthen the link between work and benefit, and only people who have worked and paid recent contributions before the claim will be eligible for the benefit. We will reform the all work test, so that those who claim benefits have to give evidence of their work prospects. For the first time, we will have information on the work that disabled people can do.

We want to improve the provision for disabled people with the greatest needs. We will provide real security for the poorest disabled people with the highest care costs. Today, I can announce a disability income guarantee that will give £129 a week to a single person and £169 to a couple. The guarantee will be extended to three and four-year-olds so that a couple with one child on income support and disability living allowance with the highest care needs will get at least £199 a week. For the first time, we will also extend the higher rate of disability living allowance mobility component, worth an extra £35 a week to all three and four-year-old severely disabled children.

The benefit integrity project, which we inherited from the previous Government, has failed. It caused a lot of anxiety to disabled people, so we will cancel it, and in its place we will introduce a new system for reviewing claims to disability living allowance and attendance allowance that is both fairer and more sensitive. It will work in the interests of disabled people.

The changes will generate £$\frac{1}{2}$ billion in long-term savings; but even with the changes, real-terms spending on disabled people will continue to rise in the long run. The reforms do not affect the comprehensive spending review plans announced by my right hon. Friend Chancellor in July. It is quite right that, as our society gets wealthier, the amount that we spend on the most vulnerable should increase; but benefits must go to those for whom they were intended. We must give the most help to those in the greatest need, and the system must be affordable.

The structural changes that I have announced today will deliver significant savings over the longer run, but they will do so by ensuring that the greatest help goes to those in the greatest need and that benefits go only to those for whom they were intended. We want to provide work for those who can, and security for those who cannot.

Today, for the first time, we will provide real security, with record levels of child benefit. The changes are good news for those out of work, who will be given better advice and opportunities to work, but bad news for those who abuse the system or try to claim benefits to which they are not entitled.

Today, we are showing our determination to modernise the welfare state and reshape it for today's world, so that it provides opportunities for all those who want to work, and delivers security to all those who need it. I commend the proposals to the House.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): I thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in letting me see his statement earlier, albeit only a little earlier. I would probably have learnt more by simply reading the Evening Standard, which carried a full, almost blow-by-blow account of the statement before he stood up to make it. That is yet another example of how the Government want to manipulate the House and use it to their own ends.

The Secretary of State said that he would rise to the challenge. I seem to recall that, with the previous big Green Paper on welfare reform, we had exactly the same rising to the challenge. There seems to be an awful lot of rising to the challenge but far too few challenges are really being met en route.

The Secretary of State was very long on a series of issues that seem, in many senses, to be relaunched, reissued and rehashed. Minimum income for pensioners has already been stated at least twice, and perhaps even three times, and the same applies to the uprating of child benefit.

Do the Government have plans to tax child benefit, as endless leaks in the newspapers suggest? Perhaps he would like to answer that question once and for all.

There have also been further leaks to the press about taking away child benefit from parents of 16 to 18-year-olds and giving it directly to those in higher education. Will he perhaps answer that once and for all?

There are, of course, important points on the disabled and on the gateway to benefit, which I will come to, but the reality is that, as usual, little has changed. There has been a lot of relaunching of clichés and a reannouncement of stuff from the past.

I turn to the main announcements that the Secretary of State has made today in his documents. On "The Gateway to Work", clearly, the Government have now decided that everyone should be eligible for work at least at the interview stage. The Opposition are not, in principle, opposed to that concept. [Interruption.]

The Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), should be very careful because it was she who said:

"There is an authoritarian behavioural requirement for

She said that the jobseeker's allowance was

"illiberal in what is meant to be a democratic state."—[Official Report, 10 January 1995; Vol. 252, c. 109.]

Either she has changed her mind about jobseeker's allowance or become illiberal, authoritarian and anti-democratic.

When we introduced jobseeker's allowance, we were attacked by the then Opposition, who are now the Government. I assume that they now accept the great success of jobseeker's allowance and intend to apply it further, but serious questions remain with regard to the concept of the gateway. I should be grateful if the Secretary of State would answer some of them.

Paragraph 10, page 10 of "Principles into Practice" mentions that certain categories of people, such as the recently bereaved, single parents with very young children and others, will not be required to take part in immediate interviews for work. What does "immediate" mean? Exactly how long a gap does the Secretary of State envisage there being? Who will adjudicate as to who fits into those categories? The statements are very vague. He must have some idea in his own mind of exactly what that means. [Interruption.] Labour Members laugh because they like the general, but do not like the particular.

The Secretary of State made a bold statement on dependency and wishing to reduce it, but the more the Government move towards means testing, the greater dependency there will be. For example, in paragraph 21, page 16 of "Principles into Practice", there is a clear signal that the Government will apply a means test on occupational and personal pensions; for example, incapacity benefit is reduced for new claimants. Exactly how does that fit in with the right hon. Gentleman's reduction of dependency?

Does not the Government's statement about reducing dependency ring hollow given the working families tax credit that they are to introduce, which will massively, by their own statement, increase dependency? Does the Secretary of State not agree that, on the Treasury's statement, even someone on £38,000 a year will be moved into dependency directly as a result of that programme, so will the Government now admit that that they are beginning to attack the contributory principle and that what they intend to do—[Interruption.] As the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just said, they intend ultimately to abolish it—those were his words just now on the Bench. He intends to get rid of it, so will the Government now admit that that is what they are engaged in.

The Government refer in the document to the need to pilot some of the programmes. Does the Secretary of State admit that his lone-parent pilot programme was a clear disaster? The Government included no control pilots in it. Will he now accept that, unless he includes control groups in pilot projects, those, too, will be a disaster, just like his nationwide launch of the lone-parent pilot?

Serious questions need to be addressed. Will the Secretary of State specify what fall-out rate from the return to work is acceptable in these programmes and what the targets are for benefit savings? Will he also specify what the target is for the number that the Government intend to get back into work?

Finally, in "Principles into Practice", the Government state:

"at the point of change, no one loses from the reforms we are [illegible]"

What does that mean? Clearly, there will be losers. What does the Secretary of State actually mean? [Interruption.] Labour Members laugh again—the particular and the general, the same old rule. Nice clear statements are what are required. Surely, if the right hon. Gentleman cannot answer those questions and many others, it will become apparent over the next few weeks and months that he has missed another opportunity.

For the most part, the announcement is a rehashing of what has been and gone, a statement of the general, and of yet more consultation documents. There has not been much decision making and serious decisions have yet to be made—yet again, a missed opportunity.

Mr. Darling: The only missed opportunity is the hon. Gentleman's. I listened carefully to him, but I still do not know whether he is for or against anything that we have proposed. In the five minutes at his disposal, he raised several points of detail, but on the points of principle—our reform of incapacity benefit and our proposals to get people into work, to encourage more people to take opportunities available to them and to help those who are most severely disabled—he had not a single word to say.

Let me deal with the points that the hon. Gentleman did make, such as they were. As I understand it, the Conservative party is now committed to getting rid of the working families tax credit.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Not true.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman says, "Not true." He said so at the last Question Time. That is the single policy that the Opposition have set out. The working families tax credit ensures that work will pay. For many people who are trapped on benefits, one of the problems of the past was that work did not pay. The working families tax credit will get more help to people and will encourage them to get off benefit and into work.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the new deal for lone parents, complaining that we should have done more piloting or had more control groups. That is a bit rich coming from a party that is against the whole thing. The Conservatives believe that the new deal is wrong, and they would leave people confined to benefits. I strongly believe that the new deal is a success. Nine out of 10 lone parents who have been interviewed have joined the new deal, which shows how much they wanted to take the opportunities available.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a couple of points of detail. First, we have made it clear that we must be sensitive when we introduce interviews that will be conditional on someone receiving benefit. It would be inappropriate to hold them immediately after a bereavement, and I am glad to have the opportunity to say so. I will happily discuss with the hon. Gentleman the length of time that he might think reasonable. However, we are rightly saying that we will be sensitive about how we handle these matters. Our objectives are to help people and to give them opportunities denied for years by the Conservatives.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman asked what we meant when we said that existing beneficiaries would not be affected. We mean just that. Our radical proposals are for reform in the future. We are ensuring that we can meet the needs of the welfare state not for two or three years but for two or three decades. We are reforming the welfare state: the Conservative party did absolutely nothing about it for 18 years.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement, and particularly for his proposals about the single gateway, which will be a great improvement. Will he say more on his proposals for the abysmal failure that is the all work test, which clearly divided people between those picked to work or not to work, with nothing in between? That has imperilled many people. Can my right hon. Friend say how it might develop in the coming months?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support. The all work test has not been successful. It tends to consign people who pass it to complete inactivity. Everyone knows that people who have an incapacity may be capable of doing some work. I am anxious to assess clearly whether someone is eligible for incapacity benefit because of a medical condition, but I am anxious, too, to assess people using a new employability test that will ask what they can do and concentrate on their capacity rather than their incapacity. In the past, far too many people have been simply written off. Many people on incapacity benefit could work, and they want to work.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): The Liberal Democrats welcome several of the measures, notably the decision—for which we have long argued—to abolish the failed benefit integrity project. It is regrettable that that abolition has taken 18 months, but it is none the less welcome. Can the Secretary of State confirm that, from tomorrow, no tests will be associated with the project, and that no one else will lose benefits because of it? Can he tell us what penalties he is considering for those who fail to turn up for compulsory interviews? Will any benefits be lost? On means testing of incapacity benefit for those who have pensions, would the right hon. Gentleman not have been wiser to wait until the Government had resolved the issue of second pensions, as his measures clearly set a possible disincentive to saving? Does his package means more or less money for disabled people?

Mr. Darling: I shall deal with the hon. Gentleman's points in reverse order. Yes, the package clearly means more money for disabled people. The minimum guarantee, extending mobility allowance to three and four-year-olds and the new allowance for those disabled congenitally or when they were under 20 clearly represent additional help that was not otherwise available. On pensions, the important point is that, 50 years ago, very few people had insurance or occupational pension cover. Incapacity benefit was designed when such cover was not available. If we were starting from scratch—it is essential to take that approach in considering fundamental reform—we would ask whether it was sensible to pay money to some people who might have good occupational pension cover without taking that cover into account. With the £50 disregard, the first £50 is ignored, and after that there is a 50 per cent. taper, so people with an occupational pension or insurance cover will always be better off.

I do not agree that it might have better to wait for a further announcement. Part of the problem with welfare reform is that it is tempting to wait for the next announcement because one thus avoids taking all sorts of difficult decisions. At some stage, one must press on with firm proposals.

The hon. Gentleman asked about interviews. He knows that, to receive benefit, people have to sign up to a host of conditions. An important one will be that someone has to agree to come to an interview. I stress that there is a world of difference between that and telling people that they must take a job. We say that in the new deal for the young unemployed but not for lone parents. Nine out of 10 lone parents who came for interview liked what they saw and joined the new deal.

On the benefit integrity project, I cannot give a commitment that everything will change tomorrow morning. We have already made changes to remove some of its worst excesses which caused difficulties in the summer last year. I want to ensure that we have a system that gets benefits right from the start. Almost one third of disability living allowance claimants did not have apparent evidence to justify the award. That situation cannot continue. Equally, the trouble with the benefit integrity project is that it has removed people from benefit who, on any objective view, should not have been put in that unhappy position. That is why I want to move ahead with reform to carry on improving things and remove the difficulties. All my proposals will be subject to consultation. Assuming that the consultation agrees with what we propose, we will press ahead with legislation and make the necessary changes at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I welcome the Secretary of State's announcement, particularly those aspects which will increase help to the most disabled people, and the extension of help to younger children. I hope that I will be able to welcome the changes on the single gateway when I read more fully the proposals in his consultation document. On the consultation on changes to disability benefits, what will happen to the Government's proposals if most of the people and organisations consulted are against them? Of those people who will suffer cuts in their benefit as a result of the changes made today, will he say what proportion—[Interruption.] Well, cuts compared with what they would have gained had the current benefits remained in place. Of that group, what proportion does the Secretary of State expect to be successful in getting jobs?

Mr. Darling: I thank my right hon. Friend for his general support and acknowledge his work in the Department earlier this year, particularly in preparing the Green Paper, on whose principles and success measures we are building. The point of consultation is to listen and find out what people have to say about our proposals. Over the next few weeks, I expect that there will be points on which people will agree and others with which they disagree or on which they have better suggestions. That is the nature of consultation.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned people who are no longer entitled to benefit as a result of the changes we have made. Those are changes intended to return incapacity benefit to its original intention in relation to contributions and which relate to our proposals for a better share between individual contributions and those from the Government. I believe that the changes are absolutely right in principle, but I repeat that no one receiving benefit under the present system will be affected. It would be wrong to disturb arrangements that have been made and which have been proceeded with in good faith. These are all changes based on the future.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about work. I believe strongly that everything the Government are doing is essential in the modern labour market, where people will have several jobs between starting out and retiring. We must ask ourselves at every stage what the Government can do to keep people in touch with the labour market, which is a fundamental part of the new deal.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): I listened carefully to the Secretary of State but even though he said that he is keen to keep people in touch with the labour market, I heard nothing about the growing number of people who are occupied in or seeking part-time work. One of the biggest industries in my constituency is fruit growing, which depends heavily on people who are prepared to pick as part-time workers. If the reforms are to mean anything, the transition from part-time to full-time work—or making available part-time work on terms that make it attractive—must be recognised as an indispensable part of a labour market that is increasingly dependent on people working part time.

Mr. Darling: Inasmuch as I understood the hon. Gentleman's point, part-time work is a matter of choice for some, but I fully accept that for many people it is the only option. What we have to do and what we are doing at every stage of the labour market reform is to make it more likely that someone can be kept in touch with the labour market to find full-time or part-time work as they think appropriate.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I was delighted to hear the Secretary of State announce the cancellation of the benefit integrity project. When the Social Security Committee considered that issue in the summer we nearly recommended cancellation, but then decided not to. We felt that there was a difficulty with the claims that had been assessed and that a significant number of claims were outstanding based on inadequate information. Can the Secretary of State can tell me how many such cases are outstanding and what the transitional provisions are for that group and for the new arrangements that will be put in place?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend has raised a point that was raised by the Liberal Democrats. I shall make the position clear. The proposals I have announced this afternoon, including that in relation to the benefit integrity project, are the subject of a consultation paper that is available in the Vote Office now. Assuming the consultation succeeds and that people generally agree with what we are doing, we will proceed with the necessary changes either legislatively or, if possible, administratively.

The benefit integrity project is continuing now, but, as I explained earlier, we have removed some of the worst excesses. Cases in the pipeline will still be looked at because it is important to ascertain two things. First, we must ensure that we are getting the right benefit to those who are entitled to it and, secondly, where there is no evidence to justify it, we must do something about it. That process will continue.

I want to ensure that, not just in this area but across the benefits system, the DSS and the Benefits Agency spend more time getting decisions right in the first place rather than making a wrong decision and having to disturb an award that has been made, which is obviously difficult for the person receiving it. No one should be in any doubt that the process we have started by examining the benefit integrity project and disability living allowance and attendance allowance claims will continue. We will remove the aspects causing the most problems, but we will not return to the situation that existed before April 1997 when absolutely nothing was being done about the fact that far too many people were getting the wrong benefit.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The Secretary of State may recall that, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) said, in May, the Social Security Committee recommended that the benefit integrity project should be put on probation for six months. I am sure that it is a matter of delight for the House that the Secretary of State has put it to death this afternoon. That is welcome. The right hon. Gentleman rightly made great play of the fact that existing benefits and payments would be protected and that changes to benefit levels would only come in the future. Does that apply to disability living allowance claimants who currently hold life awards?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. He will know, as many hon. Members do, that the concept of a life award within the DSS is misleading. Although we have called them life awards, they are not life awards. We have always had the right to review someone's entitlement to an award. I want to change that situation so that people know whether they will receive a benefit for a long period. It is also important that we constantly review people's entitlement so that, if their condition gets worse, we take account of that and perhaps pay them more, and if it gets better, we take account of that as well.

In the minority of cases in which the condition will not improve, it is important that we get away from a situation in which we give awards and then abandon the person, who may well be receiving the wrong amount of help.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When he refers to keeping in touch with the labour market, is my right hon. Friend aware that in some areas in Britain, especially the coalfields, where all the pits were closed in the miserable years of the Tory Government, there is not much of a labour market? Will the people who do the interviewing be sensitive to the fact that there are not many jobs available?

Will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that many disabled people work in Remploy factories, which are running into serious trouble in respect of orders, principally from the Ministry of Defence and so on? If my right hon. Friend wants those disabled people to continue in work, it would be helpful—and it would be symbolic for him as he carries through this reform—to ensure that disabled people do not lose their jobs in Remploy factories. Some steps will have to be taken in that regard. It would not be a bad idea if my right hon. Friend doubled the number of Remploy factories for the increasing number of disabled people who want to work.

Mr. Darling: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities have announced today extra help to enable disabled people to get into work. That will be welcome.

My hon. Friend makes an important point about the coalfields. The Government's objective is to create the right economic conditions to ensure sustainable economic growth everywhere, including the coalfields. The difference between what happens under this Government and what happened under the previous Government is that as a result of the new deal, rather than abandoning people once they are unemployed, we do everything that we can to put them back in touch with the labour market. I fully accept the point that my hon. Friend makes; that in large parts of South Yorkshire, for example, which were devastated in the late 1980s, we need to do more to help right across the board. We need to ensure not only that someone has the right skills and training but that opportunities exist. That is why the Government's approach to welfare reform and economic reform is that the two go very much hand in hand.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Can the Secretary of State be a little more clear about what he has in mind with regard to the single gateway and his changes to incapacity benefit? Does he envisage one level of benefit for people who are on incapacity benefit now and people claiming income support or unemployment benefit? Will there be one level of benefit for different types of claimant, as there is in other countries that have introduced similar arrangements to those which the right hon. Gentleman proposes?

With regard to the all work test, are we to assume that that test will apply to those people at present on incapacity benefit? Even though they may have problems with mobility, they can nevertheless be deemed able to do a desk job and required to do some such work. Although they have a disability, they can still be part of the work force.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Lady is right. There are many people on incapacity benefit who could do some work. It may be different from what they have done in the past, and the object of a new employability test is to assess what they can do. There is nothing in the all work test that forces anyone to do anything. It is designed to provide help to enable people to work if they are able to do that.

The hon. Lady asked about the single gateway and a single benefit. There is nothing in what I said this afternoon that suggests a single benefit. We have a number of benefits, as the hon. Lady will know. The whole point about the single gateway is that, for the first time, people will be treated as individuals, rather than as part of a category. We want to ensure that all those of working age who enter the benefits system are asked what we can do to help them get back into work, such as improve their training, rather than simply being handed a benefit cheque.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement about benefits for people with disabilities, especially because of the number of young people who will now be involved. However, some of my constituents are concerned about the merit of some of the medical examinations: they feel that they are very short and not of a particularly high quality. Can that be tested? Secondly, on the question of appeals, which I know are not a matter for my right hon. Friend and which must, of necessity, be independent, some of my constituents are disappointed that they have to wait for 12 to 14 months, which is a very long time. Is there some general action that my right hon. Friend could take, without intervening in individual cases?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising two points with which I want to deal, the first of which involves the all work test and the nature of that test. He is right to say that a number of people have expressed concern about the nature of the test. One of the things that we have done since coming to power is to impose much higher standards on the people carrying out the tests, so that we can be satisfied that they are being conducted properly. Since being appointed, I have noticed a number of areas in which we can take further action to improve the standard of the tests.

My right hon. Friend also raised an extremely important point about appeals. To be frank, the current delay in dealing with appeals is unacceptable. However, there is good news on that front: we have set up a new appeals agency to take over from the independent tribunal service. Under the Social Security Act 1998, I acquired powers, not to make decisions—that would be quite wrong—but to lay down standards and, in particular, time limits within which appeals should be heard. I intend to pursue that vigorously.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): The Secretary of State mentioned uprating child benefit, but I am sure that he would be the first to accept that middle England, which he values so highly, would thoroughly resent any uprating of child benefit being wiped out by taxation, once joint income had reached higher tax thresholds. Will the right hon. Gentleman answer this simple question: does he accept that it is important to retain the principle of independent taxation when considering how and whether to tax child benefit?

Mr. Darling: Matters of taxation, independent or otherwise, are for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Gentleman highlights yet again the problem of Opposition Members, which is that half of them call for more spending and half for less.

On the subject of child benefit, I forgot to answer a point raised by the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), when he accused us of hiding our tax intentions. We did not hide them. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor, standing at the Dispatch Box last year, made it quite clear when we introduced the increase in child benefit that he would consider whether or not there was a case for taxing child benefit—at least in respect of higher-rate taxpayers. That remains our position and nothing has changed. I am glad that the Opposition are now at least welcoming the fact that we have given the biggest ever increase in child benefit, which will be of major help to every single child in this country.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): My right hon. Friend has said that all those in receipt of benefit, including lone parents, will be required to attend an interview. Will that interview be compulsory? If they do not attend, will there be any penalties imposed?

Mr. Darling: Let me explain. The conditions in respect of the new deal—that lone parents can attend—remain exactly the same; in other words, there is no compulsion. Lone parents will receive a letter inviting them to come in for an interview, once their child passes the age of five.

We are proposing a slightly different system—a new single gateway to the benefits system. It will be piloted for the first two years before being fully implemented, so that we can see how it works in practice and improve on it. We are saying to lone parents, who are not compelled to take work, that there is a world of difference between that and asking them to come in for an interview to discover what help might be available to them. Because nine out of 10 lone parents who come in for interview under the present scheme have joined the new deal, the matter is worth pursuing.

On my hon. Friend's last point, assuming that we pass the pilot stage and obtain the legislative power to do so, it is right to say to everybody that, as a condition of receiving benefit, coming along for an interview to do no more than find out what options might be available is not exactly unreasonable.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The Secretary of State said that the benefit integrity project is wrong, unfair, insensitive and should be scrapped. I do not think that there is one hon. Member with a constituency case load who could possibly disagree with that judgment. Nevertheless, if the project is to be continued for the time being, will not some people continue to lose their benefit unfairly? Will they be able to apply under the new criteria? If they are successful in doing so, will their lost benefit be restored to them?

Mr. Darling: If someone's benefit is restored on appeal, they will get their benefit back. The hon. Gentleman has to accept that, currently, the problem is that some people are receiving the wrong amount of disability living allowance. Some people are receiving DLA when the medical evidence for granting it is not immediately obvious, which—in any system—is clearly unsatisfactory. People need to have confidence in the system. Moreover, if we ensure that we are paying benefit to the right people, we could do more to help them. Other people are not receiving the right amount—they are not receiving enough—because their condition has worsened or was wrongly assessed initially.

I have made it clear that the benefit integrity project has to go because too many of its aspects are flawed. We have already taken a series of measures to remove some of the worst effects, and we have removed many of the problems—particularly those that occurred last year—of which hon. Members will be well aware. I want to replace the project with a system that ensures that we get the benefit right the first time. I want to ensure also that, when we review benefits, we review them to the benefit of disabled people, so that we can tell them, "If your condition has worsened, we can take account of that. If your condition has improved, we have to take account of that, too."

We want to get the system right the first time. We have inherited a situation in which, across the board, far too many decisions taken by the Benefits Agency have not been right the first time. That situation has to change.

Audrey Wise (Preston): May I welcome the extension of mobility help to three and four-year-old children, which I believe is overdue? May I also, however, express my concern about compulsory interviews for lone parents? If the interviews are intended to be helpful, why is it necessary to make them compulsory? Will my right hon. Friend confirm, quite categorically, that a compulsory interview is not the precursor of compelling lone parents either to seek or to accept employment, but that they will continue to be able to decide for themselves what is best for their children?

Mr. Darling: On the last point, nothing has changed from the situation today. I assure my hon. Friend that we have always made it clear that we are not compelling lone parents to go to work because of their particular circumstances. That position remains in future exactly the same as it is today.

My hon. Friend asked about pilots and why it is reasonable to ask people, right across the board, to come in. Let me give her one reason. On Monday, when I launched the lone parents' new deal nationally, I spoke to one lone parent who told me that she had ignored the first couple of letters she received because she thought that it was just another scheme. She turned up after receiving the third letter, was pleasantly surprised and is now about to complete training and go into work.

My point is that more people need to know what the Government are doing to help. There is a world of difference between coming in for an interview and being told what is on offer, and compelling someone to take a job—which, in the case of lone parents, we are not going to do.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I share the welcome for some aspects of the statement, which other hon. Members have already mentioned. Will some of the forms be revised so that people can more simply find their way through them? Although it has been stated that the all work test should not be a snapshot at a specific time, people are regularly refused benefit because they are experiencing a degree of remission at a specific time. I know of one case, for example, in which a medical examiner not only rejected a person's claim for benefit but said that he was unfit to take a job as a civil servant. There is a need to fine-tune the system both upwards and downwards.

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I made it clear in reply to an earlier question that I do think that the all work test needs to be refined. I certainly agree that the test would not be a success if a snapshot were taken on a particular day when a person's condition might be much worse or better than usual. It is important to get the whole picture.

[Mr. Darling]

The hon. Gentleman makes an exceptionally good point about the forms. I am pleased to be able to tell him that we are already on the case, doing what we can to simplify them. We are already running some pilot projects which will make it much easier to claim benefit. We are using modern technology and simplified forms, and bringing forms together so that people do not have to fill in three or four to apply for benefit. The hon. Gentleman makes a perfectly good case, and I hope to be able to come back to the House in the not too distant future with some good news on that issue.

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): I warmly welcome most of my right hon. Friend's statement. Does he acknowledge that, over the past three years, the number of people claiming incapacity benefit has declined significantly, not least because of the restrictions on eligibility introduced by the previous Government? Will he reassure the House that he has no plans to extend the qualifying period for incapacity benefit?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend asks about incapacity benefit and the qualifying period. I said that we are restoring incapacity benefit to its original purpose so that there is a more recent link between work and receiving that benefit. He also asked whether we want to make any further changes. I am not sure whether he has the consultation document yet, but the changes are fully set out in it. I think that I can reassure him on that point.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I am sure that the Secretary of State would not have wanted to give a misleading impression, so will he confirm that when he said that pensioners would be guaranteed an income of £75 a week, he was unaware of the 500,000 pensioners with savings who will have to live on less than £75 a week?

Mr. Darling: It is perfectly true that there are pensioners with savings—some have modest savings, while some have a great deal. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would stop carping about the minimum income guarantee. For the first time, we are giving more help to the poorest pensioners—more than they would ever have got under the previous Government. The Liberal Democrats should welcome that, not carp about it.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): In view of the need to ingrain in our social security practice some sense of balance between rights and responsibilities, most people would think it perfectly fair and reasonable that when people exercise their right to claim benefit, they should attend an interview to talk about their duty to seek work. Given the emphasis on improving the interface between social security and employment, is the logic that one day at local level we shall have integrated employment and benefit offices? Are the Government considering that for people of working age?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend may be aware that that is something in which the Government are extremely interested and which we intend to pursue more fully. The new deal attempts to do just that—to bring together the Employment Service and the social security system. The single gateway is an acceptance of the fact that the public, quite rightly, do not distinguish between the different Departments of Government. They expect the Government to provide help. As my hon. Friend rightly says, if the Government are to provide help, it is the responsibility of those seeking benefit or other support at least to find out what options are available. I for one will be happy to defend that proposal because it is entirely right and based on the correct principle.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): Will the Secretary of State please clarify whether people who are currently receiving incapacity benefit will be called for an employability test, or will it be only new claimants? Also, will pensioners who have a minimum income guarantee continue to have access to housing benefit, council tax benefit and income support?

Mr. Darling: As I made clear, the single gateway system will be piloted, but we want to ensure that people who are not in full-time work and who are receiving benefits attend an interview. Where that is inappropriate, perhaps because of care responsibilities, we need to be sensitive. I do not for one moment belittle the hon. Lady's point. There are many details on which we want to consult, but I believe that the principle that someone should attend an interview to find out what help might be available at an appropriate time remains the right one.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Is he aware that, in my constituency—as in many others—we have been carrying out a consultation process with disabled people about the way in which the current system operates? I assure him that those groups to which I have spoken will welcome his statement—especially the announcement about the abolition of the benefit integrity project. However, can he confirm that although, in two thirds of disability living allowance cases, there is no information to justify the amount of the award being paid, that is an indication, not of fraud, or even of overpayment, but simply of the non-availability of that information? Will he reassure people on DLA that there is no intention—as there was under the BIP—perhaps to hound them for potential fraud?

Mr. Darling: It is very important to distinguish between those people who defraud the social security system—which we all know happens—and those people who, through no fault of their own, have ended up with the wrong benefit. Since the week when I arrived in the Department in July, I have been worried that the systems that we have inherited are far from satisfactory. They need to be reformed to ensure that we get benefits right. It is far better that we ensure that a person receives the right benefit from the start, because otherwise, by the time the system catches up, they have proceeded so far down the road that it causes all sorts of difficulties when we try to put matters right. We are determined, therefore, to place far more emphasis than there has ever been on getting decisions right first time.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): The Secretary of State studiously—many people will think, disingenuously—avoided the phrases "means test" or "benefit reduction". Does the right hon. Gentleman agree, however, that, if incapacity benefit above £50 is means tested in future, first, a lot of future claimants will lose incapacity benefit to which they were entitled, and for which they believe they have paid through their national insurance contributions; and, secondly, the Government will once again have delivered a major blow to the principle of the national insurance system? We get a blow to the system about once a month. Why do not the Government come clean and say that their real agenda is to erode the contributory principle and the national insurance system and, ultimately, to destroy it altogether?

Mr. Darling: Although, to be fair, I believe that for much of the past 18 years the hon. Gentleman was in opposition to the Conservative Front-Bench team, he might want to reflect on the fact that the national insurance system and entitlement to contributory benefits were changed on the odd occasion during those 18 years. I believe that people realise that national insurance funds the system on a pay-as-you-go basis. It is not a fully funded system, so it is rather different from, let us say, an insurance scheme.

On the incapacity benefit changes, I believe that, in this day and age, when far more people have cover—sometimes substantial—it is entirely right that the risk should be shared fairly. The Conservatives may have pledged themselves to oppose that—which is curious given that, although they are always saying that they want to reform the welfare state, they have absolutely nothing to say on the particulars.

I believe that the change is entirely fair, and I have made it absolutely clear that the proposals are for future beneficiaries only. People on existing incapacity benefit will not be affected. The hon. Gentleman is therefore wrong on both counts. I am only sorry that at no time in the last hour have we heard a word from Conservative Members as to what they would do to reform and improve the benefit system.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. That concludes the statement. We must move on.

Senator Pinochet

4.29 pm

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There has been a very significant development in the case of Senator Pinochet. The divisional court has now held that he is entitled to immunity from prosecution. The democratic Government of Chile have also made it clear that they want these proceedings to come to an end. In view of those developments, may I ask that the Home Secretary come to the House without further delay—[HON. MEMBERS: "He is here."] Right. I hope that, without any further delay, he will make a full statement on the Government's position. This has dragged on day after day, and we have not had a statement. It is crucial that would should have one. The issue is not answered by the Home Secretary sitting there without saying anything.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Many of us are very concerned that the court decision could result in Pinochet leaving the country without a debate in this House. I recognise that what has happened so far has been strictly in accordance with the rules. The Home Secretary was not in a position to make a statement, because the matter was sub judice. However, should there be any possibility of that former murderous dictator leaving the country, the House should be able to have a debate first.

I have noted the ruling that you gave yesterday, Madam Speaker. However, you will have noted that there have, rightly, been endless articles in the media about Pinochet and the terrible crimes that were committed when he was a dictator. It would be most unfortunate, to say the least, if, because of court rulings, Pinochet were able to leave the country on Thursday, for example, without the House being able to debate the subject. I hope that you will give that careful consideration. I make no apology for my strength of feeling and that of my hon. Friends about that murderous criminal.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether you feel that, rather than the Home Secretary being asked to make a statement, it would be helpful if the Attorney-General came to the House to give us some guidance on the international implications of what has happened. Although he has made decisions in that area in a different capacity, what has happened affects our understanding of international law and the circumstances in which people can be prosecuted in one country or another, and kept in a country for that purpose.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Yesterday you ruled that early-day motions on the issue should be suspended. There is strong feeling in the House, and many of my hon. Friends wanted to add their names to those motions. I take it that, as the court has made a ruling and no appeal has yet been lodged, it is possible for the suspension to be lifted. I find the court ruling extraordinary. Is it a clear signal for heads of state such as Saddam Hussein that they can come here and have tea with Margaret Thatcher in future?

Madam Speaker: As the House is aware, I have no authority as far as Government statements are concerned.

[Madam Speaker]

Ministers make statements when they consider it appropriate. As the House also knows, the procedures under extradition law and the circumstances of the case involving Senator Pinochet are very complex. I understand that an appeal is pending, but I have had no time to ascertain what the legal position is now, having been in the Chair since 2.30 pm. Until I have had an opportunity to reflect on the situation, I propose to regard the case as still sub judice.

I remind the House, as I did yesterday, that I do not make rules as I go along; I uphold the rules of the House. As soon as it is possible to do so, early-day motions that have been withdrawn from the Order Paper will be returned to it, and hon. Members will be able to question Ministers.

Prostitutes' Advertisements (Public Telephone Boxes)

4.33 pm

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make it an offence to place advertisements for prostitutes in public telephone boxes; and for connected purposes.

The problem of carding is localised, but severe. Corners of central London in or bordering my constituency are awash with cards, as, I understand, are parts of Brighton, Southampton, Birmingham and some other cities. To give the House an idea of the scale of the problem, British Telecom removes an average of 14 million cards each year. Ten million cards were removed in Westminster during one monitoring period between August 1996 and January 1998. One thousand boxes are carded regularly. Some boxes can display 80 cards at one time. At the absolute minimum, the cards create an appalling litter problem. More seriously, cards are becoming increasingly graphic and sexually explicit, with photographic illustrations and descriptions of services offered that stretch the imaginations even of hon. Members, who are notoriously broad-minded.

I am not a prude; I find prudery tedious. I do not want to live in a sanitised, Disneyland-type city—however pleasant Disneyland may be to visit with one's children. But nor do I want to be confronted against my will with pornography. It is not fair effectively to prevent women and children from using telephone boxes because they feel threatened by the sleazy environment that the cards create. I do not see why a child calling home on his way from school should be confronted with advertisements for golden rain, bondage and foot fetishism.

There are two ways of dealing with such cards: a comprehensive call-barring scheme, and the introduction of a criminal offence of carding, as I propose. I would greatly welcome a comprehensive call-barring scheme. I congratulate BT on its voluntary scheme, and investment in cleaning up telephone boxes. Other telephone operating companies need to come on board quickly, and the Office of Telecommunications should move swiftly to permit outgoing call-barring, blocking calls from call boxes to the telephone numbers advertised on the cards.

My Bill creates a criminal offence of carding. That will help to reduce the number of carders, since penalties can be stiffer than the average fine of £200, which is little more to carders than an occupational hazard. A new criminal offence would replace the time-consuming, cumbersome and expensive process whereby the local authority or the police must take out injunctions—even then, only after five prosecutions—by using the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertising) Regulations 1992. Westminster council alone is spending £20,000 on serving 20 injunctions at the moment. A financial and administrative burden is being placed unfairly on certain police divisions in certain local authority areas.

I am aware of the difficulties of drafting legislation on this issue, but I urge the Home Office to move swiftly and to resist partial solutions, which rely on local authority enforcement powers and may simply move the problem, particularly in areas of central London such as those that I represent, across a local authority border, from one block of streets to another.

I am grateful for the sympathetic response that I have received from the Home Office and the Department of Trade and Industry on both call-barring and criminal offence issues. I hope that we can move forward. There is clear cross-party support on the issue. More than 80 Members of Parliament have written in support of firm action to deal with the problem. Doing so would be welcomed by Members of Parliament and business, as well as by residents of corners of our cities that are afflicted by the problem.

I am conscious of the argument that action against carding may result in prostitution being pushed back on to the streets. That is a serious and valid point. Out of concern for the safety of prostitutes—they are at risk—I do not want that to happen. Indeed, the problem of sleaze in the streets that I have described would be even greater were we to return to the situation of a few years ago, when prostitutes were working the streets.

But cards in telephone boxes are not the solution to that. They are messy and offensive, and allow no choice for members of the public who wish to make a telephone call from a public box but do not want to be confronted with such pornography. We must clamp down now on the carding nuisance, and recognise that advertising may move, and may have to move, into more targeted mediums, allowing people choice, and freeing up communities such as those that I represent from a palpable and serious nuisance.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Ms Karen Buck, Dr. Alan Whitehead, Mr. Alan Clark, Mr. Andrew Dismore and Mr. Tony McNulty.

PROSTITUTES' ADVERTISEMENTS (PUBLIC TELEPHONE BOXES)

Ms Karen Buck accordingly presented a Bill to make it an offence to place advertisements for prostitutes in public telephone boxes; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 250].

Army

[Relevant documents: The Eighth Report from the Defence Committee of Session 1997–98, on the Strategic Defence Review (HC 138-I).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

4.39 pm

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): It is an honour to open the first debate on the Army since January 1996. I intend to cover some of the important operational and staffing issues affecting the Army, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will address equipment issues in winding up.

Several hon. Members have asked about the future and form of such debates. I want to reassure the House that the Government have no plans to reduce the long-standing arrangement that three days each Session are given over to debates on service issues. I do not, however, rule out the possibility of changing the focus of each debate, to make the debates more relevant to the operational activities and structures of the armed forces themselves. I know that there is some support for that idea on both sides of the House, and the Government want to discuss the issue with those who have a view to express.

The debate comes at a time of change. Indeed, only last week the House debated the Government's long-term vision for Britain's defence. Change means building on the Army's historical strength. In last week's debate, the Army was justly commended in all parts of the House for the determination, commitment and dedication of its officers and soldiers. I am pleased to be able to pay tribute today to them, and to the sacrifices that have been made on behalf of the rest of us in this country. Our Army aims to be the best—and it is the best.

The deployment of our Army in different roles in Northern Ireland, in the Balkans, in Cyprus, and in defence diplomacy worldwide, has given it a depth of experience and a rightful reputation second to none.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of Northern Ireland, will he confirm that it is the Ministry of Defence, not the Northern Ireland Office, that is responsible for deciding whether Guardsmen Fisher and Wright can rejoin their regiment, the Scots Guards?

Mr. Henderson: I can confirm that the decision will be made by the Army Board.

When we consider the reputation of our Army all over the world, we should never forget that its effectiveness is founded upon its ethos. As I have met our troops in Northern Ireland and in Germany, and those in barracks preparing for deployment in the world's trouble spots, the strength of that ethos has been apparent to me.

There is a discipline that recognises that a battle can be won only if everyone plays his or her part in the team effort, and an integrity that acknowledges that every soldier has to impose that sense of discipline on his or her own activities in the interests of the team objectives.

There is courage—displayed in both a physical and a moral way—without which the difficult conditions of the urban jungle, the desert or the frozen mountains could not be overcome. There is loyalty, which the platoon—through to brigade and division—cements into an effective force. There is selflessness, which, in the extreme, means the ultimate sacrifice of one's own life. Those are the qualities that I know inspire those who serve. Those are the qualities that count when building a reputation in peace, and when winning a battle. Those are the qualities that make our Army the best, and give it the basis to act as a force for good in this difficult world.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): The Minister mentioned quality. Does he agree that the 22nd Special Air Service Regiment, based in my constituency, is one of the finest regiments in the world? He also mentioned loyalty. Does he agree that the number of books that we are now seeing by former members of the regiment are of great concern to serving and former members of the regiment? Would he once and for all destroy the myth published in a recent book that it might be Government policy to disband the regiment and start again? Will he assure me and the regiment that that is not the Government's intention?

Mr. Henderson: I can assure the hon. Gentleman—and any other hon. Member who wishes to refer to the quality of their local regiment—that I am proud to confirm that the quality is high throughout the British Army, and that that is built on the strength of its historic role. In relation to the publication of articles by ex-serving members, where their contracts prohibit the disclosure of certain forms of information, the Government will take every action to make sure that they are unable to engage in disclosure which could be harmful not only to their ex-colleagues but to the interests of the defence of this nation.

I want to refer now to two principal operational theatres. Our Army is currently at the highest level of operational involvement of any comparable army, with about one in four of our serving officers and soldiers involved in operations at any one time.

In Northern Ireland, the Belfast agreement represents a new start for the people of the Province. In August, I saw for myself our soldiers serving in difficult conditions in the Province. Without their efforts in places such as Drumcree—where they played a vital role in supporting the Royal Ulster Constabulary—the Belfast agreement would not have been possible. I know that this House will want to join me in paying tribute to the service men and women who have done so much to uphold the rule of law in Northern Ireland, and who, in all too many cases, have paid for it with their lives.

The House is aware of the important momentum for peace in the Province, which has enabled a reduction in the number of troops there. Routine military patrolling has ceased in many areas, and several security bases have been closed. Those are consistent with the current security situation, but the security forces have not lowered their guard. While a significant terrorist threat remains—as, regrettably, it does—troops will remain in Northern Ireland to support the RUC. Numbers will be returned to garrison strength only after a lasting peace has been achieved.

In other operations, the Army plays a crucial role. The UK provides the second largest force, after the United States, to the NATO-led stabilisation force in Bosnia. We currently have about 5,000 troops committed to this force who are playing a vital part in enabling the Bosnian people to start rebuilding their environment. That is also true in Kosovo. I can inform the House that the British military verifiers—including 50 Army personnel, who form the UK contribution to the 2000 international verifiers required by the Holbrooke agreement—are now ready for deployment when required by the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe.

As hon. Members will be aware, there are other important commitments that the Army has to undertake.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): When does the Minister expect the commitment in Bosnia to end? He will recall that, when troops first went there, it was for an initial period of six months, in 1993 or 1994, I think.

Mr. Henderson: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, which always arises when an intervention force has to re-establish peace and build stability. Often, it is an open-ended commitment. Without the benefit of a crystal ball, it is often impossible to determine how long our armed forces will have to make such a commitment.

The important aspect of the strategic defence review is that it provides for deployment in that context. It gives us the capability to take initiatives and contribute to international efforts in places such as Kosovo for a period. Related issues, such as overstretch, must be borne in mind, because they are central to the matter the hon. Gentleman raised. Before I move on to that subject, I must mention a couple more important core activities of our Army.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced plans a year ago to increase the assistance that the Ministry of Defence provides to humanitarian de-mining. Since then, the mine information and training centre at Minley has become an important focus for awareness about anti-personnel land mines. In the past year alone, its staff have conducted liaison visits to Bosnia, Croatia, Cyprus, Laos and Cambodia.

We must always remember that, within the United Kingdom, the Army continues to provide invaluable assistance to civil authorities, with cover ranging from the disposal of wartime bombs, which happens quite regularly, to help with flood relief.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Before leaving tasks, is the Minister aware that, as part of a shift towards home defence, the Americans are establishing 170 sub-units for nuclear, biological and chemical home defence, all in the volunteer reserves? Why is that role to be taken away from the only British nuclear, biological and chemical defence regiment, which is in the Territorial Army, when it has just returned from trials in America that it passed with flying colours?

Mr. Henderson: As I will explain later, decisions have not yet been reached, and Ministers have not yet received proposals for the future of the Territorial Army. However, I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that a review of the nation's needs as regards biological and chemical warfare is being undertaken. When the Government are in a position to make recommendations, the House will, of course, be informed of our needs in that regard.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): I am grateful to the Minister, who is being characteristically generous in giving way. Did he have an opportunity to see the article written this week in The Times by Mr. Michael Evans, the much respected and invariably well informed defence correspondent of that publication, in which he asserted that the Territorial Army will next year have to sell drill halls to the value of £42 million to make up its budget? Is that assertion true, and, if it is, what will be the consequences for the TA if it is unable to realise enough money from the sale of property? Will there have to be further cuts in numbers?

Mr. Henderson: I know that the hon. and learned Member is always careful to trust in what he reads in the newspapers. I also know that he always tries to be helpful. No decisions have been reached on the future of the Territorial Army. I have not received any recommendations from the Army. When I do, I shall expect them to be on staffing levels and on capital assets. We need to consider how best we can utilise capital assets in the interests of organisations such as the Territorial Army, and I would be wrong not to take that into account.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) rose—

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth) rose—

Mr. Henderson: I am beginning to be over-generous. I shall take one more intervention; then I shall press on.

Mrs. Lait: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Before we leave the subject of the best use of Army assets, will he say what stage the tracker programme has reached? Is it appropriate for the Army to have a programme that is mounted on an armoured personnel carrier and cannot see over hills and round corners, given that battlefield reconnaissance systems such as airborne stand-off radar are available? Would he not save himself some money by not allowing those particular boys to have those particular toys?

Mr. Henderson: In the spirit of constructiveness, I should point out that the hon. Lady was—I think—referring to the tracer programme, for which there is a future. It is an important element of our capacity to redeploy—or deploy—to wherever it is necessary for our forces to move.

In the debate last week, questions were asked about the Army's structure. The depth and breadth of the Army's contribution is immense. The important changes to its structure set out in the strategic defence review are designed to ensure that it can meet its future commitments without overstretch. I tell hon. Members who raised the matter last week that I am still considering the structure of Land Command in the United Kingdom; I expect to announce the conclusions of the review shortly.

A number of other changes arise out of the SDR. In the long run, a higher level of recruitment is crucial if we are to tackle the problem of overstretch and meet our staffing targets. However, as the Defence Committee identified, other measures can help. The creation of a sixth deployable brigade and the delivery of a coherent formation readiness cycle are central to improving the Army's ability to deliver combat-ready formations in the future.

The three-year cycle will ensure that formations and units can train properly, can meet their liability to the new high-readiness joint rapid reaction forces and their operational commitments, and can maintain an average operational tour interval of 24 months. That will reduce overstretch and improve the quality of life for our soldiers.

I inform the House that the new brigade will be known as 12 Mechanised Brigade. It will consist of an armoured regiment, as well as armoured and mechanised infantry, and will give the Army a potent and flexible new formation. The brigade headquarters will form at the end of next year, and the brigade will start training year in 2001. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"] That is still under consideration.

The creation of a single specialist air manoeuvre brigade will integrate the proven experience of our airborne forces with the formidable capability of the attack helicopter. The new formation will be known as 16 Air Assault Brigade. The number 16 was chosen as it has a long association with the Paras, who will be providing two battalions to the new brigade.

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester) rose—

Mr. Henderson: I must press on a little.

The Territorial Army preoccupied the minds of hon. Members on both sides of the House during last week's debate, and it will no doubt be the focus of many speeches today. A statement will be made to the House as soon as decisions have been taken. However, Ministers have not yet received any proposals.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): A moment ago, the Minister told my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) that decisions had not yet been taken, because Ministers had not yet been given any advice. Am I right in thinking that, according to paragraph 102 of the strategic defence review, the only decision that has been taken about the Territorial Army is that the nuclear, biological and chemical capability will be taken away from it and given to the regular Army? If that is so, the answer that the Minister gave my hon. Friend was not entirely correct.

Mr. Henderson: I will receive proposals from the Army at a later stage that will be consistent with the commitments in the strategic defence review. I outlined the principles in last week's debate, and I will be happy to do so again today, lest anyone be unclear. The principles are as we described: that the Territorial Army should be integrated with the regular Army; that it should be relevant, fully resourced and trained for real tasks in today's world; and that, above all, it should be usable.

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow): Has my hon. Friend received my written submission to the review, and will he consider meeting me soon to discuss the future of the territorial regiment in Jarrow? That regiment, a parachute regiment, ideally suits the new role for the armed forces. One must not forget the social aspect in constituencies such as mine, where the regiment makes a real contribution to the economy.

Mr. Henderson: I have received representations, and I will be happy to meet my hon. Friend or his colleagues to discuss that issue. My office has told every hon. Member who has written to me that I am prepared to see local representatives, but I cannot see everyone individually, or I would be here all month; I have asked that, where there are common interests, hon. Members should come to see me in clusters. My office has made some time available in my diary for that in the coming weeks. I am happy to have such meetings, as I want to have a full knowledge of local views.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Henderson: I have been very generous, and now I will be a little bit more generous, after which I will stop being generous.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I thank my hon. Friend for his generosity. Perhaps his answer could save a delegation having to come to see him. I want to ask about Cumbria and North Lancashire, and the King's Own Border Regiment.

My understanding is that the proposal is to create one company in the area. It looks like we are being dealt with very badly. There is a strong case for a second company, and I would obviously like that to be in Carlisle. We should consider whether there should be detachments. In my area, there is no money to be made by selling the TA centre, because it is Carlisle castle, a grade I listed building. If we get only one company in Cumbria, could a detachment be provided in Carlisle? Of course, we would prefer two companies.

Mr. Henderson: I will consider proposals from the TA and the Army once they have been submitted. I want full consultation, so that the objectives can be discussed locally and best solutions can be proposed. Conservative Members obtained a copy of an original document last week, and waved it about the House. The officials involved in that consultative document will review all the discussions locally and then make proposals to Ministers. Until that is done, no decisions can be reached. I have an open mind on geographical matters, but not on the principles.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Henderson: I should press on now. I gave way very generously last week and have done so today, and I want to move on to the other issues. I have said that I am prepared to see any hon. Members who want to raise specific matters, possibly in clusters.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham rose—

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) rose—

Mr. Henderson: I am not prepared to give way, and I am not moveable on that. I am going to move on.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will deal with a wide range of procurement issues in winding up, but I should like to refer to two pieces of equipment for the Army.

The Challenger 2 tank is beginning to be introduced into service. This is a British product that is used by the British Army. When asked what he thought of the tank, a soldier in the Royal Scots Dragoon Guards said to his commanding officer, "Aye, Sir, this is better than we had before". That is a clear judgment from those in the front line. That is our judgment, and it will, I believe, be the judgment of the international army community. The tank is good for the British Army, and it will be good, I believe, for our international exports; this is a top-quality product that can be sold to other armies throughout the world.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): The hon. Gentleman is indeed being extremely generous in giving way.

There is just one problem with the Challenger 2 tank, of which the hon. Gentleman is proud and the Conservative Government were proud, too: where are the tank transporters? What has happened to the contracts that were meant to be up and running now for the tank transporters? The old ones will not carry the Challenger II, and there is still no date in prospect for the delivery of the new transporters.

Mr. Henderson: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but the Army is confident that it has the means to put those tanks in place in a battlefield situation. As he also knows, these matters are constantly under review. We are always looking for better ways in which to transport and, indeed, to maintain and service tanks and other equipment. That is an continuing process that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence and I take as a high priority.

Mr. Hancock rose—

Mr. Henderson: I am not giving way.

The second piece of equipment to which I wish to refer is the Apache attack helicopter, another British product to be used by the British Army. Again, our troops are excited by the prospect of it being brought into service. I believe that that also augurs well for exports.

Staffing is an important matter, which was covered in last week's debate, but it is also germane to this afternoon's discussions. As the House will know, the Army is 5 per cent. understaffed. That shortfall is unacceptably high, and has led to stresses and strains on service men and women and their families.

The Government are determined to correct the problem, but it cannot be done overnight. We have already taken key steps to improve recruitment and to increase capacity at Army training facilities. As a direct result, over 1,800 more troops are under training than in May 1997, an increase of more than 16 per cent. That improvement will, I know, be welcomed by the House.

More and more people are joining the Army because they believe that it is a first-choice career. As I said in last week's debate on the strategic defence review, we are determined that the Army should be a first-choice career for a much wider group of people in our society. It should be a first-choice career for many more women, black people, Asian people and people from other ethnic groups.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): For a very short time, I had the great privilege of serving with the Gurkhas. Will the Minister acknowledge the huge debt of honour that we owe both serving and retired Gurkhas?

Will he confirm that the Government will in part repay that debt by paying retired Gurkhas pensions that are fair and reasonable?

Mr. Henderson: I am happy to confirm that my view and the Government's view are the same as the hon. Gentleman's: we owe a great debt to the Gurkhas, who continue to give us support. Their pensions are determined by an arrangement with the Indian and Nepalese Governments. Pensions are at a level that is commensurate with what is appropriate as part of that agreement. I think that he will understand that, and recognise that that has to be the case.

I talk about the Army being a first-choice career for more and more people. I am also saying that we have to get highly trained staff. That is the main challenge. We have introduced specific measures to address the problem of experienced officers and soldiers leaving early. In key trades, financial retention incentives have been introduced. In other areas, cash bounties are paid to soldiers who re-enlist at the end of their service.

The strategic defence review gave the highest emphasis to investors in people. We must provide better training and education for our personnel, and I am considering how to extend our national vocational qualifications programme to all our people. I am proud that our personnel already obtain many more awards than people in any comparable organisation in the United Kingdom.

I am examining how we can modify education schemes and education support for those in higher education who may be persuaded to join the Army, and for those who are already committed to the Army but who need further support. We are confident that higher recruiting, together with a range of initiatives to improve retention, will help us to achieve our aim of full staffing in the Army by around 2004.

The strategic defence review set out a new vision for the armed forces. The Army has a crucial role in that vision, which is about looking at the world we will face in future, and being ready to play our part in upholding law and democracy. The vision is about having the right equipment to be effective in any war theatre, and about having the right support to back it up.

Above all, however, it is about having the right people—people with a binding and determined ethos, with the right attitudes, the necessary skills and the essential motivation. Those are the things that matter. Those are the qualities that make our Army the best. We should never forget or underrate the commitment of those people on our behalf. They deserve the support of the House, and I hope that they receive it today.

5.11 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): It is a pleasure to debate military affairs again so soon after the two-day strategic defence review debate. I record my sincere admiration for the men and women of the British Army, their families and all the scientific and industrial civil servants and administrators who support them. I add my appreciation, too, for the growing number of dedicated contractors and suppliers, the Ministry of Defence police and the Ministry of Defence guard force.

Wherever the Army serves in the world, we are proud of it. It is in the nature of our debates that we focus on the problems of the day, and on exceptions. I do not want Army personnel of any rank to think that we do not appreciate and admire their dedicated and professional role in the defence of the United Kingdom and our way of life. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) will refer to issues including recruitment when he winds up later. I know that many hon. Members wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am grateful to the Minister for giving way so often to hon. Members on both sides. If I may say so without sounding patronising, he has learnt his trade remarkably quickly. We are grateful to him. For the avoidance of doubt, and for the sake of readers of The Spectator, I should make it clear that this is my speech, and I believe in what I am saying. I am not just reading out someone else's words or ideas.

In order to put the Army into the broadest security context, let me examine the Prime Minister's European defence policy, a policy of some confusion and contradiction. In The Times last Wednesday, he advocated a European defence identity based on the European Union. Within minutes of the end of a two-day defence debate in the House, the Prime Minister appeared to have reversed British defence policy without telling the Defence Secretary. The Labour Government have followed the previous Government's policy of basing our defence on NATO and developing a European capability in the Western European Union. The WEU has formal agreements with NATO for the use of United States assets and intelligence and NATO's planning staff.

That was the policy both at the time of Amsterdam and of our debate last week. My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), the shadow Defence Secretary, raised those points last week, and the Secretary of State made it clear that the position had not changed, by saying:

"We have a comprehensive view of the role of the European Union and the Western European Union, and the European security and defence identity of NATO . . . The challenge for the Western European Union is to take on the task that it has been given by the Amsterdam treaty and effectively to use its new powers. The challenge for the European Union is . . . to apply the common foreign and security policy . . . in Europe".—[Official Report, 19 October 1998; Vol. 317, c. 974.]

There was no mention of a defence role for the European Union.

Last Tuesday, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence said:

"Britain is playing a key role in developing NATO's new strategic concept—the alliance's own SDR—to give it an equally clear vision into the next century. We are also playing an essential role in developing an effective European security and defence identity in NATO."—[Official Report, 20 October 1998; Vol. 317, c. 1176.]

Within minutes, however, the Prime Minister had changed all that, despite what he himself had said last year at Amsterdam when he claimed victory after the Amsterdam summit. He struck out any commitment to a merger between the WEU and the EU. He said that what matters is what works, and what works for Britain and for Europe is NATO. He also said that the Franco-German plan was "like an ill-judged transplant".

Following the Balkan experience and the EU's failure in response to the disintegration of the former Yugoslavia, can we seriously believe that anything can replace NATO in Europe? The Prime Minister went last week to Pörtschach in Austria. There was no official communiqué of the informal gathering, but I have obtained a transcript of the press conference that the Prime Minister gave on 25 October. He congratulated the Austrian presidency, and said that there were three main issues. First, there was the economic situation. Next, he said:

"Secondly, in respect of common foreign and security, there was a strong willingness, which the UK obviously shares, for Europe to take a stronger foreign policy and security role. This will arise particularly because we will be appointing two people to common foreign and security positions in the European Union in the next few months so it is something that is very much on our minds but we all agreed that it was important that Europe should be able to play a better, more unified part in foreign and security policy decisions and certainly, obviously we discussed specifically Europe closer to the people, ideas for that and subsidiarity, where there was a very strong sense that we have to push on the process that was begun at Amsterdam on subsidiarity and get that implemented. As I say, I thank the Austrians very much indeed for hosting this summit and for organising it so well."

So that is all right. That is completely clear. We know what the Prime Minister achieved at that conference.

When, as at present, geopolitics is dominated by events outside Europe, and when European security is dominated by the crisis in Kosovo, it is probably not surprising that the Prime Minister is not focused on the evolution of European defence. He should be, however. The way he stumbled across the issue last week speaks volumes about the chasm in Labour's defence thinking after a generation of nuclear escapism—I make an honourable exemption for the Under-Secretary of State for Defence.

Few people doubt that what we loosely call Europe can achieve little militarily without NATO and the United States. The Eurocorps, a child of President Mitterrand and Chancellor Kohl in 1994, is paralysed by the military, philosophical and cultural differences between unlikely partners. The Secretary of State went to Portugal with other European defence Ministers in September to take a lead on Kosovo, and he was all in favour of committing ground troops. Planners could have told him that that would have required 200,000 troops, cruise missile strikes and a phased air campaign involving 400 aircraft. It would have taken a month to deliver. What really mattered was that the United States had no intention of getting ground troops involved. Europe is pretty helpless without the United States' input of heavy lift, satellite communications and intelligence.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Has my hon. Friend considered the implications for NATO of the new defence role? We are, admittedly, short of detail on that role, but what would the impact be on American and European partners who are not members of the European Union? Many of them—one in particular—would like to join the EU.

Mr. Key: Indeed I have. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing an important European dimension to the debate. The first and most practical reason why European common defence must stay with NATO is that we need the United States of America. The Prime Minister needs to think about the second reason. The 1948 treaty of Brussels led to the creation of the Western European Union. It contained absolute guarantees of collective defence. It also proposed military, political and economic dimensions among its European members.

The original WEU mandate was hijacked and divided by the emergence of NATO and the European Coal and Steel Community, which later became the European Union. The WEU lost its empire and did not find a role until the Petersburg declaration of 1992, when it abandoned competition with NATO and the EU and focused on a new, high-profile military response to crisis management: evacuations, humanitarian missions, peacekeeping and peace enforcement.

The WEU also established a role in less traditional operations such as blockade and embargo enforcement, minesweeping and police work. That is where my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) is so right. The WEU has an inclusive agenda and membership. It can embrace Sweden and Turkey, as well as 10 central European countries, as associate partners, and put them all on its decision-making permanent council. It is outward looking and has no standing or dedicated forces, but it has legal authority to put such forces together, up to and including borrowing a combined joint task force from NATO.

The treaty of Amsterdam gives the EU no direct defence competence. That role falls to the WEU, whose new prominence has been demand-led. Our Government should convince our EU partners that there is no institutional imperative to create a new defence competence in Brussels. Europe faces multifaceted, multi-directional risks and uncertainties. The world is still adjusting to the end of the cold war. When both the EU and NATO are adjusting to expansion, the European chemistry needs time to settle down in its defence and security pool.

Mr. Brazier: Does my hon. Friend agree that some of the loudest voices among our European Union partners in favour of new defence roles for the EU are those in the process of slashing their defence budgets and reducing their armed forces to almost nothing?

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is right. I shall come to the strength of individual members.

By the end of this year, NATO must agree a new strategic plan, with political consensus at each milestone. We can also expect new regional alliances to emerge. Russian instability, middle eastern uncertainty, Mediterranean tensions and the emerging threats posed by ballistic missile technology and weapons of mass destruction all point to the need for consolidation and stability in European defence and security. By all means let us think the unthinkable, but let us also always remember that NATO was never merely a convenient post-war military alliance for the defence of western Europe. NATO was created in defence of common ideas and interests and of fundamental beliefs in democracy, the rule of law, market economics and free trade. If it ain't bust, don't fix it.

There is another new and worrying development against which the Government must guard. NATO is a partnership, an equal partnership of members. Some are stronger than others, but ultimately we are all as strong as the strongest member. A European defence identity is one thing; a European voting caucus within NATO would be quite another. The United Kingdom should always give pride of place to the north Atlantic aspect of the treaty organisation.

For more than a week, it has been stormy in Wales. The weather has been unusually violent. Life-threatening flooding has caused havoc. It will surprise no one that within hours of the flooding, the civil authorities had called on the military for help. Sandbags were filled and distributed, many stranded people were rescued, and motor and other more ingenious forms transport through the floods were provided. We are grateful to the regular soldiers from Brecon and elsewhere who took part. We are also grateful to the territorials of the 2nd battalion, Royal Regiment of Wales, which did such valiant work in Merthyr vale. It will not surprise the House that the Government propose to close two of the battalion's three TA centres.

It would be comical if it were not so serious to hear Labour Ministers using some of the very words and phrases spoken by Conservative Ministers over the years. It is sad, almost embarrassing, that the Secretary of State seems to believe that he invented defence diplomacy. That term and mission have been with the Ministry of Defence since Sir John Nott introduced it in his 1982 defence White Paper. The former Armed Forces Minister spoke of the need for the Territorial Army to be relevant and usable—the exact words of the then Secretary of State, Malcolm Rifkind in his October 1993 "Framework for the Future" of the reserve forces.

For those with an interest in Britain's volunteer reserves, July 1998 gave birth to a paradox. The Secretary of State's announcement of the outcome of the SDR, including the savage cut in the TA from 59,000 to about 40,000 volunteers, means that the bulk of the TA infantry and yeomanry regiments are set to go, on the apparent grounds that they are dedicated to military defence, such as guarding key points throughout Britain or forming a reconnaissance screen against an invading force.

I was vocal in my objection to the way in which Ministers during the summer used that as a "Dad's Army" analogy. All that will have come as a surprise to the aforesaid infantry and yeomanry, who were told back in 1992 during the first TA restructuring that military home defence was no longer a significant element in their role.

It was also announced in 1992 that all TA infantry and yeomanry regiments would be redesignated as national defence, a new term recognising a changing and uncertain threat that was designed to encompass a wide spectrum of operational scenarios. The possibilities included NATO, United Nations and national operations world wide, as well as military aid to the civil authorities in the United Kingdom and, at the remote end of the scale, military home defence.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Given that 10 per cent. of our strength in Bosnia has been territorials, are the Government suggesting that the training undertaken by the Territorial Army over the past few years has been irrelevant and unuseful?

Mr. Key: I am not convinced that the Government yet know what they are proposing. I am enormously relieved to hear that the Minister has received no proposals and made no decisions yet. I want him to listen to our case. My hon. Friend is right to make his point.

Mr. Robathan: In talking about things irrelevant and useless, will my hon. Friend comment on the many interventions from perhaps naive Labour Members who say that they must fight for the 3rd Loamshires or whatever? Do they not realise that their Government are about to scrap all the infantry and yeomanry regiments and lump them into the 1st Midland Corps or whatever it might be called? Is not what Labour Members say therefore complete humbug?

Mr. Key: Perish the thought. It is right that all hon. Members should fight their corners, but Ministers must listen. I fear that down at Land Command in Wilton in my constituency, the military chiefs are having a terrible time knowing that the Minister is about to cave in to his Back Benchers with their individual interests. In the end, Land Command will have to fish around to make more savings to achieve what I might call the non-cuts that will become a political imperative by then. It may not be not humbug but realism; in the end, it will be the Army that pays.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): Does my hon. Friend agree that there will be considerable surprise outside the House at the Minister's repeated attempts to put aside concerns about the future of the Territorial Army by saying that no decisions have been taken? Setting aside geographical issues such as Berkshire's loss of a link with a TA infantry battalion, what causes most concern outside the House is the one decision that the Government have taken—the cut in the TA. That is what recently led the royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead unanimously to express its regret at the loss of the TA's contribution to national defence, and at the loss of the important core skills that the public-spirited young volunteers who join the TA gain from their experience.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is right. She has spoken valiantly for her local TA. If there is any humbug, it is that of Ministers who have pretended for a year that the SDR had nothing to do with the Treasury. We all knew that in the end, the Treasury held the purse strings in every sense.

In case no one had got the message, the principle of wider employment was reinforced in the 1994 restructuring. All units were reorganised to create a general purpose structure designed to give them flexibility of employment across the spectrum of military operations. Any remaining vestige of a link between cold-war scenarios and the role or organisation of the TA had disappeared by 1994, not 1 May 1997. The final step in the creation of a relevant and useable TA came with the passage through the House of the Reserve Forces Act 1996.

Just one week after the SDR was announced in July, 1,400 reservists from the three services and a vast array of unit and specialist equipment gathered on the Minley training area for the reserve forces experience. Ironically, the 74 units and 400 vehicles that comprised the experience were intended to show how the reserves have adapted to post-cold war circumstances.

The peace experience at Minley was designed to illustrate the wide utility of our volunteer reserves in a range of so-called peace operations. Visitors were reminded that the reserve components of the armed forces have contributed substantially to Britain's defence commitments during and since the Gulf war, as my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) reminded us. The TA has met 10 per cent. of our total commitment in Bosnia from the outset. A total of 5 per cent. of the Royal Naval Reserve is always in service with Royal Navy units. Personnel from the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the Royal Air Force Reserve have been present in the Persian Gulf continuously since the Gulf war.

It was evident that many of the capabilities on display were unique to the reserves and build on their many civilian skills. Automobile Association patrol men in Royal Military Police uniforms and British Telecom engineers with the Royal Signals provided two good examples. It was a huge success and I learned much during my visit with the shadow Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk.

That brings us back to the SDR and the future of those at Minley who created such a memorable experience. With the evidence of their adaptability and professionalism there for all to see, many territorials could not understand how anyone could argue that the cold war was over three times within six years to justify further reduction. Many of them could not understand why the total of "around 40,000" should include 3,500 members of the Officer Training Corps and 1,500 non-regular permanent staff. Neither category, however useful, is an integral element of the Army's operational force structure. When the details of the new "revitalised" Territorial Army structure are announced, those affected will seek more convincing explanations for the demise of their units than have been deployed so far.

Is it really just money? The Government have cut the defence budget quite substantially at a time when, in the United States, the defence budget is undergoing a hike of 10 per cent and when the Americans have announced a new use for the National Guard and the reserves. Press reports from Washington point out that "changes to homeland defense, the stand-up of new reserve teams to combat weapons of mass destruction and the continuance of the reserve component integration within the active force are in the cards for reservists in the next year."

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) has spoken about that eloquently already.

Charles L. Cragin, acting Assistant Secretary of Defence for reserve affairs, said that "reservists continue to re-serve around the world . . . The reserve components have a completely new role in homeland defense . . . the definition of homeland defense continues to evolve."

Cragin also said that

"Homeland defense has been under discussion for some time, because we don't really know what it constitutes in this day of asymmetrical threats . . . We know for certain that it includes responding to weapons of mass destruction . . . We know that it includes information operations and counter-intelligence operations for information warfare. It includes the air defense of the United States. We don't know how much further it goes as it relates to National Guard and Reserve involvement."

Defence Secretary William Cohen's initiatives in the area of weapons of mass destruction have raised the whole homeland defence issue. The congressionally chartered National Defence Panel agreed with him when it recommended that the reserve component play a seminal role in homeland defence. I hope that we will see similar thinking here and we look forward to hearing more about that.

In 1928 the British general staff were told that the Cabinet had decided that there would be no war for 10 years and that there was no direct threat to the United Kingdom. So the Territorial Army had no useful role overseas and no role in assisting the civil powers—it was finished. That was on the advice of experienced soldiers who had been through the first world war. They were so wrong. How can their modern equivalents be so sure today, especially with the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) as Foreign Secretary?

I agree with the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) who told us last week that the TA is our insurance against the unexpected. In the Gulf war we were almost down to our last platoon of infantry regulars. If the war had gone on another few weeks, there would have been no regulars to perform guard duty or to secure lines of communication. I believe that we should take the long view and not seek to rewrite history.

Mr. Brazier: I am so grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. My hon. Friend talked about the Americans. Is it not extraordinary that, perhaps for the first time since the House first met many hundreds of years ago, we have a Government saying that home defence does not matter at all when a country as powerful as America is saying that it is of critical and increasing importance?

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point and I must fall back on the Minister's argument, which is that he has not yet decided. I hope that the Minister will listen to my hon. Friend and to other hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber.

I shall deal now with Army training. It was Field Marshall Rommel who said:

"The best form of welfare for troops is training, as well-trained troops result in fewer widows."

In March 1997, Lieutenant General Sir Huw Pike, then deputy commander-in-chief, produced the report, "Striking a Balance 97". It deals with the management of the major Army training areas. He stressed the importance of each Army field training centre achieving its effective manageable capacity. He said that planning and management systems must take into account a huge range of factors such as the size and shape of the training area, which must be appropriate for exercises, the nature of the ground, the geology and the geomorphology. For example, one can put tanks on Salisbury plain but they sink at Otterburn. He talked about the importance of seasonal factors such as wet and dry weather, farming practices, interface with local communities, archaeology, which is very difficult on Salisbury plain, and conservation, which was a huge success for the Army on Porton Down. He mentioned the quality of public access, the risks of public access on military land and the recreational use of military training areas dealing with everything from 4x4s to falconry. An issue of particular importance to local residents is the management of noise from artillery fire. I do not know whether that is an art or a science, but the military have made huge strides in that in my constituency.

There is also virtual reality training. In June this year the world's largest battlefield simulator project was unveiled at the combined arms tactical training facility at Warminster in Wiltshire. The project cost about £180 million and will be completed by 2000. More than 400 troops at a time will fight virtual battles across a computer-generated landscape, using simulators built to look like the interiors of Challengers, Warriors and Scimitars. The simulators have been designed by Lockheed Martin and can be linked by satellite to other facilities in Germany and Texas so that British and US troops can collaborate in exercises against, for example, a computer-generated motorised rifle regiment.

The United Kingdom version is the largest, covering an area the size of two football pitches. According to managers of the combined arms tactical training centre, the aim of the project is not to replace live exercises but to complement them. Virtual reality exercises help units gain advanced knowledge of their equipment, tactics and different types of terrain and scenarios. It is a great facility.

What about live training? I shall quote liberally from the document "Striking a Balance 97", which I mentioned earlier. The deficit in training land is about 39,000 hectares. Salisbury plain training area is only 33,000 hectares. That is a deficit of about 21 per cent. of the Army's total requirements. The document states:

"These findings confirm the conclusions of successive HQ Land Command mid and end-year reports that there is a shortfall of training land which is adversely affecting operational readiness and military capability. They demonstrate that the widespread perception that the Army is over-provided with training land is not correct."

It points out that training land has come under growing pressure and that many units are finding it increasingly difficult to gain access to major training areas. That will become more of a problem once the full effects of the draw-down from Germany are felt on the training estate and the training needs of the joint rapid deployment force and the Allied Command Europe rapid reaction corps have been quantified.

Brigade headquarters have problems with all this. The development of existing facilities at Otterburn for the AS90 and multiple launch rocket system training is essential to help remedy the shortfalls in field firing training land. The enhanced use of Kirkcudbright, which has 1,800 hectares for infantry training, is essential. The report states that existing training areas need to be expanded.

All that demonstrates that there is a theoretical shortfall of about 83,000 hectares of training land in the United Kingdom. The effective shortfall is 39,000 hectares—a significant deficiency. We desperately need more training land.

On 26 June, I asked the House of Commons Library to find out what progress had been made on the Otterburn inquiry into the extension of facilities on the range in Northumberland national park. I was told that the inquiry opened in April 1997. It heard 80 witnesses before ending in October. The inspector then withdrew to write his report. I was informed that the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has powers to override the inspector's judgment if he so chooses.

On 6 July, in a parliamentary question, I asked the Secretary of State for Defence:

"what assessment he has made of the contribution to the UK national interest of training the army . . . at Otterburn."

The then Minister for the Armed Forces replied:

"I am satisfied that there remains a strong defence need".—[Official Report, 6 July 1998; Vol. 315, c. 356.]

Later in the summer, the thing unfolded. We had on 8 July the strategic defence review statement. The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, we were told, would announce his decision as quickly as possible. Then the trouble started.

On 30 July, the Government office of the north-east informed my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) that the inspector had made his report to the Secretary of State. On 14 August, the Association of Rural Communities, which is based in Otterburn, said that it had the support of the majority of local people in saying that it was more than happy for the Ministry of Defence to be there and to continue to train with weaponry capable of maintaining British and global security. It said that Otterburn had been in existence since 1912.

By 5 October, post-inquiry correspondence had been received from the Council for National Parks, the Natural History Society of Northumbria, Northumberland county council, the Ministry of Defence, the Ramblers Association, the Open Spaces Society, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, Northumberland national park authority, the Association of Rural Communities and Ponteland parish council. All those interested parties, lobbies and associations should be listened to carefully, but the final decision is not theirs. It is for Ministers to decide what is in the national interest.

On 21 September the Defence Estate Organisation wrote to the Government office of the north-east. It said:

"it remains the position that it is in the national interest for the developments proposed at Otterburn Training Area to proceed with urgency to ensure the operational readiness of the AS90 and MLRS units. . . . The proposals requiring approval from the public inquiry remain of urgent national importance."

But now, on 5 October, the whole thing appears to be open again.

The Government office of the north-east has written to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham saying:

"The new issues raised relate to the potential impact arising from the recent Strategic Defence Review."

It then listed the reasons. I must tell Ministers that, although the use of electronic training simulators and laser-guided weapons technology is welcome, there is no substitute for live firing exercises. Withdrawal of the Army from Germany has put severe pressure on our training land. The indecision over Otterburn is now compromising the Army's ability to train in two of its main weapons—the AS90 gun and the multi-launch rocket system.

To reopen the Otterburn inquiry on the grounds that the SDR has introduced new policies would set a dangerous precedent. Training is training, and if the Army cannot train it is stuffed, as one frustrated colonel put it to me last weekend. The Secretary of State must stand up for the Army. The Deputy Prime Minister, who must decide, must recognise the national interest when it stares him in the face.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for underlining the problems that we face with the development of the Otterburn training range. May I underline what he says by saying that unless we have approval by December, the ability to train troops on the

[Mr. Peter Atkinson]

AS90 will be seriously prejudiced for many months ahead? The livelihood of many of my constituents who work for the Army will also be prejudiced.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He knows the situation better than most, and he has been assiduous in representing the interests of his constituents. I agree with every word that he says.

Although so many more points could be raised, I should like to finish by remembering for a moment at this time, when so many of us are wearing red poppies, the work of the Royal British Legion. There are 6 million ex-service men in this country. There are 9 million widows, wives and dependants. Last year, some 300,000 former service men and women called upon the Royal British Legion for services—everything from hospital visits to the Royal British Legion training centre at Tidworth, which I visited a little while ago. In the next few weeks, some 300,000 voluntary collectors and organisers will be out collecting money for the poppy appeal. That is extremely important not only for the past but for the present and for the future.

I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury for reminding me of a story that I have no reason to believe is untrue. Many of us will be attending our remembrance day parades and services in a few days' time. One Member of Parliament attended his usual service and parade with the Royal British Legion and listened to the sermon. There was no mention of world war one or world war two. So the Member of Parliament said to the vicar afterwards that he was surprised at this. The vicar said, "Well, you know, it was a very long time ago. It was long before even I was born so I try to make it all a bit more relevant." The Member of Parliament replied, "So you'll be having some trouble with Christmas then!"

We have no trouble at all in honouring the memory of those who made the ultimate sacrifice. We salute the courage of the finest professional army in the world, the finest volunteer reservists and the thousands of young men and women who commit themselves to serve our country and follow the flag.

5.45 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). He and I have shared innumerable sessions on the Defence Committee and engaged in verbal sword play on those occasions. Strangely enough, we always came to a consensus because every member of the Committee, of whatever political complexion, put first and foremost the issues of defence of this country and, indeed, Europe, so I will not follow the hon. Gentleman through all his gymnastics today, but I will make one or two references to what he has said.

I want to pick up some of the points that I made last Tuesday when I was fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but was able to speak for only 10 minutes like so many others on that occasion. One is able to mention points, but not really to explore them in those circumstances. I gave a list of qualifications in order to justify my existence, but I omitted one. I did so deliberately, not knowing that I might have to make reference to it tonight.

I register the fact that I serve on the defence and security committees of both the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe Parliamentary Assembly and the North Atlantic Assembly. Indeed, I am the vice-chairman of the NAA defence and security committee. What I did not tell the House last Tuesday was that I have also been appointed to a joint working group set up to monitor and scrutinise the work of the NATO-Russia permanent joint council. [Interruption.] I can only hope that that is not an opinion on my usefulness.

The permanent joint council is a conduit for the rapid resolution of problems between NATO and the Russian Federation. The joint working group is made up of 14 people—seven from the North Atlantic Assembly and seven from the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation. Of the seven from the NAA, only two are from the United Kingdom. One is the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and the other is myself. The first meeting of the group takes place in Brussels tomorrow, and I am required to meet the Russian half of the working group at Brussels airport first thing in the morning and escort them to Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe, where they are due to meet General Wesley Clarke. I must, therefore, apologise sincerely for not being able to stay for the end of the debate. I shall have to transport myself PDQ to Brussels to prepare myself for that early appointment.

Having explained that point, I do not wish to emphasise it to enhance the regard in which the House may or may not hold me. However, as I make the comments today that I started to make last Tuesday, I want it to be borne in mind that my position with the NAA and the OSCE enables me to mix with, converse with and get into the heads of many senior politicians and defence experts in central and eastern Europe and in the Russian Federation. It also requires me to try to get into the heads of all our NATO allies of a similar grain. It is a great learning process—great in two ways: it is great, but sometimes it grates; nevertheless, one has to cope.

That point brings me to the main cause of my concern. Last week, I had no time to comment on the strategic defence review. The international response to the SDR has been quite remarkable. There is no question that, despite its shortcomings, which are inevitable, it has set a benchmark for other nations, both allied and non-allied. The speed with which it was conducted is quite remarkable, despite what Opposition Members might claim. That speed is one of the reasons why there are shortfalls in some areas. However, I emphasise that that review cannot be the be-all and end-all: the process must be on-going and continuous; it must never end. Internationally, it is acknowledged that we have made a first-class start, but we have to maintain the momentum.

On the issue of reserves, the hon. Member for Salisbury made great play of the situation in the United States and, to be honest, I have to say that he was right to do so. Last week, I made the point that if we set the level of our reserve forces at 40,000, it would mean that we had a reserve level of approximately 35 per cent. of our regular complement—a regular complement which, as the Minister acknowledged, is 5 per cent. below strength and which is being supplemented in Bosnia by a 10 per cent. terrier contribution. Therefore, overstretch might well be becoming—yet again—a problem within the regular forces; and, if we reduce our reserve forces to such an extent and if we call on them to such an extent, it could well be that overstretch will become a problem in our reserve forces.

On the military side—meaning the Army—the USA, which is one of our major allies, has, in the broadest possible terms, one for one. That means that it has a reserve complement of 100 per cent. of its regular force. The Americans say that they have greater responsibilities than we have, but I wonder whether that is true. They might have more things to worry about, but they have a bigger force with which to act and a strike capability that is stronger and heavier by far. The fact that they hold 100 per cent. in reserve simply means that they want to ensure that they can call on those resources as and when they need them.

The Americans recognise that the resources they need to be able to call on in the new crisis situations facing us at the end of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st are specialists in the sorts of activities that are currently being undertaken by the 10 per cent. that we have in Bosnia. Those activities have to be undertaken by specialists in water quality, transport, drainage, electricity generation and other services. We are not talking about pushing a jenny to the back of a building in order to do some welding, but about supplying communities with major resources, such as power. Those are the requirements and we should be building up the resources necessary to meet them, not reducing them.

That is one side of the coin—the NATO side. Let us look for a moment at the other side of the coin—the non-NATO allies who engage with us in the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly and who are associate members of NATO's Parliament. The Russians talk to us and tell us their problems. Their units used to rotate around the Soviet Union so that they did not get involved in corruption, but that no longer happens. The result is that units are becoming almost the property of local governors and regional warlords, because it is only those people who can guarantee the soldiers any sort of income. That income is usually provided on the basis of bartering: the regional authorities feed the troops, provided the troops repair transport vehicles, mend roads, or perform other services. A strange symbiosis is building between local chieftains and military units.

When we refer to reserves—to the need for reserves and the need to train them—the Russians do not understand. Most of their regular forces—or their conscripted forces, as I should say—are experienced in mending vehicles, or even in planting and picking potatoes, because those are the regular, day-to-day tasks that they are required to perform in order to feed themselves. When they hear us talking about reserves and ask for more information, they hear that the United States has one for one—100 per cent. reserves for the size of their regular force. When they realise that our reserve forces are not 100 per cent., they pose questions. It is difficult for me explain why our reserve forces are not as well equipped or as large as we would ideally like them to be.

I know that there is a problem of striking a balance between the Treasury requirements and the defence ideal. That is part of the problem. We saw yet again in the veiled menace apparent in the suggestions contained in the document that was leaked last week the possibility that regular officers of senior rank are exerting their influence over ministerial decisions, while the reserve forces are outgunned because they do not have representatives at senior level who are able to hold their corner. I am pleased to hear that the Minister has no definitive proposals and relieved that no decisions have been taken. However, I urge him to ensure the appointment of a senior staff officer to represent the interests of the terriers and the reservists.

When discussing the launchers and the royal trumpshire borderers and the like, the hon. Member for Salisbury said that it will be the Army that pays—but I have to point out that it is all one Army. The regulars and the terriers are no different other than in the nature of their commitment to society. The 10 per cent. who are in Bosnia today can die just as easily, just as quickly and just as horribly as a regular soldier who has been a member of the forces for 12 years.

We are talking about one Army, and we have to ensure that its reserve component is given a strong voice against the Regular Army's top brass. I am not denigrating or criticising the top brass—who have their job to do, like everyone else—but we have to match like with like. If Tyson can get into the ring only with other heavyweights, the terriers should, like the regulars, have senior staff officers to represent their interests in budgetary debates.

In last Tuesday's debate, I asked the Minister to consider doing for British nuclear test veterans the same as has been done for our Gulf war veterans—to review their medical condition. I realise that only one week has passed since that debate, but I should have hoped to receive some sort of formal acknowledgement that consideration might be given to that request. I shall repeat the request, in case it has slipped the Minister's mind, or perhaps never reached the notebooks of the commissars occupying the Under-Gallery.

I plead for further consideration to be given to the case of nuclear test veterans, who gave sterling service to the Crown and the country. On instruction, they put themselves at risk. They were told to bare themselves—they were virtually naked—and to roll on the ground at ground zero after various explosions. Furthermore, their service records have been bowdlerised. Many of the veterans have discovered that their records contain not a hint that they ever participated in test activities. I believe that those omissions constitute a case of deliberate neglect, and to ignore their pleas for further consideration would be quite unjustified.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): Have not the Australian Federal Government paid to their nuclear test veterans—to the men who were at Maralinga, in South Australia—the type of compensation mentioned by my hon. Friend?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, although I submit that they did not get sufficient compensation—but that is not the point. The Australian Federal Government established that principle some years ago and provided compensation.

Meanwhile, since the Federal Government of Australia came to that agreement with their veterans, our men and women—not only service veterans, but civilians, from NAAFI, for example—have been dying. Very soon, many of them will have disappeared entirely, at which point whichever Government are in power can comfortably rub their hands together and say, "That's that problem solved." However, the problem will not have been solved.

[Mr. Cook]

I also repeat my invitation to the Minister to visit HMS Kellington and its Marines, who are a type of Army—although they might object to that statement. The Kellington has Marine cadets, who are very keen to meet the Minister. I should say also that the chairman of the sea cadets has received a letter from the Ministry of Defence, offering to sell the Kellington for £12,000. The sea cadets have offered £5,000 for it.

My advice to the chairman is that he should not entertain accepting the offer from the Ministry, which is certainly not in need of a £12,000 handout that could be raised only by the cadets' regular charitable works. The cadets should not offer a penny for the Kellington, but should withdraw their £5,000 offer. The fact is that it would cost the Ministry about a quarter of a million pounds to scrap the Kellington. I have also already mentioned to the local authority that I should expect it to refuse any planning permission for the Kellington's quayside demolition. I repeat my invitation to the Minister to visit HMS Kellington, where he will receive a very warm reception. I make that invitation most hospitably—we shall not require anyone to walk the plank.

The strategic defence review is a good start. However, we have a long way to go on the review, and it has to be repeated year after year, as each new commitment is made.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Like many other hon. Members, I welcome the opportunity to have this debate—the first in almost two years—on the future of the Army. I welcome also the commitment made by the Minister that a debate on the Army, and on the other two branches of the armed forces, will be a regular feature in the House. I accept in principle his point on how such debates could be diversified, to address many of the issues that we face.

I am also delighted that the Minister has remained in the Chamber for the debate. In last Tuesday's debate, he had to leave when I started my speech. I am glad that the start of my speech today has not persuaded him that it is time to find something else to do. I put that down to "gapping"—to use the Ministry's phrase—among the ministerial team at the Ministry of Defence.

I was, nevertheless, disappointed that the Minister did not allow me to intervene in his speech on the three occasions that I attempted to do so. However, I shall offer him the opportunity to intervene in my speech to deal with the three points that I shall make, and would have made earlier in my three attempted interventions.

I should be interested to know, first, whether the Minister could tell the House what future Ministers envision for the Territorial Army. He stood back and said, "No proposals have been made to us", but I should be very interested to know what he would like to happen.

The hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) made the point that the TA does not have great clout within the Ministry. I think that he and other hon. Members are expecting the TA to gain some clout from the efforts in the House of hon. Members who have made representations on behalf of either individual units or the huge swathe of the United Kingdom—from the highlands of Scotland right down to the border—that could be bereft of TA units. It would be very interesting if the Minister came clean and told us what the ministerial team is hoping to achieve. If he does take on board all the special pleading, the policy that we saw exposed in all the documents that were leaked last week will be in tatters, and there will have to be a complete rethink of the matter. I am quite prepared to give him an opportunity to deal with that point.

The second point that really does require clarification by the Minister is on his statement on Challenger 2 tanks. If it is true that an order for transportation for those tanks—to wherever they will be needed in the United Kingdom or elsewhere in Europe—has not yet been placed, that the Army currently has no transport for those heavier tanks and that the Minister, as he told the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who raised the point, has been assured that there are plans to deal with such transport, the House is entitled to know what those plans entail. We should be told how we shall transport a tank that is too heavy to be carried on any existing transport and that is, today, ready for delivery to the British Army.

My third intervention would have been on the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) on the Gurkhas, specifically on the Gurkhas' pensions. I did not take great heart from the Minister's comment that the pensions were based on an agreement with the Nepalese Government. Many Gurkhas, both serving and retired, find it very hard to exist on their pension when they return to Nepal. I should have thought that we owe the Gurkhas just a little more, not only for their continuing service, but for the tremendous service that they have given in the past. We should do a bit more justice to their claim for an upgraded pension.

I request also that Defence Ministers put a little pressure on Home Office Ministers to consider more sympathetically the cases of retired Gurkhas who, on retirement, want to continue working in the United Kingdom. Although there are very few such people, I am currently dealing with the cases of six of them who are now employed as laundrymen by the Royal Navy. They are seeking to be re-employed, but are being told that, because they have no residential status here, they will first have to return to Nepal before re-applying to return to the United Kingdom. Once again, that is an absurd way in which to treat people who have given decades of loyal service to this country and who continue to do so. I hope that the Minister will deal with those three specific points.

Mr. Swayne: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the pertinent interventions that he would have made, but I should like to take him back to the first and ask him to comment on the difficulties facing serving officers, of whom I am one. We know the plans that Land Command has for us to implement the Government's proposals. Distasteful as they are, we are keen to get on with them in the interests of maintaining morale and efficiency. However, we now stand to have progress delayed and unpicked by a series of Back-Bench special pleadings.

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman's intervention is pertinent, but it is optimistic to believe that the unpicking is going to take place to the extent that hon. Members hope. It is obvious that the special pleading that we heard last week and today is of such magnitude that there will be no reduction in the TA. As other hon. Members said, if, at the end of the day, the reduction does not come from the TA, the whole strategic defence review will have to be rethought because the Government will have to find the hundreds of millions of pounds that they were hoping to save over the next five years. I suggest that the mess does not end with the TA, but surrounds the whole process on which we have been embarked for the past year.

Like other hon. Members, I pay tribute to serving Army personnel—men and women—and to the civilian workers who support them. Having been privileged since my return to Parliament, and in my previous existence as a Member of Parliament, to have seen our armed forces in operation all over the world—in Bosnia, Germany, Northern Ireland, Cyprus and the Falklands—I am proud to say that I enjoyed the time spent with those service units and have been mightily impressed by their attitude and dedication. The Minister was right to say that they have the right ethos and spirit for the job that they are doing.

The biggest issue facing the Army is undoubtedly that of undermanning and overstretch. The Minister was right to begin to tackle those problems in his presentation today. The Secretary of State has given a clear commitment to eradicate undermanning and to tackle overstretch. I am sure that every hon. Member and everyone in the Army and the armed forces in general welcomes that.

A glimpse of the scale of the crisis was revealed in the previous Parliament when the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) told the House of his experience, which I read in Hansard with great interest, when he visited serving soldiers in Northern Ireland. They were working 98 hours a week; they were away from their unit for 51 per cent. of the time; and they had very short gaps between tours of duty.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) was told in parliamentary answers of the deficits in some of the units of the Army. The Royal Armoured Corps is 5 per cent. under strength, the Royal Artillery Corps is 7 per cent. down, the infantry is 9 per cent. down on average and the Royal Corps of Signals is 10 per cent. down. There is even a shortage of chaplains—the Royal Army Chaplains Department is something like 6 per cent. short—although the staff officers are 3 per cent. over strength.

The Select Committee on Defence has rightly examined the problem and, in its comprehensive report, confirmed that it is significant. It admitted that it had had great difficulty in getting hold of accurate information. How can it be right that the Committee set up by the House to examine defence-related issues has difficulty in getting at the truth of undermanning and overstretch in the Army? I shall quote the report so that the Minister can take the problem on board again. It states:

"Precise and up-to-date information about the extent of overstretch is hard to come by; detailed parliamentary questions on the subject often meet with the response that information is not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost."

How can the Minister tell us that there is a problem of overstretch if the figures are not available? As the Select Committee on Defence cannot get accurate information, I should be grateful if the Minister who winds up the debate could expand on the problem of overstretch.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Perhaps I can give the hon. Gentleman an example of overstretch. My regiment, the Light Dragoons, has been in Bosnia and will be supporting its 11th squadron tour in Bosnia by June next year. Of an establishment of 398, most of whom are not married, 82 will have had their marriages dissolved over the past four years. That is an example of overstretch, and in a regiment that has been fully recruited.

Mr. Hancock: I have every sympathy with that intervention. I am sure that any hon. Member who has had any contact with any element of our armed forces will know that what the hon. Gentleman says is true not only of that unit, but of many others throughout the armed forces. It was a shame that no Minister mentioned that problem last week or today.

There is an understandable worry about whether the SDR's formation readiness cycle will prove effective in reducing overstretch. The Select Committee on Defence believes that "the proposed new cycle is at present only a paper exercise—sustaining it in practice will be a formidable challenge".

Can we be sure that the additional obligations will not disrupt that cycle? What about the tours in Northern Ireland? What will happen to the way in which men and women are trained for exercises and work in Northern Ireland? Will not there be added pressures coming from the foreign service-led initiatives about which we have been told? Quite often, emergency deployments are for battalions, not brigades. Will not the battalion that is deployed end up suffering as it does now?

We need to be able to measure the extent of the problem, which is the reason that we need to know the truth of the problem. I ask Ministers to tell us how they are going to assess overstretch, to measure the number of hours our armed forces are working and to record the length of tours of duty and the pitiful gap between tours. Without a proper assessment of the present situation, the House, our armed forces and the nation will not be able to judge the success or otherwise of the steps that the Secretary of State is now telling us he will take following the SDR. If we cannot measure, we cannot possibly be expected to judge. Surely the Minister will have to tell us a little more today about the current situation.

Of course, our Conservative colleagues have played no little part in creating the problems of overstretch. They presided over a one third reduction in our armed forces and over a cut of literally tens of billions of pounds in the defence budget.

Mr. Key: What would you have done?

Mr. Hancock: I was not in government; you were. You made the decisions, and you can hardly criticise the results of some of those decisions—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. They are not decisions that I made.

Mr. Hancock: I am sure that they were not, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise if I implied that you were personally responsible for any of those atrocious decisions. I place the blame for them firmly where it belongs—on the former Conservative Government.

The Conservative Government gave away hundreds of millions of pounds in redundancy payments while at the same time spending tens of millions of pounds trying to re-recruit people for the armed forces. We must apportion some of the blame and responsibility for overstretch and similar problems squarely on the shoulders of that Government.

I am pleased that the Government have made a commitment to full manning by 2004, but one of the major issues that we must discuss is the way in which we recruit and retain people. Part of the way to deal with the recruitment pressure that the Army is facing is to ensure that the organisation is seen to treat people better.

The equal opportunities situation in our armed forces—in the Army, as in the Navy and the Royal Air Force—is scandalous. As a result of our previous failures to tackle that issue, we have slammed the door in the face of thousands of people who would have wanted to serve, and whose skills the Army desperately needs.

Surely, now that the SDR is considering the whole of the armed forces, it is time that the Government lifted the ban that prevents gay people from serving in our armed forces. This country remains alone in the European Union with such a ban, and reform is long overdue. I hoped that the Government would have had the courage to tackle the issue.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman may know that I have a son in the forces. I meet him and his colleagues, and although I agree with the point of view that the hon. Gentleman is advancing, I must say that the general view in the forces is very much opposed to such reform. If we take account of self-determination, it might create a very real problem in the ranks if we went down that road. I want to ensure that that is part of the consideration.

Mr. Hancock: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman has made; I well remember conversations on the subject with members of the Royal Marines when I was in Jordan recently. However, many of the men also expressed sadness when their colleagues—officers and men who had given loyal service to the Royal Marines and other units—were hounded out because their sexuality had been questioned and our rules do not allow them to remain. There are two sides of the issue, but I am sure that, ultimately, it is better for us to institute the reform in the House than be forced into it by European Courts making law that would make it a right for gay people to remain in the forces.

We must also ensure that there are no iron curtains within the British armed forces for anyone—men or women. We must make people feel that they are welcome. This morning, I listened with great interest when, on the radio, I heard a Sikh lieutenant-colonel addressing the problem of being asked to try to recruit more ethnic minorities into the Army. He said that, of 14,000 officers in the British Army, only 140—1 per cent.—were of ethnic origin. That cannot be right in a country that prides itself on being a rich cocktail of a cosmopolitan, understanding community.

We owe it to everyone to do more to ensure that more people from those groups join our armed forces. We must also ensure that we give people proper opportunities when they are in the Army. Two weeks ago, I had an unpleasant conversation—in the sense that it was disappointing—with a young Army captain. He had recently been promoted captain. He had been through Sandhurst and done his time as a junior platoon leader, and now he was being promoted to captain, but his personal priority was to decide on the right time to leave the Army. He had come face to face with the promotional block—the fact that many young men like him, who had joined the Army at 19, hoping for a career well into their 40s, were starting to consider whether they could risk staying on past 30. That cannot be right. We must do more to support our service personnel in all ranks.

I have talked to Royal Marines, so I know how frustrated they are that, at junior non-commissioned officer level, they cannot be promoted. Some have spent between five and 10 years in a junior NCO rank, unable to be promoted because of the logjam. That cannot be right. It saps the morale of those men and, through them, of other members of the unit. It is a great shame to see those highly trained, efficient working individuals turned out of the service because their promotional prospects are up against a logjam. That problem is long-standing. Hon. Members need to ensure that firm action is taken.

We must also treat personnel right when they leave the service. People who have given dedicated service need to know that they will be treated fairly when that service ends. I think of two of my brothers-in-law. One recently left the Royal Navy after 20-odd years; the other left about two years ago, after 30 years' service. Both have found it extremely difficult to adapt to life on the outside. Both felt that what was on offer to them might have sounded good in financial terms, but did not deliver the opportunities in civilian life that they could have hoped for, because they had done specialised work in the services.

We must give families more support. For two years, the family of Private Jeans—a young soldier from Portsmouth who lost his life in Croatia—have tried to obtain justice for their son's tragic death. He was killed by Croatian youths while on a recreational visit to Split, and yet, in my opinion, the Ministry of Defence has not given that family all the help that they should have had to ensure that justice is done. With the help of the local newspaper in Portsmouth, the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and others who have come to the support of that family, things are starting to move in the right direction, but the Ministry of Defence should have been there from day one, supporting and helping that family in that difficult time.

The hon. Member for Stockton, North spoke about the nuclear test veterans. How right he was. If we are trying to conduct a strategic defence review with the avowed intention of putting people first, we must ensure that we start to honour some of our obligations to the people who went before, and the nuclear test veterans are a classic example.

I am proud to say that, at the cathedral in Portsmouth, we have the permanent memorial to the nuclear test veterans. What a shame it was that the Ministry of Defence would not allow any senior personnel to attend the celebrations when the stone was laid and the chair placed in the cathedral. No senior member of the British armed forces could attend, and no one from the Ministry of Defence visited on that splendid occasion. It was left to local politicians and the Church locally to organise the event, with the National Nuclear Test Veterans. However, the Minister was right to explain the enormous debt that we owe those young men, some of whom were put through the trauma of being obliged to witness not one, but six or seven nuclear explosions. Moreover, when they have challenged that, they have met a conspiracy of silence.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar) indicated dissent.

Mr. Hancock: That is true, although the Minister shakes his head. I have asked questions and written letters, and sometimes the Ministry of Defence has denied that the ships were even there, and that those people were part of the crew; and yet in my constituency, there are dozens of those people, who know one another and knew one another at the time, and they cannot all be pretending to be nuclear test veterans. There is a conspiracy against us, and there is a conspiracy not to give them justice.

If there was any semblance of decency in the Ministry of Defence or in government—not only the present Government, but Governments since the 1960s—those men and their families would have received just compensation. How it must have stuck in their throats, and the throats of other service men, last week to read in the newspaper that a woman police officer received compensation of £175,000 because she developed a permanent ear problem while on a surveillance exercise mission. Right though that was, it is pitiful that we treat our service men and women so disgracefully in comparison.

The nuclear test veterans are not the only veterans. The Gulf war veterans still struggle, as do our civilians who went to the Gulf. I have lost count of the times that I have raised with the Ministry of Defence the issue of civilians who went to the Gulf, trying to get them the same rights. We must ensure that people are given the support that they need.

Ex-service personnel deserve more recognition than the Government's proposed veterans section will offer. It will not do much more than the Royal British Legion does now. It needs to have more clout and to be assured that the Ministry will listen to what it says. I do not want a repeat of what has happened in the past.

For all the advances in technology—even the development of remote-controlled aeroplanes and tanks and virtual reality training, which we have heard about today—the Army still relies on people, as the Minister rightly recognised last week. The Army is nothing without the people who serve it. I hope that the Government will take the current opportunities to change the way in which we value Army personnel. We should not have to wait for an armed forces Bill in 2000. The Minister should act on equal opportunities now to make sure that everyone has an opportunity to serve.

We need answers to questions about the Territorial Army units. We do not want a garage sale of TA assets. There is already speculation that the TA's prime city centre site in Portsmouth will be sold for redevelopment. The unit is still meeting there and there are still advertisements on the tube asking people to join the TA. We should put a caveat underneath, saying that it comes with a health risk, because anyone who joins may not be in the TA for long.

We need clear targets and clear knowledge of what the Government expect of the British Army. We need measures on overstretch now. We should never again have to hear of British soldiers working a 98-hour week in peace time. We should treat our ex-service personnel with more respect. If we do not do that, debates such as today's will be repeated year after year. The SDR gave us the opportunity to do a lot more for the men and women who serve the armed forces of this country and the civilians who back them. I had hoped that the Government would have taken the opportunity gladly and delivered more commitment to them than we have seen so far.

Mr. Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough): I am delighted to be able to participate in this evening's debate on the Army. I was not called to speak in last week's debate on the strategic defence review, so I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Government on the SDR. It has been well received by our armed forces and our allies, as well as by the defence industry in general.

However, I should like to confine most of my comments to one proposal being considered as part of the SDR, which relates specifically to the Army and was raised in last week's debate by my hon. Friends the Members for City of York (Mr. Bayley) and for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook)—the proposal to combine the Land Command second division, which currently has its headquarters in York, with its Scottish division, which has its headquarters in Edinburgh, to create a new Land Command division with troops in both Scotland and the north of England.

Last week, the Minister for the Armed Forces told the House that he will shortly be deciding whether the merger should go ahead and whether the intended headquarters should be in York or Edinburgh. As a Member for a South Yorkshire constituency, I believe that there are many compelling reasons for the decision—if the choice has to be made—to come down in favour of York.

Dr. Godman: May I point out briefly to my hon. Friend that many of us in Scotland believe that there are compelling reasons why the headquarters should be located in Edinburgh? I am not referring to the Scottish National party's avowed intention of creating a Scottish Army. I am saying that the British Army headquarters in this case should be in Edinburgh.

Mr. Ennis: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I hope that he will explain later in the debate why he thinks that the headquarters should be in Edinburgh.

From a military perspective, 80 per cent. of the regular soldiers in the combined division would be based in the north of England, with only 20 per cent. in Scotland. All hon. Members must be aware that the north of England is the British Army's core recruiting area, supplying 39 per cent. of all recruits, compared with only 12 per cent. coming from Scotland. My two home towns of Barnsley and Doncaster have strong traditions as fertile recruiting grounds for all the armed forces, particularly the Army.

[Mr. Ennis]

The Duke of Wellington's regiment is the only organisation that currently enjoys the honour of the freedom of the borough of Barnsley.

Mr. Blunt: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not want to mislead the House. The 13th/18th Royal Hussars and their successors, the Light Dragoons, also enjoy the freedom of Barnsley.

Mr. Ennis: I stand corrected on that point.

The Army must retain a major military headquarters in the north of England, which provides far more of its manpower than any other UK region. That presence will be even more important when the Territorial Army is restructured. There are 11,600 regular soldiers stationed in the north of England, but the region has only one major-general. Scotland has only 2,950 regular soldiers, but has two major-generals. The north of England's only general would be lost if the new division's headquarters were based in Edinburgh.

From an economic perspective, Yorkshire has lost 45 per cent. of its Ministry of Defence civilian staff over the past six years, while Scotland has lost just 23 per cent. Yorkshire has only 3,300 Ministry of Defence civilian staff, while Scotland has 9,500.

Finally, from a political perspective, the previous Minister for the Armed Forces, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) received a petition to retain the headquarters in York, signed by 24 lord mayors and mayors from throughout the north of England. That has been supported by written representations from many north of England regimental associations. When my hon. Friend makes his choice, I know that his decision will be based solely on what is best for the defence of the UK, north and south of the border—and rightly so. The ideal solution to the problem would be to establish the new command headquarters in York, but retain a major-general in Edinburgh to command the troops, as well as for other ceremonial purposes. I understand that the Ministry has already agreed a similar arrangement for London, which will retain its major-general even though it does not have enough soldiers to form a division.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take cognisance of my points, as well as the many other related points that my hon. Friends the Members for City of York and for Stockton, North raised on the issue in last week's debate on the SDR.

6.37 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): I am grateful to have been called to participate in the debate. It is particularly appropriate for me to follow the hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Mr. Ennis), because I should like to cover some of the same ground.

I pay tribute to the armed forces in my constituency. Those at Dishforth and Topcliffe barracks are particularly relevant to the debate, but I also pay tribute to the volunteers in the Territorial Army and my constituents who work at York barracks in the constituency of the City of York. I should also like to mention the contribution made by RAF Leeming and RAF Linton.

With regard to the proposed closure of York barracks, I should like to make the case for retaining a two-star command headquarters at Imphal in the City of York—the neighbouring constituency to mine. The implications for employment nationally and locally are compelling. At national level, the military staff leaving the barracks will be redeployed elsewhere in the country. The implications for local employment and the local economy are severe. Following relocation of the second division headquarters, civilian employees—the locally based labour force who commute from the Vale of York—will become unemployed, causing serious repercussions. They will probably have difficulty finding non-defence industry employment. Their loss of spending power will damage the local economy, and loss of revenue to shops and businesses in the Vale of York will be very serious.

Although it is true that the Vale of York is primarily a rural constituency, 30 per cent. of the population reside in areas in the city of York such as Haxby, Wigginton, Poppleton, New Earswick, Clifton Moor, Clifton Without and Rawcliffe. Many of my constituents work in York barracks or benefit, through shops and businesses, from the spending power of those who do. The total annual fall in local income in direct, indirect and induced losses in the wider York area following relocation of the second division headquarters is estimated to be £7.2 million at today's prices. It is clearly difficult to calculate exactly what percentage of that income would have been spent in the Vale of York. Of the total of 294 job losses, a substantial number will undoubtedly be lost among constituents in the Vale of York. Although the city of York may be compensated in part by income from alternative uses of the site, such benefit will not accrue in the Vale of York in the long term.

From a defence, operations and capability perspective, I am concerned that the Land Command will be too removed from the area it serves, as the hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough pointed out. I remind the House that, until quite recently—eight to 10 years ago—the command headquarters was based at Colchester barracks in East Anglia. Moving it again must put into question its effectiveness and hands-on control. If it is to be moved to an even more remote location—we do not yet know where—such effectiveness would be put at even greater risk.

Of further concern to operations and back-up in the Regular Army must be cuts in the Territorial Army, to which other hon. Members have referred. Let us be clear, the cuts have nothing to do with modernisation of the armed forces or improvement of their operability. The changes proposed amount to direct cuts in services that are needed to meet the commitments of front-line Army operations. Hon. Members would appreciate the Minister coming clean on that point.

I should like to pay tribute to the role that the TA plays in the armed forces. The tradition of the Territorial Army is highly and widely regarded in the Vale of York. Many of my constituents have served and continue to serve the local area and the country in the TA, of which we are extremely proud. I seek an assurance from the Minister that the future role of the TA in the Vale of York, North Yorkshire and the country generally will be secured.

I hope that the Minister accepts that cuts to the TA are shortsighted and regrettable. They will reduce adaptability in the face of future threats, especially in dealing with the unexpected. I hope that the Minister, his Department and the Government will reconsider the level of proposed cuts. Can he really tell the House, hand on his heart, that the proposal for 40,000 volunteer established reserves in the TA is sufficient to meet all future commitments?

Mr. Swayne: There has been considerable talk about overstretch. There is already overstretch in the Territorial Army. The TA is tasked largely with carrying the entire "Keeping the Army in the Public Eye" programme, running the executive stretches and business challenges. Soldiers in the squadron in my constituency are out every weekend. They are already overstretched. How we are to carry that load, with all its implications for recruitment, I cannot understand.

Miss McIntosh: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. The problem of undermanning and overstretch is one that we can all understand. Why then target the one sector—the TA and other armed forces reserves—that is capable of meeting any future unpredictable overstretch or undermanning?

Those who live in Vale of York are concerned about the decision to bring the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations boundaries into line with the new regional command structure. Although it might at first sight seem sensible, I wonder how the proposal will operate in practice. According to the Defence Committee's report, merging the north-eastern and Yorkshire TAVRAs will simply not work. The area covered will stretch from Berwick-upon-Tweed to north Lincolnshire. That is simply too large an area in which reasonably to expect the maintenance of a local presence. How, in practice, will an already undermanned and overstretched TA meet its commitments within the new boundaries?

I should like to end on a local note. The Duchess of Kent's military hospital in Catterick, in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), the Leader of the Opposition, has provided years of medical care—primarily to constituents of my right hon. Friend, although some of mine have been treated there, too. Since the hospital will no longer be available to treat civilian patients, they will have to be treated at national health service hospitals. The extra burden placed on those NHS hospitals is calculated by the local hospital trust—this is a conservative estimate—to be £500,000 a year. Do the Minister and his Government consider it appropriate that that shortfall should be met by the defence budget? Could he possibly raise that this week with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so that the Chancellor may include details of the necessary arrangements in his statement next week?

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): I am grateful that, as we approach Remembrance Sunday, we should have this opportunity to reflect on the past achievements of the Army and to think about their future role, so that we can ensure that our security considerations and obligations at home and abroad are adequately catered for in the months and years ahead. This debate gives us an opportunity to remember the very difficult roles that we expect our troops to perform around the globe. They have faced tremendous risks during the troubles in Northern Ireland and made extraordinary efforts in Bosnia in quite appalling conditions. They are stationed in Cyprus and, at this very moment in Belize, 700 troops are preparing to face the wrath of hurricane Mitch. In addition, many others are on attachments and missions around the world.

Our Army has a tremendous and proud history which has earned it respect and admiration around the globe—but times are changing. It is surely clear that, today, we need an Army that is capable of responding to new challenges. That is why we must welcome the concept of jointery, and the better co-ordination of all three services that will result from the strategic defence review. It is why we should support the principle of two combat divisions, and the proposals that the Minister has already described to put our brigades on a cycle of training and high readiness for deployment that will enable them to meet the demands that we make on them.

We need to recognise both how overstretched the Army has become, and the dangers that still exist, while acknowledging the Government's efforts to address them. Conservatives are sometimes tempted to claim a monopoly in patriotism and in support for our forces—but I wonder how a party that left our Army so under-resourced, and under strength to the tune of 5,000 personnel, can hold its head up. With its track record, how on earth does the Conservative party dare accuse any of us of humbug?

I see that the chief accuser, the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), is off causing mischief elsewhere; his was a short contribution to the debate.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): As the hon. Gentleman has made that challenge, and to give him time to get back to his text, may I tell him that it is easy for the Conservative party to hold up its head over its record on defence because, throughout the cold war, when the Labour party and three quarters of its parliamentary representatives wanted us to get rid of our strategic nuclear deterrent in a one-sided way, the Conservative party, alone of the three main parties in the House, stood up for the nuclear deterrent, backed NATO and saw off the threat from the Soviet Union?

Mr. McCabe: I am grateful for that intervention, but I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that what I am interested in is a broad-based British Army under the control of the Government, owing allegiance to the Queen; I am not interested in the military wing of the Conservative party. To be against nuclear destruction does not mean that one lacks patriotism or a concern for defence.

As I said, I welcome our new priorities for conflict—[Laughter.] I obviously lost the thread of that part of my text, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I had better start again. I welcome our new priorities for conflict prevention and defence diplomacy, and I am mindful of the comments by the Chief of the Defence Staff, who said that our reform of the military "gives us a stability that we haven't had before and will be very well received by the Servicemen and Servicewomen who are currently serving".

Change can be painful. I am aware that there is some concern about the proposed reduction in the Airborne Brigade, but surely what we want is a functional Army, not forces that live solely on past achievements. If the last major parachute combat drop was in Suez back in 1956, a good case can be made for restructuring, even where there are long and proud traditions.

[Mr. McCabe]

I acknowledge that there must be changes in the Territorial Army as our priorities shift. I support the idea of improving the deployability and usability of our TA reserves. We also need to find out why 30 per cent. of TA recruits leave within a year of joining, and what can be done to improve that position.

I hope that it is made abundantly clear that our aim is to reform the Territorial Army, and that there is no question of easing it out of existence. [Interruption.] I think that the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) did not hear me, so I am happy to repeat what I said. I hope that we can make it abundantly clear that our aim is to reform the TA, not to ease it out of existence.

Mr. Gray rose—

Mr. McCabe: I know that the idea attracts criticism, both within the regular Army and from other quarters. One of the problems is that some of the Territorial Army's supporters can at times be more obsessed with tradition than with functional use. None the less, it has a valuable role to play. Its efforts in Bosnia have been outstanding, and I know of the rich range of skills that its members possess and the value that they add to so many areas of life, because of my own contacts with the 5th (Warwickshire) battalion of the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers. Now it is my turn to get in a plug for my own Territorial Army outfit, although in fairness I must confess that it is based in the neighbouring constituency of the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCabe: By all means.

Mr. Gray: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for repeating his earlier comments, but it was not that I had failed to hear them; it was simply that I could hardly credit my ears. Apparently he believes that a reduction from 59,000 active members of the Territorial Army to what, if we remove the officer training corps, and with the removal of virtually all the infantry and yeomanry, is effectively 37,000, is something other than doing away with that part of the Territorial Army. I am grateful to him for his support of his local regiment—but it will disappear.

Mr. McCabe: I simply repeat the point that I was making, that we must look at the functional use. Tradition is important, but it does not deal with defence.

I should like to see more imaginative use made of the Territorial Army. It could have a clear role in supporting local authorities during emergencies and disasters—[Interruption.] With respect, the Army is not engaged solely in defence, vital though that may be.

We should also think about whether the Territorial Army could have a role to play in the new deal, especially with the environmental task force. I wonder whether there is a prospect of considering some kind of voluntary national service, in which young unemployed people could train to acquire new skills to enable them to help both locally and, perhaps, abroad. We must stop thinking about the Territorial Army as it existed in the past.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) rose—

Mr. McCabe: No, thank you.

We must stop adhering solely to previous traditions. We have to think about functional use for the future.

As I said earlier, I welcome the Government's reforms, and there are areas in which there may be scope for further reform. I wonder whether, at the end of the cold war, we can really justify continuing to station one quarter of our army on the continent. I have doubts as to the value of that.

It is also important to think about personnel arrangements in the Army. Other hon. Members have said that it is important to equip the Army properly, but it is the quality of the personnel that gives our forces their strength, and we must ensure that the pay and conditions of service reflect their high value and the high esteem in which we hold them. I also hope that we will tackle the issues that other hon. Members have raised about the plight of veterans.

We need to deal with other aspects of life in the Army. I welcome the proposals to increase the number of posts available to women, and to set new targets to boost recruitment for our country's ethnic minorities. I want to see an Army that genuinely reflects British society. That has to mean more women and more members of ethnic minorities at all levels. In particular, as the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) said, it must mean an end to the situation in which the officer corps is largely confined to white men from a particular class and stratum of society. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South gave the figures earlier. Hon. Members may choose to say that what I say is not true, but the figures are there.

I would like to see an end to the horrendous bullying and brutality to which some recruits are subjected. All of us must have been appalled at the murder of the young Danish tour guide in Cyprus by British soldiers, and by the occasional loutish and brutish behaviour of British soldiers in Ayia Napa, which is more reminiscent of the behaviour of football hooligans than British Army personnel. Such behaviour disfigures our Army and undermines the wonderful efforts of our soldiers around the globe. Let us make sure that, in future, there is no place for racism, other forms of discrimination, bullying or thuggery in our forces.

As we approach Remembrance Sunday, I want to remember the good things that our forces do, and have done, and the tremendous sacrifices that they have made. I want to look forward to a modern, efficient Army that reflects our society and plays a major peacekeeping and crisis-management role wherever it is needed. Finally, I should like to see a Regular Army that can be supported and reinforced by TA reserves whose effort and commitment are properly recognised. However, it must be a TA that is based on modern requirements. There is no point in nostalgically looking at what used to be.

7 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) got so confused reading out his speech that he almost did not appear to have written it. I have recently been with the Army on the armed forces parliamentary scheme with two Labour Members—the hon. Members for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw) and for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow)—and my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young). The purpose of the scheme is to ensure that those who have had too little contact with the Army in the past spend some time with the Army at the sharp end and understand what the Army is all about. The hon. Member for Hall Green might like to get in touch with the former Member of Parliament Sir Neil Thorne and volunteer to join the scheme next year. He would then understand the staggering ignorance that he has displayed this evening.

Mr. McCabe: First, I would be more than happy to join the scheme, but I am currently busy with the West Midlands police parliamentary liaison scheme, which teaches the same sort of thing. There is a limit on my time, as there is on that of most hon. Members. Secondly, it is dangerous and arrogant of the hon. Gentleman to assume that I know nothing about the Army, or to dare to suggest that my words are not my own.

Mr. Hawkins: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman wrote his speech, even though he got confused in reading out a lot of it.

There is a memory loss among some Labour Members in relation to the cold war, as my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) made clear in an earlier intervention. Labour Members have suggested repeatedly that the previous Conservative Government were mistaken in making the changes in "Options for Change" and "Front Line First" without apparently understanding that it was absolutely necessary to recast our armed forces in light of the collapse of the Warsaw pact. We are criticising the Government's suggestion in the strategic defence review that huge further cuts are needed, especially in our reserve forces.

I am staggered that Labour Members such as the hon. Member for Hall Green should suggest that there could be scope for even further cuts, and that there is a need to damage further the traditions of the armed forces. It is clear to those of us who have spent time with the forces, who come from services families or who, like me, have sons who are cadets, that morale is crucial to recruitment and retention. I hope that the Minister will concede that when he winds up. The cap badge traditions are vital to morale, and the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that the traditions of the British Army can be carelessly tossed away is staggeringly complacent. I hope that, on reflection, he will realise—as he will if he reads the excellent Defence Committee report in response to the strategic defence review—that his views were sadly misconceived.

I want to refer briefly to some constituency issues. I must apologise to my hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench and to the Minister for the fact that a long-standing commitment means that I will not be present to hear the winding up speeches. However, my constituency concerns go much wider than purely parochial matters.

As the Minister understands, anyone who cares about the British Army is concerned about what happens in Camberley. The Minister will be aware that I have referred to the issue a number of times at Defence questions in the past 18 months. It is not acceptable for Ministers to give both oral and written answers in which they tell my constituents that they will be able to announce what will happen to the staff college buildings in Camberley "shortly", but still—after 18 months—not to give an answer.

I hear that there is now a prospect that the joint doctrine centre may go into the staff college buildings. I hope that, at long last, the Minister will be able to confirm whether that is the case. If he is not able to say so tonight, perhaps he or one of his right hon. Friends would confirm that in writing. My constituents are concerned that that important listed building is being allowed to stay empty and unused. It is important that a proper, high-profile military use is found for it.

I want to hear from the Minister about the future of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency and the disposals that are anticipated in relation to DERA land. Once again, if he cannot deal with that matter tonight, I hope that he will write to me subsequently.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne)—in a brief intervention during the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh)—referred to the crucial role of the Territorial Army in terms of keeping the Army in the public eye. Those of us who have spent time with the armed forces know that everybody in the TA is well aware of the vital role they fulfil in terms of making the public aware of the forces. I realise that the present Labour Cabinet may be the first Cabinet ever not to have a single member with service in the armed forces, but I have no doubt that all Ministers are aware of the TA's vital role in keeping the Army in the public eye. If the TA changes—and if the Government's proposals in the strategic defence review are carried out—it will be much more difficult for it to perform that role.

The Government's proposals suggest that the TA might exist only in our major cities and will not have a national geographical "footprint", as it is called. The suggestion is that it will not be visible in rural and suburban areas, and that is a damaging prospect. I heard on the grapevine that one of the TA units earmarked for possible closure and disposal of its site is in Camberley, and that is extremely worrying for my constituents. I hope that, on reflection—and once all the consultations are in—the Government will decide to reverse their damaging proposals for a severe cut in the TA, as announced in the strategic defence review.

The fitness of the private soldier is also important for recruitment, retention and morale. The couch potato culture that sadly exists among many of our teenagers became evident during our visit to the Army training regiment in Pirbright, next door to my constituency. Much longer training periods are required and the training regiment even has remedial platoons because so many young soldiers cannot attain the relatively modest initial fitness levels. The Minister knows that that has a serious effect on training. The health of recruits is vital. Sadly, there have been a number of tragedies recently during training, which concerns the Minister as it should concern every hon. Member. I hope that we can ensure more fitness training and a gradual improvement in the standard of recruit fitness, which will help to prevent such tragedies.

The Minister will want to work closely with colleagues in the Department of Culture, Media and Sport, but they made a catastrophic error when they allowed their colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment to remove sport from the core national curriculum. Only with sport in the core curriculum, as it was under the previous Government, can we ensure that tomorrow's recruits are of the required fitness standard, which is vital if we are to develop the sort of young soldiers that we need for the future.

Finally, I hope that what was undoubtedly a Treasury-led, rather than a foreign policy-led, strategic defence review, with many of the deals that were struck behind closed doors based on flogging off Territorial Army centres, will be reconsidered. I hope that we will have an opportunity to build the sort of Army that we need for the 21st century, not the sort that is based on cuts to do a deal with the Treasury.

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins). Obviously, the parliamentary scheme has taught him to make a tactical withdrawal at the first sign of fire, as he moved from Blackpool, South to the relative safety of Surrey before May 1997.

I have much in common with the hon. Gentleman and would like to add to his comments about fitness levels. As he knows, we share many views on the importance of sport to our nation, in particular for young people. I am delighted that, as from 1 October, we have ended—hopefully—the sale of school playing fields. We lost so many under the Conservative Government and that contributed greatly to the present level of unfitness.

I am relieved that my hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Mr. Ennis) and for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) have withdrawn. They gave us Edinburgh versus York and, as the hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough, is rather large and was sitting next to me, he convinced me that York is a sensible place for the relocation when it happens.

I have no direct experience of the armed forces, although there is a Territorial Army base in my constituency and I was a member of the local authority there when large cuts were made in Leicestershire and the Charnwood borough under the previous Administration. We lost an airfield, a military base in Melton, the pay office in Wigston and a signals base in Charnwood. Cuts are not new and our armed forces have always been the subject of redistribution and change.

I have no family history in the armed forces, although my grandfather served in the first world war, but I am pleased to take part in this debate. Usually there is much cross-party consensus in such debates and it was a shame that some of that was destroyed today by the contribution of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath. People often see us shouting across the Chamber at each other and it is important that on occasions like this we can have a sensible and rational debate about the future of our armed forces.

The Minister will be pleased to know that I am not here to lobby on behalf of the TA base in my constituency, although I am confident that the newly refurbished base, which cost £1.2 million between 18 months and two years ago, will be saved. I am confident that one would not want to waste such recently expended public money by closing it down and I understand that there are no proposals to do so.

As with other organisations, the Army is people based and I am glad to say that the language in the strategic defence review reflected that. We have heard much about the people's this and the people's that in the past 18 months and Conservative Members may be a little tired of hearing it, but I want to concentrate on the people-based armed forces that we need. I admit that I do not have great knowledge of the armed forces, but my experience as an outsider—seeing what is going wrong with the recruitment and retention of the next generation—may help a little. Those looking in from the outside recognise the great reputation and tradition of our armed forces. Everyone recognises the need for the cap badge mentality. People in the Army are proud of their traditions and their regimental flags. Their history is part of the tradition of the regiment and it is important that even Labour Members should recognise that.

People throughout the world recognise the tremendous reputation of our armed forces. We often say that our troops are some of the best in the world and perhaps it is true. Despite American bravado—too often evident on the international scene—about American troops being the best, our troops far outstrip them and I think that we can honestly say that they are the best. That is due to the fact that they are highly skilled, motivated and professional. However, we must recognise the importance not merely of front-line troops but of all those in the background, including those in support and logistics and civilians working in the Ministry of Defence.

I want to ensure that we not only demonstrate the sort of career that the armed forces can offer, but concentrate on the way in which the forces have treated people. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) mentioned one reason why people may be fearful to join the armed forces—the way in which we have treated our Gulf war veterans and those who suffered because of nuclear tests. Some of my constituents have Gulf War syndrome, or whatever we have decided to call it. I urge the Minister to do everything possible to establish what illnesses are a result of that syndrome. So many questions still need to be answered. I urge him to outline what resources are being committed to the studies. Are they totally and genuinely open to scrutiny? What is the timetable for responses? I hope that it will be some time in the new year.

Our Army is people-based. Competition in the open labour market is considerable. What do the armed forces offer people compared with the other opportunities placed before them at the job centre? What can the Army uniquely offer individuals? We need to listen to the reasons why people are not joining the armed forces. It is not merely a knee-jerk reaction. We must genuinely understand the blocks that prevent the ordinary people whom we need to recruit from joining. There is no quick-fix solution, and nothing that has been said this evening will change that. A long-term commitment must be made. We all understand the figures; we know about overstretch and the idea that members of the armed forces are overworked.

We must ensure that joining the armed forces is a viable option not only for individuals but for their families, particularly in terms of welfare and education. The strategic defence review included initiatives for the coming years, but we need to move quickly. I was pleased by the inclusion of education and the key role given to lifelong learning—we must recognise the importance of vocational and academic qualifications. When I have spoken to people in the armed forces, I have been impressed by their skills and the level of vocational qualifications that they have attained, which should be marketable in the open labour market when they decide to leave the forces.

I make a plea—I recognise that we may not be able to solve this problem in the short term—for those of my constituents who have left the armed forces with good qualifications and who may be confident in themselves, but who lack the ability to make the transition back into civilian life. We do not want to encourage too many people to leave, but we must recognise that many find the transition difficult. People also fear that they will become trapped in the forces and may not be able to move on. I want the forces to be able to retain people with skills, but we must do something to make the transition out of the forces easier.

Another problem, which I have discovered from talking to constituents who, for one reason or another, have not joined the Army, is the perception of the attitudes that are held in the forces. We have heard this evening about racism and sexism and the question of homosexuals in the forces. I find it frightening that, out of 14,000 officers, only 140 are from our black and Asian communities. In Loughborough, the TA has been reasonably successful in recruiting people from those communities, but it has been a small trickle. About 6,000 or 7,000 people from the ethnic minorities live within a mile or so of the TA base in Loughborough, yet we see only a handful of black and Asian faces in the organisation. We have a long way to go in increasing confidence among members of the ethnic minorities, so that they feel safe in the armed forces.

I should also mention sexism and the way in which we deal with the issue of homosexuals in the armed forces. I was slightly disturbed to hear the argument that, because of homophobia, members of the armed forces do not want homosexuals to join. We should recognise that, throughout history, homosexuals have played an important role in the armed forces but have been forced to keep their sexuality quiet.

Mr. Gray: This touchy-feely stuff is all very well, but does not the hon. Gentleman remember that the soldier's primary job is to close with the Queen's enemies and kill them? The hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) may laugh, but that is the soldier's primary role. The best people to recruit to the Army are not necessarily those who reflect society in Britain today but those who will be qualified to close with the enemy and to kill him.

Mr. Reed: I am not sure which people the hon. Gentleman is suggesting are not able to do that job. Many black and Asian people played a vital role fighting for our nation in the second world war, and many homosexual individuals died in that war. I have no truck with his argument—people from those groups can serve happily in the armed forces, and it is plainly wrong to suggest otherwise.

Sexism is still a problem, as, for young individuals, is bullying. Conservative Members may talk about touchy-feely stuff, but it is not Labour Members who go on bonding weekends. Conservative Members spend much more time at weekends touching and feeling one another than we do, perhaps because the Opposition Benches are not sufficiently full—Conservative Members cannot touch and feel one another during the week, so they feel that they have to go away at weekends to do so. The Labour Benches are always so full that the touchy-feely stuff comes day after day—[Interruption.] Well, on most occasions.

We must take major strides if the armed forces are to be ready for the 21st century. I agree that that entails our having a killing machine—call it what one will—but other skills are required as, for most of the time, the armed forces are involved in peacekeeping missions around the world. The armed forces must reflect society—if they exist to protect society, they must represent it. It would be dangerous if, in this multicultural Britain, only a thin strata of society fought at the front.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider all aspects of recruitment and retention, to improve what the job offers and the facilities available for families and the education of children. We must put at the forefront the needs of the armed forces, but we must also ensure that families feel part of the forces. As Members of Parliament, we are only too aware of families being torn apart—it happens to us weekly—but the way in which the armed forces treat the family, which can play an important supportive role, is sometimes wholly wrong.

We must ensure that there is zero tolerance of racism and sexism and that the armed forces are ready to face the challenges of the 21st century. We must be supportive, especially to the cadet movement, which is extremely strong in my constituency, as that will encourage people to be ready and motivated to join the armed forces.

This debate is not only about the TA; the problems are much deeper than some of us want to recognise. The Army is not an attractive option for many young people leaving schools, and the challenges exist for us all, not only for the ministerial team. As has been said, we are advocates for the armed forces in our constituencies, and we must make them an attractive option for future generations.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), as I want to deal with a number of the issues that he raised, including the ethos of the Army, and the difficulties that arise for it in dealing with women and homosexuals.

First, I should declare an interest. I was a regular soldier for 12 years, and my father was a regular soldier for his whole career, as were both my grandfathers—by background, I am soaked in the Army. I hope that what I say will reflect some instinctive understanding of an institution of which I am immensely proud and which I am desperate to protect—I am anxious that it should not be damaged by any Administration.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Should not the hon. Gentleman declare a further interest? He was a special adviser to the Conservative Government who imposed some of the biggest cuts on our armed forces in their entire history.

Mr. Blunt: I hope that the hon. Gentleman has noticed that the cold war came to an end during the Conservatives' time in office. It would be totally indefensible to expect defence expenditure now to be about £33 billion, which is what it would be if it consumed the same proportion of gross domestic product that it did during the cold war.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): My recollection of that period is that Labour Members barracked us for a peace dividend to be yielded at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Blunt: My right hon. Friend makes the point with the utmost eloquence.

Let me correct the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) further: I began my time as a special adviser to the Ministry of Defence in February 1993, and very shortly after that, we started adding back battalions and regiments of armoured reconnaissance to make up for some of the cuts following "Options for Change", which, at the edges, made judgments that were wrong, especially on infantry numbers and the amount of armoured reconnaissance. I am happy to concede that the strategic defence review has taken the process further, and made further welcome adjustments.

Mr. Hawkins: On the peace dividend from the end of the cold war, does my hon. Friend agree that the main reason for the collapse of the Warsaw pact was the resolve shown by a Conservative Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, and United States President Ronald Reagan, and that, had the policies then and for many years advocated by Labour been followed, the Warsaw pact would probably be alive and well today?

Mr. Blunt: I wholly agree.

European defence should have been debated a week ago, when we discussed the strategic defence review. At 4.30 pm last Tuesday, when many hon. Members were debating the review, the Prime Minister was briefing journalists, including Mr. Philip Webster of The Times, on a major European Union defence initiative that he intended to float past fellow Heads of Government at Pörtschach.

Yesterday, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) told us of Chancellor Schröder's reaction to the proposals, but the House has not heard the proposals themselves. I made that point to the enforcer, the Minister for the Cabinet Office, and asked whether it was a proper co-ordination of policy across Government that the Prime Minister should be briefing journalists on a major defence policy in Europe, with the Defence Ministers then in the House seemingly in ignorance of the proposals. I had a most interesting reply. He told me that the Prime Minister was not briefing Philip Webster.

When I wrote to the Minister for the Cabinet Office to ask him to correct the facts in the House, he replied:

"the Prime Minister was interviewed on the record by UK and European journalists, including Philip Webster . . . The interview covered ideas that might be considered with EU partners with a view to more effective defence co-operation. But, as I reflected in my reply, there was no question, as you alleged, of the Prime Minister briefing either Philip Webster or other journalists on a 'major revision to defence policy'."

There we have the answer. When is a briefing not a briefing? When it is an interview on the record. It remains a disgrace that no Minister has made a statement in the House about the proposals.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): It was indeed discourteous of the Prime Minister to have talked about a European dimension for defence while we were debating the review in the House. It has long been Liberal Democrat policy that there should be a European dimension to our defence. The hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) made a lot of comments about how the Government are dealing with the issue, but how do the Tories want to deal with it? Are they interested in a European dimension or not?

Mr. Blunt: Those points would be better put to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), who speaks for the party, but I am grateful for the hon. Lady's support, and I hope that she will sign my early-day motion condemning the Prime Minister's actions, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) has already done. I do not have time to answer her question.

Mr. Brooke: Does my hon. Friend recall that, in the early 1950s, the decision by Sir Anthony Eden to commit four divisions to the British Army on the Rhine was taken specifically in support of a European defence agreement that then failed to get through the French Assembly?

Mr. Blunt: Indeed. Conservative Administrations since the second world war have a proud record of supporting European defence since 1949 through the institution of NATO. As the Minister will no doubt remind us, the late Ernest Bevin's greatest achievement was helping to found the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

I thoroughly welcome the fact that the Government put people at the centre of the strategic defence review. The supporting essay on people quotes a member of the armed forces, I imagine, who said:

"If we don't look at personnel issues then the SDR will fail."

I wholly agree with Defence Ministers, and with the lady or gentleman who said that. I welcome this evening's news about recruiting figures, but that is the easiest part of putting overstretch right, because one can put a great deal of money into advertising campaigns and building up the recruiting structure. Retention, however, is equally, if not more, important.

The Army is the service most affected by undermanning, and the review must address the problem. I am afraid that the people measures set out in the review to try to improve retention are, frankly, pretty small beer. The review recognises the importance of the challenge. It says:

"They also understand that personnel policy alone cannot resolve the imbalances between wider Defence Policy, commitments and resources . . . If some of the proposals in our Policy for People seem modest it is only because we have promised what we can deliver. Addressing the personnel problems that affect the Armed Forces will take time, trust, and money."

That is the glaring contradiction running through the review: there is not enough money to deliver the policies for people that will enable it to be a success.

The section on service personnel goes on to say:

"To provide a framework for addressing the problems we have identified, we need a comprehensive personnel strategy to take the Armed Forces into the next century. It must: incorporate all that is best in current practice . . . especially the ethos and values needed to support operational capability".

On the specifics of what is to be done to help retention in the Army, the review says:

"We also aim to improve retention with a range of new measures including: enhancements to operational welfare"—

which I think means more telephone calls home—

"introduction of a common leave entitlement and a programme to improve standards of single living accommodation."

On further inspection, it turns out that that programme involves no new money, and was under way before the review took place.

If there is no reduction in the commitment for the armed forces, overstretch and retention problems will get worse, not better. There is a glaring contradiction, because of the requirement to deliver efficiency savings of 3 per cent. each and every year for four years to make the review work.

One might hope for a miracle from the appointment of General Sir Sam Cowan as Chief of Defence Logistics, but the effort to find £2 billion a year by the fourth year by combining the logistic operations of the three armed services will mean that the search for efficiency savings will go down through every level of the budget holders, until eventually individual units in individual base locations will have to scratch around for 3 per cent. savings each and every year. I hope that hon. Members will understand the scale of the task. It is equivalent to having to save 100,000 jobs in supporting the armed services. The armed forces have been set an enormous task, which has the potential, I fear, to destroy the policy for people that every hon. Member supports.

I am most concerned about the impact on the quality of life of service men and people in the Army. The Royal Armoured Corps is taking part in a conference, with commanding officers addressing subjects such as "How can we put the fun back in?", but what happens when one searches for yet more efficiency savings on top of the £6 billion a year efficiency savings that have already been made in the past 10 years? What happens to money for adventure training, for single service men's accommodation, and for people to be able to mount expeditions, which we want as many young officers as possible to undertake? All those things get squeezed.

When young officers, for example, plan exercises, they will find that there is no money for transport, and that the spares allocation is insufficient to support the exercises that they want to take their soldiers on. All those things impact on the quality of life and motivation of service men and Army officers and soldiers.

That financial pressure on the day-to-day administration of service men's life is administered the coup de grace by political correctness. That is where the strategic defence review is absolutely right to address the issue of ethos. We have to protect it, but the ethos of the Army is changing.

One of the problems is the fear of the chain of command being politically incorrect and prepared to stand up for the young men and women who are under its command. There are all sorts of issues. The one that I want to address is that of integrating women into the armed forces and how difficult a challenge that is in units where it is happening, particularly the Royal Artillery, which, in the fighting echelon, is the furthest forward in relation to women making their presence felt.

What Ministers must understand is what the Army is for in peacetime. It is about training for war. What we try to ensure is that, when soldiers go into battle, they are inoculated against battle shock and the squalid, appalling conditions that they will find in war. We can replicate those conditions in peace, so that, when they face those conditions, they have trained for them and are still able to operate.

That is why our elite units are trained so toughly and to such a high standard. We are able to do that with units such as the Special Air Services, the Parachute Regiment and the Royal Marines, because we select an elite to undertake that quality of training; but the rest of the Army has to strive for those standards.

If we then impose on the rest of the Army a politically correct vision of how they should carry out their training, we are hobbling young officers and junior non-commissioned officers who are trying to achieve the highest training standards. They become frightened to lead and to manage, because they see their senior officers taking cover under what one might describe as a politically correct umbrella. They take cover behind regulations.

We all know what it means to run into a jobsworth. The more regulations and political correctness are imposed on the Army and other armed services, the more difficult it becomes for young men and women to lead, to take the initiative and to achieve the standards for which our armed forces are peerless in the world.

I use one example, of which I hope the Minister will take note, of one young man who showed initiative. His name is Major Milos Stankovic. One of the few Serbo-Croat speakers in the British Army, he worked for General Sir Michael Rose, among other commanders, directly in Bosnia. Major Stankovic's job, with a Serb father, strangely enough, was to win the confidence of Mr. Karadzic and General Mladic, and to get close to them, to enable General Rose to talk with authority on them and to find out what their intentions were.

We all know that the Americans had it in for General Sir Michael Rose. It appears that the CIA picked up various communications of Major Stankovic when he was carrying out his duties, doing his job for the British Army with initiative, possibly taking that initiative to the limits that a young officer should. When he came home to the UK to go on an Army staff course, he was arrested during a lecture. He has spent more than a year being investigated by the Ministry of Defence police, which is plainly totally out of its depth in conducting an investigation that will, I assume, involve signals intelligence, the CIA, MI5 and MI6 and goodness knows what other agencies.

If after a year—frankly, if after a month—a case could not be brought against Major Stankovic, it should be dropped. This is a young man who was doing his duty for his country and whose career has been sacrificed because the MOD police have been unable to carry out a proper investigation.

I use that as an example of the sort of initiative that is shown by young men and young officers, but then the umbrella goes up and everyone hides from the responsibility, saying, "It is all sub judice. We cannot do anything about it." That is what happens when young men show initiative and their service and Ministers do not protect them. What message does it send to other members of the armed forces?

Homosexuality poses a serious threat to the future ethos of the armed forces. There is an existing modus vivendi. Of course there are homosexuals in the armed forces, but, "Don't ask, don't tell," is effectively what we have. If their homosexuality is invisible to other people, it is not an issue, but the moment we change the rules and impose a right for people to be overtly homosexual in the armed forces, in platoons of infantry and in ships, we have begun to undermine the essential fabric that goes to make up the necessary ethos that makes men fight for each other. Of course, we are most concerned with the fighting echelon, where that necessary team work has to exist. I urge hon. Members to listen to the armed forces, because they are the ones whose ethos is under threat from this change.

If Ministers proceed with this change, the one thing that they will have to deliver is single service men's accommodation of en-suite bathrooms, and single accommodation for every service man in the armed forces. That is going to be a fabulously big bill. That would be an absolute minimum requirement.

Mr. Reed: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that, because of homophobia within the armed forces, we should not have homosexuals? Because there is racism in the armed forces, is he suggesting that we do not have black and Asian people in for the same reason?

Mr. Blunt: I am not for a moment making that suggestion. There is no equivalence between racism and homosexuality. It is impertinent of the hon. Gentleman to suggest that there is.

Having dealt with my worries about the threats to the ethos and the policy of those who serve in the Regular Army, I turn to the Territorial Army. When I heard the Under-Secretary speak this morning, I wondered what planet he was on. He told us that the proposals for the TA were good news. That contrasts with the view of the vice-chairman of the council of the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association, Colonel Putnam, who told the House of Commons Select Committee on Defence:

"the announcement of the SDR was a black day for the Territorial Army and we are now very concerned as to what the final structure will look like."

Ministers should understand that their proposals for the TA are strategically, politically and administratively wrong. In the words of the Defence Committee, unanimously supported by all its members—including seven Labour Members—they are "misconceived".

I received a letter from Colonel Putnam yesterday. Ministers should be aware of what is happening to members of TAVRA and the TA as they try to put Government proposals into action. Colonel Putnam wrote:

"Over the last two weeks the situation has deteriorated in that 'horse trading' is now being conducted over the identification and selection of TA centres for sale to meet the now reinforced requirements of proceeds from the sale of TA Centres hitting the target for the budget for the fiscal year 1999/2000.

The rush for selection is now 'carving up' the plans made and submitted to date. In other words, there is pressure to identify TA Centres that can be sold quickly, ignoring the footprint and defence solutions. Whilst this confirms clearly that fiscal pressures are driving the TA and other elements of the SDR, it has placed everyone involved in the process both within this Association and the chain of command in a position where we can no longer be honest with our Volunteers, our MPs, employers, civic authorities and all others interested in defence and the Reserves."

That is where the appalling proposals for the TA have led. I hope that, if the Minister cannot rescue the situation, he will at least ameliorate it.

I conclude by becoming a little parochial. I am concerned about what is happening to the Territorial Army in the south-east. Current proposals suggest the TA will have 970 all ranks across four counties in the south-east. That is a reduction of 48 per cent. If the proposals were based properly on a footprint of our population, the south-east would have some 2,756 volunteers for the TA, instead of the dismal number proposed. Colonel Putnam's letter concludes:

"we are in danger of having been forced to design a TA, particularly for the Infantry and Royal Engineers, that is not viable as it will lack opportunity which will increase turnover and will not, over a period of time, be worth joining."

In last week's debates on the strategic defence review, the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander) hoped that the engineering unit in his constituency would survive. The proposals will take five regiments of engineers out of the TA order of battle—and that is not to mention the proposals to destroy the yeomanry and the infantry. If stories about the appalling names to be given to successor units—such as the Home Counties battalion—are true, I fear that they will lack any cohesion or esprit de corps.

Mr. Swayne: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that some motive may lie behind these suggestions? In a few years, when the turnover and the number of vacancies on the establishment have increased, Ministers will be able to get rid of the remainder, because it is under strength.

Mr. Blunt: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We should have learnt that lesson already from what has happened to the Regular Army in trying to manage the reductions from "Options for Change". There was a widespread impression that the Army no longer needed recruits because it was downsizing. In fact, the redundancies that took place were intended to ensure that the Army retained a proper structure of age, rank and experience. We are in danger of sending the same message about the TA. If the units cannot offer people the loyalty of serving alongside their mates, that will be highly deleterious.

The TA centre in Reigate is going to close, along with the field troop of 127 Field Squadron, which is part of one of the five regiments of engineers that will go. That will have an effect on the associated Army cadet force hut in Reigate. Lieutenant Graham Cromer, who leads that ACF detachment, has told me the benefits that the ACF receives from collocation with the TA. They include support from instructors, visits to see adult members of the TA at work, seeing equipment, and the opportunity to train with the TA. The ACF and TA can also jointly mount recruiting exercises. Reigate has a .22 range administered by the ACF, and used by other ACF detachments and Reigate grammar school combined cadet force. All that will go if the site is sold.

The Defence Committee was told that it would cost £130,000 on average to replace each cadet hut. If 150 units are threatened, that adds up to an enormous sum, for which no provision has been made. While they wait for their huts to be rebuilt, the units will begin to disintegrate. The ACF lives on the enthusiasm of its volunteer leaders, both military and civilian. When they are dispossessed, the Government's good intentions and the words of the Under-Secretary about the value of the ACF as a youth movement will fall apart.

I am sorry to have detained the House so long, but I hope that hon. Members will understand. The Army is an institution of which I am fiercely proud. I want it to be protected. Its fate lies in the hands of Ministers, and particularly in those of the Minister of State. We look to him to ensure that, when his term of office ends, the condition of the Army is at least as good it is today—if not better.

7.56 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I shall ask the Minister some brief questions on personnel management matters, but first I should reply to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), who implied that no one on the Labour Benches or their families had any military experience. I am proud that my father, who served with an infantry regiment, was awarded the Military medal for an act of bravery in the field. For my part, I have the honour—which some would call dubious—of being the only Member of Parliament who served in the Royal Military police. I know that the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) had some association with that fine body of men and women.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) has left the Chamber, because her intervention on the European dimension was interesting. I believe that circumstances will force the European Union to develop a defence dimension because America is turning in on itself. One day, growing pressure in the USA will result in military disengagement from European defence structures. I am sorry that no member of the Scottish National party is here because we could have been entertained to a disquisition on the founding of a Scottish army after independence next May. Perhaps we will hear more of those plans closer to then.

I have some concerns about the Government's personnel policies. I have often seen our soldiers in Northern Ireland performing their arduous duties commendably. I think that I told you not long ago, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that while in south Armagh late last year, I saw some young Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders guarding the border there in difficult circumstances. I was in the company of the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke), whose constituent I am while living in London. I was proud to see those lads. I am talking about teenagers who were engaged in the war against the vicious fascist terrorists who claimed that they were conducting a military campaign. How absurd and obscene it is to argue that they were conducting a military campaign in a mature parliamentary democracy. Some of those youngsters were constituents of ours. I have seen our young soldiers in places such as Bosnia. I was proud of the way in which they too have performed their difficult task.

Speaking as an MP, and an ex-MP, I believe that our infantrymen make excellent United Nations peacekeepers. They are among the finest, alongside the Irish and others, including some from impoverished countries that put up soldiers to serve in peacekeeping forces. It reflects badly on America that it fails to pay its dues to the United Nations for peacekeeping operations.

On personnel issues, I have had numerous representations from constituents and others in the west of Scotland on the Territorial Army. The decisions will have to be implemented sensibly and tactfully. Cadet forces in the west of Scotland and elsewhere in Scotland—I leave English Members to argue their case—are in the main poorly equipped. I do not blame that on a Government who have been in office for only 15 months. I made the same complaint in opposition. Young lads and lasses are dead keen to serve in the cadet force but they are given equipment that is nothing short of a disgrace. Something must be done or their enthusiasm and motivation will be blunted.

I am not too unhappy that my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Mr. Ennis) is not here. I want to engage in conflict with him on whether the major generals should be in Edinburgh or York. It makes good tactical sense for them to be in Edinburgh. I am not being biased or parochial. I am not speaking disinterestedly, but Ministers must consider closely the case for Edinburgh. I say that with all sympathy to my hon. Friends from Yorkshire.

As a young military policeman, I saw the bullying of young recruits. It still happens, unfortunately. When 17 or 18-year-olds, scores of miles from home—perhaps away from home for the first time in their lives—are bullied by non-commissioned officers or older soldiers, it is no wonder that so many quit in their first year. Not so long ago, I came across the case of a young girl soldier, a constituent of mine, who was subjected to dreadful harassment partly because of her accent. Her English corporal and squad instructor said that he could not understand her accent and made her life miserable, to the extent that she understandably quit and came back home. Every effort must be made to eliminate bullying and the bullies must receive condign punishment when convicted of such behaviour. Similarly, racial harassment must be eliminated. There is a perception in ethnic groups that youngsters in the forces are likely to suffer from such intimidatory behaviour.

Promotion must be based only on merit, talent and potential. With respect to all the ex-officers among the Conservatives, as a young national service man I had much greater respect for my regimental and company sergeant majors than for some of the chinless wonders with two pips on their shoulders. Many other ex-national service men would say the same.

The senior NCO is the backbone of any unit. No former officer can deny that fact. I thought that some of my senior NCOs were first-class people whom I would follow anywhere, even though I was a reluctant national service man; some of the officers—God forbid. I would not have crossed the street with them. Our Army must become classless. The youngster from Greenock with the west of Scotland accent should not be discriminated against and the Afro-Caribbean youngster should not be discriminated against in taking a commission and promotion into the officer ranks.

What is the Ministry of Defence's policy on offering re-engagement to soldiers convicted of the most serious crimes? Hon. Members in the previous Parliament may recall that I complained about the re-engagement of Private Clegg. Have Guardsmen Fisher and Wright been offered re-engagement? Will the three young soldiers convicted of the dreadful rape and murder of a young Danish girl in Cyprus be offered it when they complete their prison sentences? I hope that the Minister can answer because I for one do not believe that soldiers convicted of heinous crimes should be re-engaged after they have served their terms of imprisonment. The forces are better off without them.

I want to speak on behalf of those young soldiers and others who took part in the nuclear tests. I am one of the very few hon. Members to have visited Maralinga in the state of South Australia. I saw the test sites and spoke to Australian veterans. While they said that their compensation was not adequate, it is reasonable to suggest to the Minister, as I did to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), that Australian ex-service men have been treated more sympathetically than our nuclear test veterans. Those veterans, whose numbers decrease all the time, should be given more sympathetic consideration by the MOD and other Departments.

More needs to be done, particularly for our young recruits. The role of the NCO is to look after his or her young recruits, and to ensure that a youngster coming into a regiment is not bullied or subjected to racial harassment. All ranks—officers and NCOs—need to be educated if we are to eliminate racial harassment and the pernicious problem of the bullying of young recruits. Much more, as I say, needs to be done by all concerned.

8.10 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman). He referred to our mutual experiences in Northern Ireland. One of the incidental pleasures of serving with him on such trips is to hear of his experiences in the royal military police. The House was the better for his being able to share some of that experience with us today. He promised to be brief, and through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I can tell my colleagues on the Opposition Benches who are still waiting to speak that I shall be even briefer.

I must immediately declare an interest in that on Monday I lunched in the mess of the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers in the Tower of London, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King). It was the annual luncheon for the Lord Mayor of London, which goes back to the link with the City of London Fusiliers. I was not lobbied, but I cannot say whether the same was true of the member of the Government who was present—the other parliamentary guest—the Under-Secretary of State for Health.

I should not sail under false colours. I am wearing a Sapper tie, and I am proud to do so. As a schoolboy, I rose to the rank of cadet captain, and one of the proudest moments of my life was to command 600 cadets for inspection by Lieutenant General Sir Brian Horrocks 46 years ago. I am old enough to have been trained on a drill book that instructed me on what to do with my sword in the event that I met His Majesty the King in a narrow trench.

I actively thought of becoming a regular soldier, but I damaged my knee in basic training for national service, and was eventually invalided out with a disability pension. Like Dr. Watson's old war wound from the Afghan wars, I still feel an occasional twinge.

When my brother, who is now a Lord Justice of Appeal, had a Sapper interview, he was asked whether he had had any relatives in the corps, and he replied, "My brother, Sir, was an acting lance corporal and my great-grand-uncle was a lieutenant general, both in the corps, and I hoped I might end up somewhere in between." I shall return to the Sappers before I conclude.

My first purpose in rising to speak is to support the Territorial Army units in my constituency. I did not speak in last week's debate on the strategic defence review, but on the second day I intervened in the opening speech of the Minister for the Armed Forces, who opened today's debate, and he gave me a helpful response, to which I shall return later.

The tradition of part-time military service in my constituency is long standing. Artillery lane in Spitalfields, on the edge of the City, goes back to a lease to an artillery company under the Tudors. In the 17th century, the Tower Ordnance and the Honourable Artillery Company both claimed that the land was theirs, and the HAC, with whom my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) has so distinguished an association, moved to its present ground in Finsbury in 1641.

At the Westminster end of my constituency, Artillery row, where Politico's now stands, is derived from butts erected there in the reign of Elizabeth. The trained bands go back to the reign of her father. They were affiliated to what is now the HAC. They were the forerunners of the militia and today's TA. Four thousand of them were inspected by Queen Elizabeth at Greenwich in 1585. Under James I, they became four regiments under the command of the Lord Mayor. Their role in the civil war is well known. William III, in renewing their charter, insisted on a continuance of the HAC link. Only in 1794 were they reorganised as the City of London militia.

Similarly, the Military Company was founded in Westminster in 1615, and was modelled on the Spitalfields Artillery Company. It was commanded by a professional soldier, and trained in three and a half acres of land acquired in the north-west part of St. Martin's field. Their service lasted well nigh a century.

Gradually, the militia and yeomanry emerged. I draw attention to a personal constituency link that goes back to my most distinguished predecessor, Charles James Fox. Despite his falling out with his erstwhile ally Edmund Burke, who had reacted against the French revolution, Fox continued to argue passionately for the maintenance of the militia as a key component of the nation's defences against the French.

I shall now encourage the House by fast forwarding two centuries to my intervention last week in a passage in the speech of the Minister for the Armed Forces in which he was discussing ethnic recruitment. My constituency TA interest lies in the London Scottish Regiment, which is historically located in Westminster, based in Horseferry road, and is now part of the London Regiment; and in the Royal Green Jackets, which is headquartered in Mayfair. Other parliamentary colleagues represent the London Regiment's drill halls in Battersea, Camberwell, Hornsey, Edgware, Balham and Chelsea. Overall, the London Regiment has a 12 per cent. ethnic strength, with 9 per cent. in the London Scottish, which has a very strong expatriate element.

As to the Royal Green Jackets, 20 per cent. in the regiment's volunteer arm in London are of ethnic origin. Perhaps still more remarkable is the fact that 43 per cent. of the cadet corps in Mayfair, to whom the TA link is so important, are of ethnic origin, and half their cadet corps contingent are from single parent families or broken homes. We should all thank God for the structure, decently administered, that the Army gives to those particular young lives.

When I intervened in the Minister's speech last week, I asked him what moral the MOD drew from these statistics. He acknowledged that lessons were to be learned from this experience. Because mine is an inner-city seat, I would be exceptionally sad to see those lessons and that achievement threatened by the Government's cull of the TA. I recognise that a Mayfair property offers the same temptation for development as the training grounds in Spitalfields and St. Martin's field offered in the 17th and 18th centuries, but it would be a tragedy, given the ethnic recruiting achievement and advancement of my constituents, if those notable assets were jeopardised when ethnic recruiting is properly so important. The Horseferry road site is not a similar prize, as it is only leased to the MOD in a forerunner arrangement to the private finance initiative.

I understand that one motivation for the reforms was to establish units nearer where people live rather than where they work. I have remarked before that 22 per cent. of the employed population of Greater London work in my constituency, and my 73 Greater London parliamentary colleagues are good enough to look after the other 78 per cent. If that is the pattern of people's lives in Greater London—and if it produces the great advances in ethnic recruiting in an inner-city seat to which I have referred—then working against the grain of London behaviour constitutes a massive risk.

I want to say a loyal word on behalf of the Sappers. I have not been directly briefed by them, so the Minister may correct what may have been a wrong impression on my part, although I have received reinforcement from my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt). My understanding of the review is that the third combat group is faced with a cut of half its Sapper element.

I mentioned earlier my Sapper great-grand-uncle, who became a lieutenant general. He was a bachelor who served in one imperial territory after another across the 19th century empire. I have his watercolours of the Crimea. Later, in Mauritius, where he was an early photographer, he helped build the roads, the port, the prison and the hospital. I mention that echo of more than a century ago to make the point that the Sappers are a major resource for civil works, which in civil life we would miss if the Sappers were cut to ribbons.

I feel immense vicarious pride in our soldiers. When I served in Northern Ireland, 4/5 Commando was serving in south Armagh in the winter of 1990–91, and saw its immediate next service in Iraq looking after the Kurds in the aftermath of the Gulf war. President Bush sent a four-star general to see how the military support for disadvantaged civilians was going. On his return to Brussels, the American general called Field Marshal Sir Richard Vincent to say how impressed he had been with 4/5 Commando, adding that he had never seen soldiers handle civilians so sensitively. He went on to ask where we found them and where we trained them. Sir Richard replied simply, "We train them in south Armagh." God knows, we must all hope that the need for training or any activity in south Armagh is a thing of the past, but the episode is an index of the pride that I feel.

I close humbly with that legendary address by the padre to the departing battalion in the first war. He said:

"God go with you everywhere. I can only come as far as the station."

8.20 pm

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): It is a privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke). I apologise for having to slip out during his distinguished speech; I know that I must have missed a great deal. It is also a privilege to have an opportunity to speak twice in a week on such an important subject as the great British Army. It is good that the Government have found time for this debate at this point in the parliamentary timetable and just before Remembrance Sunday. I can think of no better topic than the British Army to discuss at this time.

As a Welsh Member of Parliament, I am conscious of a further privilege. Wales has a fine tradition that stretches back as far as the bowmen of Gwent at the battle of Agincourt, through to those courageous receivers of the Victoria Cross at Rorke's drift and right up to today, when I believe that the Welsh Guards were part of the guard of honour for the visiting president of Argentina. That is a symbol of just how great and how professional our forces are and what a fine job they do. Mr. Simon Weston—that veteran of the Falklands war, who was so badly scarred and damaged outwardly, but inwardly is a courageous man who has done so much since the war—had positive and constructive comments to make this week on the visit of the president.

We can be optimistic about the future of the British Army following the Government's strategic defence review. In general, the review has been good news for the Army after such a long period of changes, reviews and cuts, which created a great deal of the instability and uncertainty that has affected morale in the Army. The hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) referred to the low morale in the Army. I believe that it was due mostly to the way in which uncertainty affected professional men and women doing such a good job.

The truth of the matter is that yes, there was a peace dividend; there was a downsizing of our forces. I will be even more generous and say that Ministers in the Tory Government carried out those reviews with the best of intentions. However, the outcomes often bore no relationship to the intentions following the cold war. The reviews did not arrive at strategic solutions to the situation in which we found ourselves. They were a way in which to reduce the defence budget by not touching the commitments of our armed forces one iota, but cutting their resources and the wherewithal to achieve their goals in the world.

Mr. Blunt: The hon. Gentleman will, therefore, join us in deprecating the fact that further changes are to be imposed on the Army, including the requirement to achieve efficiency savings and a further £900 million a year cut in the defence budget.

Mr. Smith: Not at all—for two reasons. We are providing a stable budgetary environment for a minimum of three years—something that has never been done before. More importantly, we are providing a strategic environment for our forces which will last for the next two decades. That is exactly what service personnel in the Army have been wanting to see for so long.

Previous reviews turned out to be death by a thousand cuts. You cut here, you cut there, whether it was "Options for Change" or "Front Line First". Manpower and resources were cut and our defence commitments in the world were increased. No wonder some of the boys and girls in the services suffered such a decline in morale. They were doing continuous tours of duty. They were coming back from serving in one part of the world to go and serve in Northern Ireland. No sooner were they back than they were called back again. Let me not for one minute question the professionalism and service that they provide for this country.

Let me repeat something that I said last week; it happens to be true. We have the best army in the world, and we want to keep it like that. It may not be the biggest, but it is the best. For the past 18 months, I have represented this Parliament on the North Atlantic Assembly. That gives me the privilege of visiting other NATO countries and talking regularly to parliamentarians from those countries, including the United States and Canada. I hear nothing but praise for what our services do throughout the world—for example in Bosnia, where British soldiers are leading the way. One minute they have their sleeves rolled up and are working with the local community and the next, they are manning tanks at the other end of the town or village to defend people living in that area. They provide an example to the other forces who have gone there. I hear nothing but praise for the Army and I think that it should receive nothing but praise from hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I understand the concerns about the bad publicity that some of our service personnel get. There have been damaging episodes, but let us not get it out of context. Let us not lose sight of the fact that our service personnel's conduct and behaviour is far better than the average conduct of young people in the community. Service men and women set an example to young people in the community. That is why I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Government—[Interruption.] Heckle me if you like. This is the problem, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are talking about the British Army, and the Whips sit there heckling and trying to make fun of the services. It is disgraceful, but it is typical. Opposition Members claim to represent the interests of the British forces, but every member of the forces currently or previously serving knows damn well that he or she is always better off under a Labour Government. They are going to be better off under a Labour Government for the next 10 years.

We won the general election last year with a terrific mandate. Much of that mandate came from our armed forces, who had had enough of the Conservative Government. Little did we realise what damage the previous Government had done.

Mr. Blunt: I should like the hon. Gentleman to name the terms under which he thinks that the armed forces are better off under a Labour Government than they were under a Conservative Government. He should name his terms, and then we will examine them.

Mr. Smith: All of them. There is a better way: let us consider the legacy that we were left with. The Conservative Government cut the defence budget by almost half in real terms as a proportion of GDP during their period of office. The Conservatives cut the number of service personnel from almost 750,000 to 400,000. They made the biggest cuts ever seen in the defence capacity of this country. I would agree that all that would have been part of the peace dividend if they had reduced expenditure rationally and strategically, but they did not, and the result was overstretch, as several Opposition Members have admitted. The Labour Government inherited that overstretch, which was putting unfair pressure on personnel in the Army and the other services.

The previous Government's cuts meant that there was an absence of heavy lift capability—the ability to get our troops to the front line and support them once there. Medical services in the British forces were an absolute disgrace—almost non-existent. That was another unacceptable situation that we inherited. I could continue the list, but I do not wish to do so, because I believe that the strategic defence review has completely reversed the position.

I was delighted by the announcement last week that British service personnel will shortly wear uniforms in the community. I believe that that will make a far greater contribution to our recruitment efforts than we realise. Believe it or not, the last time I saw British service personnel in full dress uniform when off duty was when I was carrying out my responsibilities in connection with the North Atlantic Assembly in Moscow. As we walked through Red square, we saw three members of the Black Watch in full military dress—off-duty soldiers who were there as tourists. As they walked across the square, Russians flocked to look at the spectacle of some of the finest soldiers in the world—British soldiers. They were instantly recognised for what they were—Scots and soldiers. They won great praise, much to the consternation of the Red guards guarding Lenin's tomb, who were not at all happy.

Joking aside, when we see our fine young men and women, walking once again in uniform through the streets, it will give the finest example of what our forces do. That will encourage far more youngsters to recognise what the armed forces offer in terms of a career and future. I am sure that they will take advantage of those opportunities.

We have heard much about the Territorial Army—in fact, most of the speeches, with one or two fine exceptions, have been completely dominated by that subject. That is understandable: there are constituency interests throughout the country and Members of Parliament are bound to be concerned about their local TA unit. However, if that is all the Opposition can question in the strategic defence review, we have little to be concerned about. How can Opposition Members question that the SDR was necessary? The nature of warfare has changed completely.

Mr. Paterson: As a Welsh Member of Parliament, is the hon. Gentleman not concerned about the rumours that the Royal Welsh Fusiliers will be almost eliminated as a TA unit in north Wales and that north Wales will be denuded of an Army presence?

Mr. Smith: The honest answer is, yes, I would be concerned, if such a decision undermined the new part the Territorial Army is to play in our strategic military role. Because of our fine military and regimental traditions, we in Wales have one of the highest recruitment rates to the Regular Army in the United Kingdom. An important military consideration within the terms of the SDR was the need to reorientate the role of the TA, and I know that such factors will be considered in the consultations that are taking place.

I believe that the thinking is that the two battalions—the two great cap badges—will be kept in Wales, north and south, although, as a result of the restructuring, they may be cut back in terms of company numbers within those battalions. When restructuring, quite rightly, takes place in line with the strategic defence review, I believe that the viability of the two regiments will remain to ensure that, in line with Government thinking, we maintain the same high levels of recruitment in Wales that are of such benefit to the Regular Army. I am confident that, within the terms of reference of the SDR, the Government will take into account those serious arguments and not the spurious arguments advanced today.

Under the review, the Army has to be restructured to provide it with a relevant role for the future, and not the partially irrelevant role it has played for the past 10 years, preparing for a war on the eastern plains of Germany—the wrong place, now that the boundaries of Europe have changed—that will not happen in the foreseeable future. The Army must be able to play a leading role in the world by being able to react quickly and to project power rapidly to trouble spots in support of international initiatives.

Mr. Key: In view of his particular expertise on the North Atlantic Assembly, will the hon. Gentleman give us the benefit of his views on the role of the Army in relation to Western European Union?

Mr. Smith: I should be delighted to, but I want to focus on only one or two specific issues relating to the Army, and there is insufficient time to digress.

Mr. Hancock: Before the hon. Gentleman moves away from the subject of the TA in Wales, I am sure that he will get the support of every hon. Member if his premonition—which appears to be well informed—about the end result in Wales is fulfilled. In that case, I am sure that he will be the first to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) on his campaign to preserve the TA in Wales. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will give heartfelt support to my hon. Friend's efforts to restore some credibility to the British Army in Wales, which will help the Labour Government.

Mr. Smith: Wales has done well from the strategic defence review in general. I have no idea what the final outcome will be for the territorials, but I am confident that, within the terms of the review, we shall retain our battalions in Wales as viable entities.

Finally, I turn to a further benefit to Wales that may emerge from the review. Several hon. Members referred to the withdrawal of forces from Germany and the shortage of training locations in the United Kingdom. I tell Ministers that training facilities are available in the Principality, where forces relocating to the United Kingdom would be more than welcome. We are able to house military personnel and provide facilities for some of their activities.

The British Army and our other forces have a fine tradition. I am a former aircraftman and served alongside regular soldiers, and I have seen just how great they are. I confidently predict that, in the next 10 years, they will be even greater and an asset of which the United Kingdom can be proud. I should like to think that, on both sides of the House, hon. Members will be able to unite in ensuring that the strategic defence review is implemented fully, so that our forces may prosper in the future.

8.38 pm

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset): The persistent theme in today's debate, and in last week's debate on the strategic defence review, has very much been the future of the Territorial Army. One of my concerns about the TA's future has been the somewhat secretive nature of the consultation exercise on it.

In last week's debate, the Secretary of State said that he was prepared to listen to hon. Members' concerns. However, officially, hon. Members should not be aware of the contents of the document on TA restructuring, which has not yet been placed in the public domain. In the excellent document prepared by the Library on the strategic defence review, Library staff seemed to show some concern about the document's existence. Although people seemed to know its contents, the document itself could not be mentioned. We therefore have to rely on the summation of the document that was printed a couple of weeks ago in The Sunday Telegraph.

I should like to deal with the specific case, in my own constituency, of the possible demise of the 4th battalion, Devonshire and Dorset Regiment, which is very much a part of the TA infantry. First, however, I should deal with the general problem of the review's handling of the TA infantry, and consider four possible consequences that the review and proposed measures may have on the TA infantry—on recruiting, reinforcement, regeneration and community links between the TA and local communities.

There is in the Army a natural balance between the Regular Army, the Territorial Army and the Army cadet forces. The proposals, particularly those affecting the infantry, will disturb that balance. I do not think that sufficient weight has been given, in either the SDR or the TA review, to the TA's role in Regular Army recruitment. Although that role is certainly a non-operational one, it is one that has been very much undervalued. If there is a reduced or no TA presence in large parts of the United Kingdom, the TA's recruitment role will be greatly diminished. The TA infantry personnel ceiling of 6,500 is woefully inadequate if the TA is to play any significant role in recruitment.

The reduced personnel ceiling will have a severe impact also on the support that is given to the Army cadet force, which is itself a traditional source of Army recruits.

[Mr. Robert Walter]

More practically, the reduction will have a severe long-term impact on the number of instructors in the Army cadet force.

Hon. Members have already mentioned in this debate the TA soldiers who serve gallantly in Bosnia backing up the Regular Army. To reduce the TA is to reduce the pool of willing volunteers who are able to fill the shortfall in deployment of regulars. Further overstretching of regulars inevitably will have a negative impact on Regular Army training and morale if TA soldiers, especially TA infantrymen, are not available to reinforce them.

Traditionally, in times of conflict, the TA infantry has been the regenerative force. If the TA is reduced, that essential role also will be reduced. In a conflict, if we had speedily to increase the size of the Regular Army, the TA would be much less able to provide the base essential to do that if it were reduced or eliminated in parts of the United Kingdom.

I must also deal with community links which are an essential part of the TA. The TA is a key element in the relationship between the civil and military populations. Cutting the TA and reducing that experience of contact with the Army will have a fairly devastating effect, not only on the TA itself, but on the Army cadet force which performs the essential role of instilling the qualities of service, discipline and loyalty into many of our young people.

That leads me neatly to the 4th battalion, Devonshire and Dorset Regiment in my constituency. It is very much part of the local scene, but also of the Army establishment. Within the two counties of Devon and Dorset, we currently have five companies of the TA in Exeter, Plymouth, Paignton, Dorchester and Poole. We have affiliated combined cadet forces at 12 schools—two in Lyme Regis, one in Tiverton where both my sons served in the combined cadet force, one in Wimborne and Iwerne Minster in my constituency, two in Exeter, and one in Dorchester, Plympton, Bruton, Plymouth and Sherborne. That represents quite a spread across the two counties. We have six companies of the Army cadet force spread across 58 detachments. In my constituency, A and C companies are represented at Blandford, Gillingham, Shaftesbury and Wimborne.

The strategic defence review is coy about the future of the combined cadet force and the Army cadet force. However, if we consider the SDR and what we believe to be in the TA restructuring document. it is clear what is going to happen to the five companies of TA soldiers in the Devons and Dorsets—there will be not five companies but two. In my county, there will be just one and, to add insult to injury—if The Sunday Telegraph article is correct—it will no longer be a company of the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment anyway. It will be renamed and reformed as something called the South West Battalion.

I imagine that, in the view of some civil servant, such a name will fit neatly alongside the Government office for the south-west, the south-west regional development agency, the south-west regional chamber and the great move towards regionalism. However, these proposals destroy the Devon and Dorset family, or at least a very important part of the historic links between the soldiers and their community.

The combined strength of the volunteers in the 4th battalion and in the cadets is some 2,200 soldiers. They are all proud to wear the cap badge of their county regiment, and are proud of the regimental band which is very much part of the TA, but which nevertheless serves the whole regiment. Why is it that in new Britain under new Labour, it is not very hip to be in the TA, not very cool to be a cadet or, especially if we are to believe the proposals, not terribly cool to be part of a county regiment? That is poppycock. It is another example of the Government's insensitivity to what happens in vast swathes of rural Britain.

The strength of the TA is its local associations. In the debate on the SDR, the Minister talked of greater integration between the TA and the Regular Army. If I take my own county TA regiment as an example, the proposals will break the link between the TA and the regulars. At the moment, the 4th battalion, the TA, operates alongside, and under the same command structure as, the 1st battalion, the regulars. That will be wholly destroyed. We shall destroy the conduit which is not only part of our community and county structure, but part of the British Army.

When he opened today's debate, the Minister said that the proposals were based on the principle that the TA was to be integrated and relevant. Having considered the proposals for the county that I represent in part, they are pretty disintegrated and will make the TA pretty irrelevant. That is because there will be so little of the TA in the county to be seen.

I make a plea to the Minister on behalf of the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment and of all county regiments with TA links. We should keep these TA units with their county regiments. I believe that the ceiling of 6,500 men for the TA infantry is inadequate, and that it will lead to manning problems in the regular Army. If anything comes of this debate and last week's, I hope that Ministers will reconsider the overall numbers of TA infantry and their links with local communities, particularly local communities in rural Britain.

8.50 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): I had not intended to speak in the debate, having had a good run last week. I did not want to replicate my speech of last week. However, I thought it was important to participate this evening because I would not want to give the Whips the opportunity to say, "Let's abandon this single-service-debate concept because the debate petered out before the time when it was supposed to end." It is important that we sustain sufficient debates on defence because defence remains a vital subject.

Defence debates are rather like London Transport buses in that we wait a long time for them to come and finally, when they do arrive, they arrive en masse. I understand that there may be a debate next week on the Royal Navy, which will prove the point.

I had an invitation to join a number of people in the Guildhall this evening to celebrate the arrival of President Menem. However, there was the Army debate and I was organising a function in the Jubilee Room with the Royal British Legion. That meant that the world was spared the sight of me in a white tie and tails. Tailors were denied the £100 fee that I would have paid to participate in that unique occasion.

The debate is important. I have been rather embarrassed by some of the speeches of Opposition Members. I recall making one of my early speeches on defence a long time ago in the mid-1970s, when I was not treated with discourtesy. I was not treated by Members on the Benches opposite mocking or sneering because, never having served in the armed forces, I was daring to participate in a debate where some Members thought, because they had served as majors in the catering corps, they had a depth of knowledge sufficient to pontificate like some latter-day Clausewitz on affairs of state.

I do not buy the argument that only those who have served in the armed forces or whose great. great, great-grandfathers served, have a monopoly of wisdom, concern or, dare I say, knowledge of defence issues. I welcome the contributions of Members such as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe). I hope that he will participate regularly in these debates, despite the disgraceful way in which his speech was treated by some Opposition Members, with a pomposity that I found deeply repugnant.

The view seemed to be expressed that on day 1, 2 May, the armed forces suddenly declined and that hitherto they had been wisely led and funded by a group of people who made impeccable, perfect decisions. It seemed to be thought that, the moment the Labour Government came into office, pacifist, unilateralist thickos ruled the roost and brilliant men, like the drivers of black taxi cabs who regularly pontificate on all affairs of state, were denied the opportunity of making key decisions.

I looked at some of the reports produced by the Defence Committee in the last year of the Conservative Government to remind myself of those latter-day Clausewitzes and Churchills who had been responsible for our armed forces. Reports from the Session 1996–97 included one on the sale of the married quarters estate—not one that I would be particularly proud of if I was a Tory. Our third report was on defence medical services, about which they should feel distinctly embarrassed, if not humiliated.

I quoted from the report on defence spending last week. I offer no apologies for repeating our insistence that the defence spending plans set out in the 1996 Budget should at least be maintained in real terms in future years, because any further reduction would jeopardise the defence of the realm.

Our sixth report was on the latest developments on Gulf war illness—which, under the previous Government, were virtually nil. Then there was heavy lift. What heavy lift? There was prevarication on the future large aircraft. Is the Royal Air Force going to fly a concept? The Defence Committee must accept some responsibility, but the previous Government decided to go for the C130J, on which there was two years' delay. What about sea lift? If we wanted sea lift, we had to go to the open market and get the Ukrainians or the Poles to provide it. What happened to the merchant marine under the brilliant Conservative Government from 1979? It almost disappeared.

Some Conservatives argue that we should feel slightly ashamed because of the period in the 1980s when the Labour party was infected by a disease that it contracts every 30 years or so. We were cured and now the Government are sensible. I recall—although not from personal experience—periods about which Conservative Members should have some humility. I remember reading about the British Army in the 1930s—denied equipment and led by officers who were not very well qualified, with a general staff as inept as they were during the period when, one Conservative Member has asserted, they were donkeys. In a vote of confidence in 1940, instigated by the Labour party and the Liberal party, Conservative Members either sat on their hands or voted for the Government of Neville Chamberlain. The Winston Churchill Government was established with the support of the Labour party, the Liberals and a handful of Conservatives who had had the courage to vote against their party leadership. When I am lectured about periods of humiliation for the Labour party, I ponder the periods in the past 50, 70 or 90 years of which neither party can be particularly proud. Some humility is appropriate on both sides.

Dr. Julian Lewis: The hon. Gentleman is right to point to periods in which both parties behaved disgracefully, including the 1930s, when the Conservatives allowed themselves to be intimidated by a pacifist movement. The Labour party at the time was calling for even more disarmament than the Conservatives. The difference is that, when we got to the 1980s, the Conservatives had learnt the lesson of the 1930s, whereas the Labour party had to undergo the terrible defeats of 1983 and 1987 before abandoning unilateralism. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we have had to refer to the 1980s tonight only when challenges were unwisely directed against the Conservatives by Labour Members saying that they had nothing to be ashamed of?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Interventions must not be speeches.

Mr. George: I would not have objected if the intervention had been sensible. I defer to the ability of the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) to penetrate the Labour party. Perhaps he should penetrate some history books and read about the Labour party. Ernie Bevin played a major role in destroying George Lansbury at the 1935 Labour conference. A. J. P. Taylor said that the subsequent Fulham by-election frightened the Tories out of what little sense they had. Labour Members in opposition and members of the trade union movement, who had seen their friends and comrades in Europe gaoled or murdered by the Nazis, saw the light much earlier than the Government of appeasement. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I should have a little seminar so that we can discuss who the guilty men were and distribute that guilt fairly evenly among political parties.

Dr. Lewis rose—

Mr. George: I shall not give way again. I make the point because it is necessary to get over to Conservative Members that there is no history of perfection in their party.

When I came into Parliament, everyone recalled that Denis Healey in the 1960s was the best Secretary of State for Defence since the second world war. One recalls the previous Labour Government leaving office having spent an average of 4.9 per cent. of gross domestic product on defence. Yes, spending rose a little under the Tories after the iron lady came into office, but that peak was largely due to funding the ships that were sunk in the Falklands war. Not long afterwards, the Conservative Government abandoned the commitment of the previous Labour Government to increase defence expenditure by 3 per cent. in real terms, in line with a NATO decision. Yes, defence spending declined following the end of the cold war, although I should point out to Conservative Members that it began to decline in 1985—four years before the cold war ended. I would willingly engage in a history seminar with anyone who wishes to take part.

I have enormous affection for the British Army despite never having served in it. The only time that I threatened to vote Conservative—a long, long time ago—was when they abolished conscription. That decision led to the gradual fading away of militarily experience among Members of Parliament. It is important to sustain an interest in the armed forces in the House so that, even though very few of us have served in them, we are still able to comprehend the defence interests of the country.

I have an immense admiration for British soldiers. I recall that, when I went to Bosnia with my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) we saw British forces of quite amazing professionalism. The Defence Committee said that the King's Royal Hussars had an immense versatility. They drove Challenger 1 tanks, which were then in operation, and Warrior vehicles. They were engaged in peacekeeping and inspecting ammunition sites held by various "Entity Forces", operated in a public order environment and were involved in many community-based projects, many of which we saw. Those are British professional soldiers, who are now, thankfully, well led and reasonably well equipped—unlike those during many previous periods and decades.

To go back even further, I shall cite a man who is not quoted particularly frequently by any hon. Member, but who admired the armed forces even more. I should like to indulge in citing one short verse of poetry. I see a Conservative Member starting to snigger. Hon. Members will know the author, whose words I endorse. He said:

"There'll surely come a day
When they give you all your pay
And treat you like a Christian ought to do.
But 'til that day comes round
Heaven keep you safe and sound
And Thomas here's my great respect to you."

That is Rudyard Kipling's "Ode to Thomas Atkins".

Those people deserve better than they have got from politicians over the past 200 years—an era in which they were led by men who purchased their commissions. Ability to lead was ignored; ability to pay was supreme. In the 18th century, a War Minister had previously been drummed out of the Army for cowardice. Regiments were frequently raised in times of war, but when the war was over, they were disbanded within days.

The Army was led by men such as the Duke of Cambridge, a relative of Queen Victoria and a man of stupefying conservatism who vehemently and successfully opposed almost every reform proposed by politicians in the House and elsewhere. I hope that we are now in an era when all that is well and truly over.

I remind hon. Members that, during the cold war, the British Army of the Rhine was, as one respected academic who gave evidence to the Defence Select Committee said, a "shop window" force. When we saw British efforts in the Gulf, noble though they were, and when we saw how difficult it was to run even Challenger 1 tanks on the sand, we realised what might have happened if the Army of the Rhine had been confronted by the massed armies of the Warsaw pact.

We must learn the lessons of the past. One lesson that we must learn and relearn is the critical importance of our relationship with the United States, and of our key membership of NATO. European defence institutions can supplement NATO, but they must never replace it. I hope that despite what, if I interpret it correctly, I read in The Sun—great newspaper though it is—I may reappraise what the Government are supposed to be saying. I hope that we never forget that lesson.

The strategic defence review was helpful. NBC—nuclear, biological and chemical—in-theatre defence is improving. It is important that we learn the lessons of Granby, and that we in the House support the continuation and refining of the concepts of readiness and deployability, and a joint rapid deployment force. It is right to support the establishment of a second logistical chain.

It is also important to have our own in-house sea lift capability. I hope that more will be done to enhance what is left of the British merchant marine, and that a decision will soon be made on the heavy-lift aircraft. Will it be a C17 or its equivalent? That would be a great addition to our heavy-lift capability. I hope that a decision will soon be made whether to stay with the plan for the future large aircraft, which is looking increasingly like the kind of mirage that one sees when walking in the desert, or to go in for something that the Royal Air Force can deploy reasonably quickly.

One of my hon. Friends was a little sceptical about British forces in Germany. I do not expect the Red army to come through the Fulder gap, but if we believe in the concept of rapid deployment, I should prefer substantial forces to be located in Germany rather than on this side of the channel.

I hope that the Minister will use every opportunity to improve our defence medical services. A great deal has been promised and, over the next few years, it will be time for that to be delivered. I also hope that the Government, and certainly the Defence Select Committee, will watch the new training cycle.

Over the years, the Defence Committee has inquired into a number of major procurement failures. I hope that smart procurement will at least diminish the likelihood of defence projects going hopelessly over budget, being hopelessly delayed or, when they are finally delivered to the Army, the Air Force or the Navy, failing to achieve the objectives that they were designed to achieve. One of the areas we shall look at is Bowman.

The Select Committee will explore what progress is being made on Gulf war syndrome. We are collectively anxious about what will happen in terms of the future of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I am pleased to say that we will hold a public hearing on 2 December on a subject on which the Select Committee is unanimous, as is most of the House of Commons—we will take evidence from the Minister for the Armed Forces on the "consultation" that has been, or will be, undertaken on the Territorial Army. Whatever the Government say, the issue will not go away.

I hope that the Government have the good sense, belatedly, to do what the previous Government did under immense pressure—that is, to cancel a number of proposed mergers. It was difficult for Malcolm Rifkind to turn Government policy on its head, but I believe that it was done for the best of motives. I hope that there will be some add-back to our armed forces, and soon.

In conclusion, let me say that we have so much of which we can be proud about our Army and our armed forces. We have heard of cases of bad behaviour, drunkenness and brutality, but they involve only a tiny percentage of those who serve in our armed forces. These are young men and women—and some who are not so young—who work for a pay scale that most people would run away from. They work hours that any trade unionist would instantly organise a campaign against. In some parts of the world, they live in accommodation that pigs would be reticent about. Those people and their spouses—who face enormous strain—suffer, in some cases, public ridicule and indifference.

I do not wish to quote Kipling again but they are the "despised people" who fight. It is not us—we are safe and secure in our homes, protected by our armed forces. It is those men and women who go out and run the risk of death. We owe them an enormous debt, and we should hold them in immense admiration. It is incumbent upon us to provide properly for our armed forces, to give them proper training and equipment and to ensure that they are well led, and wisely led, at all levels.

"when the guns begin to shoot",

Historically, we have been derelict in our duties. I hope that the strategic defence review will achieve what we all want to see, regardless of political affiliation—armed forces which we can afford and which, every now and again, abandon their peacekeeping operations and those activities that are not particularly violent so that we can test how wise we have been in equipping them. If we have been wise, they will perform their duties well and will be successful.

There have been times in our history when we have believed that there was no requirement for well-funded armed forces. When the crisis comes, men go off to fight wars in faraway places and suffer death from war and illness. Who is ultimately responsible for their plight? It is Governments and Parliaments. I hope that we shall serve our country and our armed forces to such a degree that, when they are called upon to put their lives to the test, we can say that we did what was necessary.

9.13 pm

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): Although we obviously ignore history at our peril, I wish to concentrate on the present and the immediate future. I must draw the Minister's attention to the fact that I represent one of the premier division garrison towns and, in addition to the soldiers, I represent their wives and families. There are approximately 3,500 troops and 5,500 wives and dependants in Colchester.

I want the Minister to organise a survey and a complete audit of married quarters. The previous Government, in one of the most wicked privatisations, disposed of Army housing stock in the build-up to the last general election. The Government and the Ministry of Defence have a responsibility. We have been discussing recruitment and retention: a high standard of accommodation for the families of those in the services, as well for single men in barracks, is of critical importance. I want an assurance that the Minister will arrange for a survey and audit of the state of married quarters.

Reference has been made to the future of the Territorial Army, and I certainly endorse all the sentimental reasons given for retaining a strong civilian-military link. I would argue the case for the TA, but it has to evolve to have a meaningful role for the 21st century. All that enthusiasm and voluntary effort can be put to good use, but it must evolve.

Recruitment could be encouraged through the Army cadets. It is all very well for the Government to say that they support the cadet movement, but its budget has been cut and is insufficient. If more money were put into the cadets, more young men and women would be encouraged to join and might well go into the armed forces. Although we have heard that recruitment is up on the figure that the Government inherited from the previous Government, I think that the Minister will confirm that the complement of the British Army is still more than 3,000 below what it should be. We must increase recruitment as well as retention, and giving the cadet movement a boost is one way to do so. The Government would thereby be following the spirit of the Home Secretary's attempts—in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998—to encourage young people to lead more meaningful lives and the efforts of the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to encourage people to lead fruitful lives. More investment in the cadet forces would contribute to those goals.

I wish to draw attention to 24 Airmobile Brigade. The rumours are flying around. Perhaps the Minister can confirm or deny them. It is reported that the airborne elements of 5 Airborne Brigade, including two Parachute Regiment battalions, will be grouped with 24 Airmobile Brigade to form 16 Air Assault Brigade. By 2005, the new brigade will include three Army Air Corps regiments. However, we are not being told where the new brigade will be located.

I suggest that there have been behind-the-scenes manoeuvres to ensure that the Parachute Regiment stays in Aldershot. If so, how will the new brigade operate if 24 Airmobile Brigade, as we now know it, is to remain in Colchester? It would be helpful if the Minister said that the 16 Air Assault Brigade would indeed be based in Colchester; at a stroke, that would remove the many rumours and provide stability for all the members of the forces who are to form the new brigade. I welcome the Secretary of State to the Chamber and hope that he, too, can assure the House that the 16 Air Assault Brigade will be based at Colchester.

9.20 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): The Army is undermanned by 5,000 people and turnover is high—15,000 people a year—yet we are planning to cut the number of people in the Territorial Army, the Regular Army's main source of recruitment. In 1990, the TA consisted of 85,300 people. The current figure is 56,000, yet a dramatic drop to 40,000 is proposed.

That ignores history over the past centuries and more recently—the TA infantry fought alongside regular regiments in the Falklands and 10 per cent. of the forces in Bosnia consisted of the TA. It also ignores the experience of our closest allies. In the USA, two thirds of artillery units will, by the end of 1999, be from the reserves. The highest-scoring tank unit in the Gulf war was the 4th US Marine Reserve Tank Battalion.

The aim is to save money. The Reserves currently cost £360 million and the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association costs £80 million, which is 2 per cent. of the defence budget. The aim is to save £69 million, or 0.3 per cent. of the defence budget.

I give two examples of why I do not think the measure will save any money. One of the highly skilled TA units that is to be abolished is 198 Field Park Squadron, the Royal Engineers Territorial Army—80 per cent. of its members are ex-Regular Army or independent TA. The turnover is very low—only 5 per cent.—and the unit is tightly knit. I give only one example of its skills. A two-mile relief road was needed at the Cultybraggan training camp in Scotland. The challenge was funked by regular engineer units, but 198 took the job on, designing and planning the road in eight weeks flat. The unit estimates that it has saved the Ministry of Defence £500,000 over the past three years by taking on jobs that otherwise would have gone to civilian contractors.

My other example is the Royal Yeomanry, which is the Army's only nuclear, biological and chemical reconnaissance regiment—the Regular Army contains no counterpart. If the Minister reads paragraph 102 of the strategic defence review, he will see that the Royal Yeomanry is to be replaced by a Regular Army unit. That is daft—450 TA soldiers at £45 a day, together with the permanent staff, cost the taxpayer about £1.9 million, whereas Regular Army soldiers at £15,500 a year would cost an additional £7 million. That would not mean any quality gain, as the unit has recently passed the American chemical defence establishment assessment with flying colours.

The Secretary of State—I am delighted that he has joined our deliberations—frequently uses the word "relevant", but what about the poisoning on the Tokyo underground? The people in the Royal Yeomanry are excellent and should be retained—that would save money.

I see no savings, but I see long-term damage to the Army. Some 40 per cent. of Regular Army recruits come from the TA and the Army Cadet Force. The 1,700 ACF detachments across the country depend on the local TA unit for support. In a sparsely populated rural county such as Shropshire, one cannot close the training units and expect young people to travel. They simply cannot. No matter how hard one tries to create an integrated transport system, it is not possible in my constituency, which has 98 villages.

In a metropolitan area a training hall can be closed and young people can get public transport, but in a rural area that is not possible. The result will be the removal of military presence in a county such as Shropshire. The rumoured move to cut Shropshire down to one company of TA, based in Shrewsbury, will be disastrous. The TA will be spread far too thin and will simply not be able to cover the large geographical distances. Once the presence is gone, the footprint demanded by the Select Committee will be lost for good.

The move to lose the cap badge will be catastrophic. There is a rumour that the new regiment will be called the Midlands Regiment. Who on earth will be loyal to the Midlands Regiment? People are loyal to 5 Light Infantry, which has been there for hundreds of years, or to the Staffords. The regiments work like a family, and we have a record of success.

There is a real local role for the regiments: 18 to 22 per cent. of the LI are from the unemployed. A highly valued training framework is provided, giving civilians a role and a real purpose in life. I cannot express it better than my constituent, Major Hutchinson, who is chairman of the Ellesmere ACF detachment. He wrote to me in May, with some prescience, and said:

"It is my belief that ACFs, and very possibly CCFs, will be unable to continue their splendid youth work if the TA is cut back by anything like the scale suggested in the 'leaks' to the press. The Ellesmere ACF is the only organisation in the town, outside of schools, which offers opportunities for our young people to develop all of their non-academic talents to the full."

Furthermore, the TA has a real civil defence role. Unexpected events catch one behind the ear like a wet sandbag. That is a relevant phrase tonight, because as we have been talking the Rivers Severn and Vyrnwy have been rising. The brooks have backed up and in places they have breached. Two villages in my constituency, Melverley and Pentre, may be evacuated this evening. Shrewsbury may be inundated tomorrow.

This morning, I talked to Shropshire's county emergency planning officer, who was in the throes of debating whether to call in the military and put them on alert to help with the evacuation this evening. He said that it "gave him great comfort as a member of the local authority to know that the TA is available at short notice, but that the option might not be available in a year's time."

According to a Ministry of Defence statement on 25 September, a tri-service equal opportunities training centre will be set up at Shrivenham to

"equip around 1,000 service and civilian equal opportunities advisers with the practical knowledge and skills needed to effectively advise and train their colleagues."

In a phrase that I do not understand, it said that "the centre would encourage a 'top down bottom up' approach to equal opportunities awareness.

Bluntly, I do not believe that there is prejudice in the Army or the TA. London's TA regiments have a higher proportion of non-whites than exists in the general population. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) most eloquently stated that the Royal Green Jackets have more than 20 per cent. non-whites.

This is political correctness gone mad. When resources are scarce, every pound should be spent training and equipping our armed forces so that they are in such a state of readiness as to deter an aggressor. In the event that war breaks out, as it did in the Gulf, all the Army's efforts should be concentrated on preparing to rain down on our enemies every possible devastation, to bring conflict to a halt as quickly as possible.

As a glaring example, today we have welcomed the democratically elected president of Argentina. He would not have come here but for the bravery of our men in the Falklands. They went up Mount Tumbledown in the teeth of enemy bullets, not because they had been on an equal opportunities course but because they had been trained to go through the horrors of armed conflict: something that many of us, luckily, have never been through—I hope that we will never have to. Training, skill and equipment win wars, not equal opportunities awareness. Shrivenham is an expensive disgrace. It is politically correct gesture politics. It is a self-indulgent distraction. Our armed forces are being put at risk while savage, far reaching and ill-thought-out cuts are made to our reserve forces.

9.29 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): Once again, the debate on the Army has been wide ranging. We have been able to squeeze in some 15 speeches from Back Benchers, of whom, it will not surprise you to learn, Mr. Deputy Speaker, 11 have spoken out about the TA, and the majority have made the case for the Government to reconsider their proposals as outlined in the strategic defence review and in the pages of our press.

I welcome the commitment from the Minister for the Armed Forces to continue the three single-service debates. I think that we might profitably discuss how to focus those debates in future.

Eighty years ago today, British armies in France numbered 1.7 million men and women. On 28 October 1918, they were back almost to the positions on the Franco-Belgian border where the original British expeditionary force of 120,000 men—almost overwhelmingly regulars and regular reservists, although there were a few members of the TA—were deployed in August 1914. It is mind boggling because that is the largest group of armies that the British empire has ever deployed. We will never see their like again.

Eighty years ago tonight, the 2nd battalion, Manchester Regiment was preparing plans to cross a section of the Oise-Sambre canal. In the subsequent attempt, on 4 November, Lieutenant Wilfred Owen was killed. His parents received the news on the morning of 11 November as the church bells rang to celebrate the armistice. That is a world away from us today, but resonant with images, memories and traditions for today's generation and for the modern British Army.

A number of hon. Members have been at the reception given this evening by the British Legion. I associate myself with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and other hon. Members about the British Legion's work and the work done by SSAFA—the Soldiers' Sailors' and Airmen's Families Association. I have the honour of being one of the parliamentary members of SSAFA's council.

All hon. Members who have spoken have emphasised the professionalism of the modern British Army, its very high reputation, and the stress and strain placed on today's families owing to overstretch and frequency of postings overseas—yet that is not new. What is perhaps new is the fact that service men and their families are no longer prepared just to accept it. Because they are volunteer armed forces, they will ultimately talk with their feet; so what Governments have to do is to make certain that, as far as possible, their time in the Army is made as fair as possible, and they have some idea of when their postings will take place. Alternatively, we have to restrict what we want to do with our armed forces.

It is not an either/or. This Government and previous Governments have attempted to square the circle. Yes, from 1989, Conservative Governments did cut our armed forces and I never heard a word from any of the then Opposition parties that we should maintain our armed forces at their former strength. I observed members of the then Opposition parties from the Box as a special adviser. And I did not hear them say that we should maintain our armed forces at that level.

Several hon. Members have referred to the British Army's contribution to the Gulf war. We were able to make that contribution because the British Army of the Rhine, the RAF Germany and the Royal Navy had a large enough critical mass. We should face the fact that the critical mass of our Army today imposes major limitations on what it can do. The positions outlined by the strategic defence review, of a one-shot deployment of a large division or of trying to maintain two brigades overseas at the same time, will be extremely difficult to sustain over any lengthy period without having to call up reserves or thinking about using large numbers of Territorial Army soldiers. I am sure that Ministers are only too well aware of that fact.

Our task is to hold the Government to account for the wide range of UK defence policy—financial resources, weapons, equipment, welfare and support facilities. Members of Parliament should also hold the Army to account for how it carries out its professional duties and manages itself as one of the great public services. I entirely endorse what the Chairman of the Select Committee said about not having had to serve in the armed forces in order to take a view on them. I did not agree with all that was said by the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), but he made a thoughtful contribution. However, the recent service in the Army of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) helped him to make a forceful and powerful contribution to the debate.

We must consider the Army in the wide context of the strategic defence review. The SDR must in turn be considered against a 'real cut' in the defence budget. Ministers are aware of the enormous resource constraints. The debate about the Territorial Army is not just about making it modern and usable. Like other hon. Members, I have always argued that the TA cannot be set in aspic. It is too expensive to be a museum piece, and the men and women who serve in it would not want it to be one. We know from evidence to the Select Committee and from those involved in the Regular Army and the Territorial Army that cuts in the TA are funding the expeditionary role of the Regular Army, particularly its logistic chain.

That poses a major problem for the Minister of State. We are in a consultation period during which difficult decisions will have to be made. Either he will make hardly any movement, in which case there will be broken crockery when he speaks in the House, much of it broken by his own side, or he will make a major add-back which, unless extra financial resources are provided, will mean that money will have to come from the Regular Army. I suspect that that money will have to come from the logistic chain.

If we are to have an expeditionary force capability and to take part in real power projection during the next 10 years; and if, in the words of Admiral Fisher, we are to see the Navy firing the Army once again ashore as a giant shell, the crucial element will be the logistic chain. A month ago, I was fortunate enough to observe regular and territorial soldiers in one of the largest logistics exercises that the United Kingdom has ever held. I commend all the men and women involved, particularly the commander of the support group, Brigadier Tim Cross. Logistics is not a boring area, because the logistic element precedes all others. Logistics operatives pass the fighting troops forward, and when the fighting troops are withdrawn, they are the last to leave. That is a major problem for Ministers to solve. I am afraid that, on the evidence so far of the financial constraints, and on what we have seen from the strategic defence review, the figures do not add up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury mentioned something that we have referred to time and again over the past 18 months in the debate on the SDR. Our military policy is suffering from a vacuum, if not a contradiction, in our foreign and security policy. Once again, why will Ministers not publish the foreign policy baseline?

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): Boring.

Mr. Simpson: They say that it is boring—but then why do they not publish it? It is the fundamental premise upon which the SDR is supposed to be based.

Several hon. Members mentioned the Government's disarray on European security policy over the past week. In the old Army expression, it is greatcoats on, greatcoats off; we do not know. That was reflected in some contributions from Labour Members.

There has also been disarray on foreign policy which may affect our arms exports. The disarray over our relations with Chile sends, to say the least, a strange signal to friends and allies, many of whom purchase arms from us for their self-defence and in respect of which there is a £5 billion balance in our favour that supports some 300,000 men and women in defence industry. The Government need to get their foreign and security policy well and truly thought out.

I support hon. Members on both sides of the House, in particular my hon. Friends the Members for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and for Reigate, who mentioned the importance of the qualitative nature of our Army. To use crude military jargon, the British Army is a force multiplier. That force multiplier consists in the quality of all ranks.

I agree with the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) that the backbone of the British Army has been its non-commissioned officers, who have been outstanding in peace and war. They have usually managed to get a grip of officers in a way that no senior officer could. However, I am concerned that there was a touch of old Labour class warfare in this. There were some crude interpretations of British history—upper-class twits and so on. There are resonances here from the first world war; General Melchett comes to mind. [Interruption.] If the Minister of State's laughter is a reflection of his impression of British generals today, he is sadly misled. One of our major force multipliers is the quality of our senior officers.

It is perhaps unfair to pick out two or three but I highlight high-quality senior British officers such as General Sir Jeremy Mackenzie, who is about to finish as our Deputy Supreme Allied Commander Europe. He has made a major impact on the way in which NATO has operated in Bosnia. I have to pick out General Sir Rupert Smith, General Officer Commanding Northern Ireland, who is about to become Deputy SACEUR, the outstanding professional soldier of his generation and a man who has shown great physical courage. There is also General Sir Sam Cowans, who is, I think, the first member of the Royal Signals to reach the Army Board. He will be the first chief of defence logistics and will have to deliver the efficiency savings. He will find it challenging, to say the least.

I could run down the list from the generals to the brigadiers, colonels, captains and others. They are high-quality men; I hope that there will be more women. They are our force multipliers. I refer to women because I never served in the British Army—I married into it. No one has to preach to me about the role of women in the armed forces, or about what they can or cannot do.

The British Army has fine traditions. It is a real force multiplier. It is now down to what I think is a pretty low-level critical mass. The strategic defence review has configured the Army for an expeditionary force capability.

Financial cuts and the current downturn in the economy must call into question our ability to achieve the SDR's objectives. The Army is operating in a foreign and security policy vacuum. At present, the jury is out on the SDR: the jury being the men and women serving in the Regular Army and their families. On the TA, the jury is in and is delivering a massive vote of no confidence in the Government, who have not got their policy right in this crucial area. The Minister has a few weeks to address these problems.

As in so many areas of policy—education, health and welfare—the Government raised massive expectations, spinning widely and deeply, and now comes the pay off. There are no more excuses. In the next year, our service men and women will make a judgment about whether to stay or go. They are volunteers: they are not conscripts. We all want them to stay and carry out a worthwhile and vital job. It is a vital job because no other area of Government policy is as important as defence.

One of the Secretary of State's predecessors, Lord Healey, said that we cannot have hospitals and schools without defence. I fear that for the armed forces—to paraphrase Labour's election song—things may only get worse.

9.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): I pay tribute to hon. Members for their informed contributions to the debate. They were ample testimony to the value and importance that hon. Members attach to the Army and to those who serve in it, particularly for their professionalism, as was mentioned by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson). However, the hon. Gentleman did not trust the judgment of the chiefs of staff on these matters, because he seemed to think that he had a better view than they did. He also seemed willing to spend far more money than I suspect the shadow Chancellor would consider prudent. We await some reconciliation of those views by the time we get to the debate on the Navy.

I shall have some difficulty covering all the points that were raised, so I shall write to colleagues. However, I must mention the Army equipment programme. The thorough scrutiny that was carried out during the SDR strongly confirmed the overall direction of the Army equipment programme, in particular its emphasis on increased deployability, improved reconnaissance, surveillance, communication, information systems and longer range and precision for artillery. In turn, those capabilities are closely linked to the key SDR theme of exploiting new technology, especially information technology.

Following the SDR, the equipment programme will ensure that the Army continues to be well equipped to conduct the full range of operations identified in the review, from peacekeeping to high-intensity warfighting.

Two major initiatives within the SDR will help to improve the operational effectiveness and value for money of the Army equipment programme in the years to come. The smart procurement initiative will enable us to bring equipment into operational service with the armed forces more quickly, at lower cost, and with better performance. The creation of a fully integrated defence logistics organisation under a chief of defence logistics—rightly identified by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk as General Sam Cowan—will achieve better, more effective support for the services. Most importantly, these two initiatives—along with others in the SDR—will improve the military effectiveness of the armed forces when deployed on operations. In parallel with the SDR, we have taken a number of key decisions on major equipment projects, while other projects have achieved significant milestones over recent months.

The SDR confirmed the continuing requirement for a main battle tank as a fundamental capability to enable the Army to conduct both modern conventional warfare and peace support operations in spite of some of the press reports to the contrary during the process of the SDR. We are, therefore, procuring 386 Challenger 2 tanks, to equip six strong armoured regiments of 58 tanks each for operations. I am equally pleased to say that Challenger 2 successfully met its in-service date on 30 June, with deliveries of tanks to the Royal Scots Dragoon Guards completed ahead of schedule.

The hon. Members for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) both raised queries about the tank transporter. I am advised that the transporter currently in service, the Scammell Commander, is capable of taking Challenger 2.

The SDR also confirmed the importance of the Apache attack helicopter as a key battle-winning equipment. The project is on course to meet its in-service date of December 2000, and the first flight equipped with Rolls-Royce 322 engines took place in the United States in September. The attack helicopter has been selected as one of the pilot projects for smart procurement. The hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) would not expect me to give a definitive decision tonight on that, but we shall make that announcement as soon as possible.

We have made important decisions on two key reconnaissance and target acquisition capabilities. In March, jointly with France and Germany, we placed a contract for production of the COBRA counter-battery radar system, which will allow hostile artillery to be accurately detected, located and attacked at long ranges. COBRA will provide a vital capability both for war fighting and for peacekeeping operations such as Bosnia. In July, we announced our decision to undertake a programme of work to enhance the Army's tactical reconnaissance capability. This will include studies into unmanned air vehicles, as well as participation with the United States in the TRACER—as it is properly known—programme to provide a highly mobile, stealthy manned battlefield reconnaissance capability.

In that context, I must say that I was surprised not so much at the fact that the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) did not know the title of the programme, as at her dismissive comments of the programme as toys for boys. That was rather reminiscent of the comments from the Scottish nationalist hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) about equipment programmes as the result of a mid-life crisis. We expect such comments from the Scottish nationalists, but we are slightly surprised to get them from the Conservative party. No doubt, the Front-Bench colleagues of the hon. Lady for Beckenham will have a word with her about that sort of attitude.

We expect to make further major decisions on critical new reconnaissance and communications capabilities during the coming year. ASTOR—the airborne stand-off radar—will be a joint Army-RAF long-range theatre surveillance and target acquisition system, required to operate in all weather, by day and night. BOWMAN will provide a secure communication system, for both voice and data, for all elements of the three armed services engaged in the tactical land battle. BOWMAN will also provide an essential part of our joint battlespace digitisation initiative, to maximise the operational benefits of improved communication and information systems.

We are also taking action to improve the Army's indirect fire and air defence capabilities. Building on the success of the MLRS rocket system, which played an important part in the Gulf War, in July we entered a programme with the United States, France, Germany and Italy to develop a new guided rocket, with improved range, accuracy and effectiveness. In August, we announced our decision to join the United States in a programme for development of the Marconi marine land and naval systems ultra lightweight field howitzer. Our participation in this programme will provide information to inform future decisions on artillery weapons systems. In addition, we have recently approved, subject to the satisfactory conclusion of contractual negotiations, an order for additional launchers and missiles for the high velocity missile close air defence system.

In April we announced our intention, subject to satisfactory conclusion of contractual negotiations, to proceed with development and initial production of MRAV, the multi-role armoured vehicle, to replace some of the Army's aging in-service armoured utility vehicles. That is a joint venture with France and Germany, and we hope to sign a contract soon, together with Germany and France, for that product.

In September, we placed a contract for the area weapons effects simulator, which will complete the Army's tactical simulation strategy.

In summary, key decisions have been taken and significant progress made on a number of major national and collaborative projects involving either European or US allies, or both. Those equipments are part of a coherent programme that will reinforce capabilities whose importance was confirmed in the SDR and ensure that we have an Army that is equipped, trained and ready to carry out the tasks that the SDR identified.

[Mr. John Spellar]

I turn now to points raised during the debate. If there is time, I shall return to the subject of the Territorial Army. The restructuring of Land Command and its impact on York was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Mr. Ennis) and the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). We emphasise that the purpose of the Land Command restructuring is to make the Army more effective and efficient, so that it can meet the challenges of the 21st century. That is in the forefront of our minds as my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces makes his final deliberations on the future district structure of the Army. I can assure hon. Members that we hope to be able to make the relevant announcements shortly.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: In his consideration of those important issues, will the Minister take account of the political requirement to ensure that, at a time of constitutional change in the United Kingdom, the Army in Scotland remains commanded in Scotland?

Mr. Spellar: I am absolutely certain that my hon. Friend will take account of a broad range of factors during his deliberations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) and the hon. Member for Colchester mentioned accommodation and its importance to recruitment and retention. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces made clear when he opened the debate the Government's commitment to the people who serve in the armed forces. Part of that commitment relates to their living accommodation.

The liaison team that we established during the strategic defence review to talk directly to service and civilian staff found the low standard of some of our single living accommodation for service personnel to be a significant cause of complaint. The Armed Forces Pay Review Body has also criticised the Department on that issue in the past. As a result, we are taking action to address the single living accommodation problem, and plans are now in place to raise the standard of single living accommodation across all three services over the next few years. That ties in with the reforms I announced earlier this month about relations with the construction industry.

My hon. Friends the Members for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) and for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) and the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South mentioned Gulf war and nuclear test veterans. On several occasions, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces has answered questions and demonstrated the Government's continuing commitment to addressing the concerns of Gulf veterans openly, sympathetically and seriously. We have had several debates on the subject of nuclear test veterans. I urge hon. Members who raise the issue to look at the scientific evidence produced by the highly respected National Radiological Protection Board.

The issue of ethnic minorities and their service in the armed forces was raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) and for Loughborough, the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) and the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South. My hon. Friend the Member for Hall Green will remember the introductory course we both attended at a south Birmingham college.

I have to say—particularly to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), who used the words "touchy-feely", and the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), who referred to political correctness—that there are two key drivers behind our policy in respect of ethnic minorities and equal opportunities in the armed forces. First, we want to ensure that our armed forces have the pick of the best youngsters across the board, without regard to irrelevant considerations. Only then can we achieve proper operational effectiveness. Secondly, the policy is not about political correctness or some transatlantic fad, but about the good, old-fashioned British virtues of decency and fair play. That is what we have done and what we shall continue to do. We regret that Conservative Members seem to feel that there is some political advantage in trying to carp on the matter. However, such carping demeans them far more than it undermines the process that we are undertaking.

The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough mentioned fitness in the services. We are in discussions with the Minister for Sport on that important matter. We have also devised new fitness and training regimes, to ensure that people get up to the right fitness level and are able to participate fully in the services.

This has been a timely debate. The Army has embarked on a process of change, making it a modern force that is capable of meeting our future defence needs more effectively. We have outlined how we are to achieving that goal with both equipment and people. Our policy is good for both the Army and the country, and we are proud of our part in it.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

PETITION

Social Services (Worcestershire)

10 pm

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): I wish to present a petition signed by 1,500 of my constituents who are concerned about the preservation of vital services provided to them by the social services department of Worcestershire county council, including the services provided to the many people in my constituency with learning difficulties.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

This is a petition from the Wyre Forest Committee Against Cuts.

We do not think the amount of local government money settled upon for the Worcestershire County Council is a fair amount. It directly affects the quality of services we use.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to re-examine provision for social services in Worcestershire.

And the petitioners remain etc.

The petition was organised by Mr. Chester O'Neil, of Kidderminster, whom I met earlier today in his wheelchair. I am sure that the House will wish to take very seriously his concerns and those of all users of those vital services.

To lie upon the Table.

Leasehold Valuation Tribunals

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Leasehold valuation tribunals, or LVTs, were originally introduced to provide a quick, affordable and effective means of resolving disputes between landlords and leaseholders. Introduced first to hear valuation disputes in cases of leasehold enfranchisement, their remit was extended in 1986 to hear cases involving service charges and management. A knowledgable panel to hear the case, and no power to award costs but a fixed fee of up to £500, gave leaseholders the hope that justice would come swiftly and cheaply, without the need to go through the courts, with all the attendant costs and delays.

Sadly, that hope has since turned very sour. Joan South—one dedicated and determined campaigner—recently said:

"The Leasehold Enfranchisement Association toiled for years in an attempt to make the LVTs a success. I personally attended virtually every single tribunal hearing for the first three years after the 1993 Act had become law and helped dozens of tenants prepare their cases."

She goes on:

"We . . . no longer believe that what is happening is capable of delivering justice."

Those who know Joan South, as I know my hon. Friend the Minister does, know very well that she is not a woman who gives up lightly. Why, then, has she given up on the LVT system?

It is said that justice delayed is justice denied. In just such a way, justice is being denied to literally hundreds of leaseholders. In London alone, for the 12 months from 1 September 1997 to 31 August 1998, there were 331 applications for service charge LVTs. As at 23 September 1998, the total number of cases heard was only 29. The number of decisions handed down was 11. Yesterday, I was told by an applicant that he had been advised that his case would not be heard until 2000, as there was an 18-month backlog. The LVT is not quick, but is it affordable? Mr. Rimba does not think so.

In a service charge case in which the LVT found that the landlords had overcharged approximately £3,000, Mr. Rimba ended up paying £5,000 towards the landlords' costs. Even though the landlords had previously been found guilty in the courts for not supplying section 20 details to support the service charge accounts, and, indeed, were fined for that failure, and even though that failure had rendered it impossible for Mr. Rimba to ascertain the exact instances of overcharging in the service charge accounts, the LVT, chaired by Mrs. Goulden JP, determined that, because it had "found in favour of the Applicant in respect of certain matters of contention between the parties, the Applicant was entitled to expect the service charge account to be limited to reflect this".

The LVTs were introduced with no powers to award costs; they can set only a fixed fee of up to £500.

The decision that I have just cited caused disbelief and bewilderment among professionals and leaseholders alike.

[Mr. Barry Gardiner]

Peter Haler, the chief executive of LEASE, a leasehold advisory service, said:

"What we don't understand at all is why the Tribunal allowed the £5,000 at all. Normally a 20C order will delete recharges completely."

Allowing the costs to be added to the service charge not only sets a dangerous precedent, but means that many leaseholders who might have sought redress from an LVT will have been discouraged from doing so because it is too expensive. It is not worth while for a leaseholder to fight a landlord who rips him off to the tune of £1,000 if it is going to cost him £2,000 to get justice.

Earlier this month, at a tribunal at which a tenant represented himself and 177 of his fellow leaseholders, he found ranged against him an eminent Queen's counsel, an assistant barrister and a solicitor. Such representation at an LVT, which is supposed to be a quick, efficient and cheap way of getting justice, is an abuse of its raison d'etre. It is often the wealthy landowner who can afford to employ the legal battalions; the leaseholder more often cannot.

The LVT is not affordable, but is it effective? During a previous late-night encounter on this topic in the House last December, for which my hon. Friend the Minister and I can claim anorak status, my hon. Friend informed me:

"a leasehold valuation tribunal is not an arbitral tribunal. That means that its decisions must be confirmed by a court before they can be enforced."—[Official Report, 19 December 1997; Vol. 303, c.636.]

Indeed, Lady Wilson, one of the chairs of the panels, has complained of the pre-trial reviews in the Maples Bury road case in August this year:

"We do not have the teeth to enforce adherence to the prescribed timetable."

The pre-trial review should be one of the most important and helpful parts of the whole process. It is supposed to enable one of the panel to establish the outlines of the dispute and to bring about disclosure of the relevant documentation by a particular date before the hearing. In fact, it is now rare for both parties even to attend. Frequently, critical papers are not provided, yet the tribunal has no sanction that it can apply.

The frustration that can result can be illustrated well by reporting what happened in the Rubypoint case. A notice was sent to the managers at Rubypoint that an application to appoint a new manager had been lodged with an LVT. That notice was ignored. A further notice informing Rubypoint of the pre-trial review date was also ignored. Mr. Hyam, Rubypoint's director, failed to attend. The notice for the tribunal was similarly ignored. The hearing was delayed, waiting for Mr. Hyam, who eventually turned up half an hour late, with none of the relevant papers.

The LVT was held in contempt, and it could not do a thing about it. The decision was one of the most astounding that have yet been heard in all LVTs. It was one in which a Miss Stella Evans was heard in the South South-Eastern LVT. She had applied to the LVT for a change of manager because her current manager, Mr. Hyam of Rubypoint, had been gaoled for four years for forgery and fraud for matters relating to the management, or should I say mismanagement, of Miss Evans's block. Miss Evans went to the LVT to ask for residents to be appointed as managers of their own block instead of Mr. Hyam's company, Rubypoint.

There was amazement at the decision. The chairman, a lawyer, Mr. Robert Long, ruled that the residents could manage, but would have to enter into a contract with Rubypoint to do so. In arriving at that verdict, the chairman clearly demonstrated that he had no idea of the difference between a manager and a managing agent. He had demanded that the tenants had to contract with Rubypoint, which had defrauded them as its agent, if they were to be allowed to manage their own block. Of course, he could not compel Rubypoint to contract with the manager, because it would be only the agent. In such a case, the judgment was entirely unenforceable.

Commenting on the decision, the Leasehold Advisory Service said:

"when a tribunal appoints a new manager, the landlord's management powers are removed and a contract with him therefore is inappropriate."

Other leading commentators were less diplomatic. The barrister, Mr. Michael Daiches, wrote in a letter to Peter Hayler, the chief executive of the Leasehold Advisory Service:

"the LVT appears to have gone completely haywire."

The LVT system, as it stands, came in with the hopes of literally thousands of oppressed leaseholders bearing down upon it. It came in with the expectation that it would be quick, affordable and effective. It is none of those things. It is not quick, it is not affordable and it is not effective as it stands. I urge the Government to do all they can to ensure that this deficiency is remedied as swiftly as possible, so that justice can be brought back to the people for whom it was originally intended.

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) on securing the opportunity to raise important issues relating to the work of leasehold valuation tribunals. He has been assiduous in raising concerns about leasehold problems and campaigning for reform. I should reassure the House at the outset that the Government want to see thorough and effective reform, and we are determined to achieve that objective. I know that some have said that we are not moving as fast as some leaseholders would like, but the legacy of the past few attempts at leasehold reform provides, as my hon. Friend is only too well aware, a salutary reminder of the consequences of misguided and ill-considered legislation, particularly when that legislation is introduced in a hurry. It is more important to get the legislation right for the long term. We intend to publish a consultation paper on radical proposals for reforming the structure of leasehold in the near future.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend has raised several concerns about the operation of leasehold valuation tribunals, although he did not help his case by presenting an entirely negative view of their work. His examples require careful consideration and possibly changes to the current structures, but there are many other examples in which leasehold valuation tribunals have played an important role in assisting leaseholders who otherwise would have been unable to secure justice.

Only a few months ago, my hon. Friend was pressing the Government to ensure changes to the law that would make possible the transfer of more cases from the courts to leasehold valuation tribunals, to give people easier access to swifter and cheaper justice. Therefore, while there are grounds for concern, the picture is not as bleak as my hon. Friend has painted it this evening.

Leasehold valuation tribunals were set up to provide a mechanism for resolving disputes between leaseholders and landlords. Initially, their main function was to resolve disputes over the price to be paid for acquiring the freehold of leasehold houses. Following the enactment of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993, their role was extended to cover disputes over the price payable for collective enfranchisement of flats and for new leases.

The Housing Act 1996 gave tribunals a wider role from 1 September 1997. Leaseholders or landlords can apply to a tribunal for a determination of the reasonableness of charges for services, repairs, maintenance, insurance or management. That can include costs that have already been incurred and amounts payable before costs are incurred. Leaseholders who are having severe problems with the management of their building can apply to a tribunal for the appointment of a new manager. The changes were made to ensure that some of the defects in earlier legislation, such as the procedures under the 1987 legislation for the appointment of a manager, which had not proved successful, were replaced with more accessible systems.

The tribunals are independent of the Government, and are impartial. They normally consist of three members, including at least one lawyer and one surveyor or valuer. Hearings are semi-formal, and evidence is not given on oath. They are intended to provide a simpler alternative to court proceedings. Applicants do not have to be represented by a solicitor or barrister, although either party can be so represented if they wish. Most importantly, the tribunals do not have the power to award costs, so leaseholders do not face the risk of a large bill if they lose.

I shall try to address the specific points raised by my hon. Friend in turn. He started by describing the time taken to process leasehold valuation tribunal applications. We are well aware of the concerns about the time taken for cases to be determined, but that is unavoidable to an extent, given the need to ensure that both parties have an adequate opportunity to prepare their case. There is also the simple fact that, following the 1996 Act, leasehold valuation tribunals have received a substantial number of additional cases, increasing their work load.

It is too soon to draw firm conclusions about the ability of the system to cope with the additional work load that has been created as a result of the 1986 Act. We expect the time taken by tribunals to deal with cases to reduce over time. We are not in any way complacent about that; unacceptably long delays are involved in the handling of cases. The London panel is looking to streamline the procedures in the light of experience, and so speed up the process.

We are also looking to recruit more expert and lay members to tribunals in anticipation of an increasing number of applications from leaseholders. To give my hon. Friend an idea of that, I can tell him that 37 new panel members have been appointed in the past 12 months—10 of them in London. The Government are concerned that members of the panel should be more representative of all sections of the community, so we have placed particular emphasis on encouraging the recruitment of women and members of ethnic minorities. Of the 37 new recruits, 11 are women and four are from ethnic minorities.

A further possible 40 candidates for panel membership are under consideration by the panels. Advertisements have also been placed for both lawyer chairmen and valuers. Advertisements for valuers recently appeared, and we expect interviews to be held at the end of November or early in December. We also expect appointments of new lawyer chairmen to be completed by the end of November. All those measures should help to tackle the problems that my hon. Friend has described, although, as I have stressed, we are not complacent. We are monitoring the situation closely, and planning a wider review of the rent assessment panel structure, of which tribunals are part.

As my hon. Friend will appreciate, panels have two separate roles. One is in respect of rent assessment by rent officers. Panels act as review panels—appeal bodies—against rent officer decisions. Work load in that area has declined as the number of regulated tenants who are subject to a rent officer determination of fair rent has been reducing. There are complex issues to ensure that we have sufficient people to cope with the tribunals' different responsibilities. The matter will be kept under close review.

My hon. Friend referred to several cases. I cannot comment on individual cases, but I shall briefly refer to issues arising from two of the cases that he has highlighted. The first is of Rimba v. Tennyson and Stavrou. Leasehold valuation tribunals have a discretion to make an order on such terms as they consider just and equitable, restricting the right of a landlord to recover legal costs incurred through appearance at a leasehold valuation tribunal hearing, where the terms of the lease allow the landlord to do so. There is no automatic right to an order precluding any cost recovery by that means, but we shall be looking at the issue as part of our broader monitoring of the leasehold valuation tribunal regime.

My hon. Friend mentioned costs. I am not convinced that leasehold valuation tribunals are not affordable. The purpose of setting a fee was to make it possible for leaseholders to apply, but to discourage frivolous applications from, for example, people who are simply seeking to delay payments of reasonable sums. The maximum fee is £500. It is often possible for leaseholders in the same block to share the costs of a single application, thereby substantially reducing their own liability.

I accept that the level of fees may discourage some applications. We have been particularly concerned about anti-competitive insurance arrangements, where the level of fee required to take the matter to a leasehold valuation tribunal may be disproportionate to the leaseholder's potential saving. We intend to address that issue in our forthcoming consultation paper on leasehold issues.

My hon. Friend also referred to the difficulties that some lay applicants who are unrepresented may encounter when confronted with landlords represented by several lawyers, possibly including Queen's counsel. One of the objectives of the leasehold valuation tribunal regime is that proceedings should be reasonably informal, so that leaseholders can appear in person without the expense of professional representation.

[Mr. Nick Raynsford]

We certainly expect the leasehold valuation tribunals to treat people fairly and impartially, and not to allow their judgment to be influenced in any way by the presence of legal representatives on the other side. As I have said, one reason why the transfer of cases from the courts to the leasehold valuation tribunals was favoured was to allow for more informal hearings, with less risk of leaseholders being intimidated by deep-pocketed landlords who can afford expensive legal representation. We certainly want leasehold valuation tribunals to ensure real fairness between the parties in that respect.

My hon. Friend referred to the case involving Stella Evans and Rubypoint. Again, I cannot comment on an individual case, especially as I understand that, in that case, an application for a variation of the tribunal's order has been made. However, we are aware of the broader concerns about the way in which some tribunals are handling applications for the appointment of a manager, and I can assure my hon. Friend, and the House, that we want tribunals to establish workable arrangements in what can be a confrontational situation. The issue is not straightforward, and we intend to address it in our forthcoming consultation paper.

I hope that what I have said has assured my hon. Friend and the other hon. Members here that the Government take seriously the question of equity in the relations between landlords and leaseholders. We have an ambitious programme of reform, which we shall outline in the consultation paper; in the meantime, we shall examine closely the way in which leasehold valuation tribunals discharge their responsibilities.

I entirely accept that there are some difficulties associated with the novelty of the experience for leasehold valuation tribunals taking on work in areas in which they have no previous experience, and with the volume of cases being brought to their attention.

Difficulties may occur as a result, but we are determined that the leasehold valuation tribunal system will develop so as to be able to respond sympathetically and successfully to the new challenges that it faces, and to ensure that leaseholders and landlords get swift and effective justice at a reasonable price. We shall do all we can to ensure that the tribunal system meets its intended objectives.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was asked—

Exports (North-east)

1. Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): When he plans to meet business leaders in the north-east to discuss export prospects for the region. [55050]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Brian Wilson): On 9 October, I launched a nationwide "listening to exporters" tour with a meeting in Glasgow and will visit Birmingham, Manchester and the south-east during December. I also intend to hold a similar meeting in the north-east, where I hope to meet a number of leading industrialists and exporters, including Michael Stephenson of Helena Biosciences and Peter Joliffe of Loblite Ltd., who is also chairman of the North East of England Export Club, which has some 600 members.

Mr. Atkinson: I predict that the Minister will have an ear bashing when he arrives in the north-east. The exporters will complain that the strong pound, high interest rates, new Labour taxes and new Labour regulations are destroying their businesses. Is he aware of yesterday's report by the Northern Development Company, which showed that, in the north-east, two jobs were being lost for every one created? What does that mean for the promises that Labour made before the election? What sort of new deal is that for the people of the north-east?

Mr. Wilson: I am not exactly astonished that the hon. Gentleman chooses to look on the gloomy side of everything, but I refer him to the fact that, in the past two months alone, 5,000 new jobs have been announced in the north-east, including 1,500 in manufacturing industries. I draw his attention to the success of companies such as Solarsolve Marine in South Shields, which has just won the export award for smaller businesses. If he does not find that company—it will probably be away successfully selling its products—he could go to Immunodiagnostic Systems Ltd. of Bowden, NWC Precision Engineers Ltd. of Stanley or Eclipse Translations Ltd. of Alnwick, which are all major export success stories.

The hon. Gentleman must be well pleased with the fall in unemployment in his constituency since the general election. Ear bashings are always welcome, as they are part of the process of dialogue, but most sensible people can see the wider story—they know the world circumstances as well as the success stories in this country that are countering such difficulties.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): My hon. Friend should take no lessons from the Conservative party, which, in 1981–82, destroyed a third of the north-east's manufacturing jobs in 18 months. Will he respond positively to the competitiveness agenda recently put forward by business, enterprise and representatives of employees in the north-east, so that the north-east—as the region that exports more per head than any other region of Britain—can continue its splendid exporting record and take its good exporting tradition right down to small and medium enterprises in the way that he has described, with a robust interventionism?

Mr. Wilson: The positive and constructive note struck by my hon. Friend is much more representative of the spirit of the north-east than is the carping of the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), who I think is the only Tory Member left in the region, which tells its own story about what happened before the general election. Unemployment has continued to fall, but we face difficult exporting conditions. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman thinks that we can be immune from a world situation in which, for example, exports to the Philippines and Thailand have dropped by three fifths, to South Korea and Malaysia by a half and to Japan, Singapore and Indonesia by more than a fifth. Those figures are not a result of circumstances in the north-east; they are a result of circumstances in Asia, from which we are not immune. We all have to work that much harder and be that much more competitive, and many companies in the north-east are meeting that challenge. The Government will continue to respond to the message of my hon. Friend about constructive dialogue with everyone involved in industry and job creation.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Has the Minister, who has had much to read in his new job, had time to look at the Anglo-Portuguese News, which reported on 1 October that, in the same month as Siemens closed a plant in the north-east, it opened a plant in Evora in Portugal with 400 new jobs, specifically on the grounds of labour costs? The export from the north-east has been jobs.

Will the Minister ask the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, who are both north-eastern Members, how long they intend to sit here like local Neros, fiddling while an estimated 16,000 manufacturing jobs are to be lost in the region in the year to come?

Mr. Wilson: I must confess that I have read only the English version of that report. The lesson that I would draw from it is that it refers to a different product, different jobs and, presumably, a different system of financial support. If the Tory party is still sending out the message that we can attain immunity from world economic circumstances by some mystical process if we cut wages and conditions to the bone, it will receive exactly the same answer from the whole country as it received from the north-east at the general election.

Renewable Energy

2. Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): What plans he has to increase the target set for renewable energy output in 2010. [55052]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Dr. Kim Howells): We undertook in our manifesto a commitment to a new and strong drive to develop renewable energy sources. As a first step, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry announced the fifth and largest non-fossil fuel obligation, or NFFO 5, order of 1,177 MW on 24 September 1998.

For the future, we are reviewing what would be necessary and practicable to achieve 10 per cent. of the United Kingdom's electricity needs from renewables by 2010, and what contribution new and renewable energy technologies might make to future greenhouse gas commitments.

Mr. Dafis: Does the Minister agree that, as the climate change conference in Buenos Aires approaches, renewables must become the main source of energy supply in the UK—well above the 10 per cent. target—as a central part of the climate change strategy? Will he try to convince the Chancellor that it is terribly important that the renewable energy review be published soon, to give us a stable framework for investment, economic development and jobs? There are tremendous opportunities that we simply cannot afford to miss. Specifically, does he agree that we need to unlock the mechanisms for bio-energy, which could make an important contribution to the revitalisation of rural economies and to farm diversification, which is especially important at the moment?

Dr. Howells: Discussions have taken place between officials in my Department and in other Departments—the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, for example—to consider the possibility of developing the new energy crops. The thought of hard-pressed farmers in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in mine being able to supplement their incomes by growing energy crops and helping to combat greenhouse gas emissions is extremely attractive. I am confident that we will publish the review shortly and that there will be a full debate on the future of renewables. Whether we can produce a majority of our energy via renewables is another matter. Merely to reach the 10 per cent. target we have to produce 5 GW of electricity, and if that means covering Wales in windmills, I, for one, will not have it.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): My hon. Friend will be aware of the European Commission's interest in renewable energy output. Will his Department work with our European partners to consider the barriers to renewable energy output that are created by some of the European mechanisms? Can he assure me that the previous Government's cuts in renewable research funding have been reversed?

Dr. Howells: My hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry has certainly reversed those cuts. I am absolutely confident that this vital research will be carried out and that we will become the driving force in Europe for renewables. We have great resources. We have ample opportunity, for example, to develop offshore wind generators, and I am sure that that is what we will do. I am extremely interested in the idea of biomass and energy crops. There is a great future for that in this country.

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire): The NFFO 5 round is welcome, as is anything that can give greater opportunity for renewables. Does the Minister not agree, however, that the problem is not the size of the round but the lack of success of the projects that have been initiated? Of the bids accepted, perhaps less than 50 per cent. have gone through to produce renewable energy. Would the Minister consider mechanisms whereby the bids can be promoted up the scale on the basis not simply of cost but of the projects' chances of success?

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. It is absolutely vital both that there is a concept and that we look carefully at the delivery systems. With wind power, as happens all too often, what looked like a viable scheme was smashed apart off the Scottish coast and suddenly it became wholly unfashionable. We will get nowhere with that sort of short-term view. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that that the research and development element is extremely important, but the entrepreneurial element is important, too. We must consider that carefully.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): I understand why the Minister does not wish to cover Wales with windmills, but has he any plans to develop offshore wind power? Has he received any representations on that?

Dr. Howells: I understand that my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry has received a good many representations on projects for looking at offshore wind generation. After all, we have plenty of resources for it. There is plenty of wind around. There is wind in other quarters, too. I have often thought that the most effective bit of generation would come if we could ever wire up the Chamber: we could probably keep a large part of London going.

EU Structural Funds

3. Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): What assessment he has made of the prospects for securing objective 1 status for United Kingdom regions in the next round of negotiations on EU structural funds. [55053]

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): On the basis of the Commission's proposals and the latest Eurostat figures, it appears likely that a number of UK areas will be eligible for objective 1 status. Detailed negotiations of the regulations are currently under way between member states and the Commission. The Cardiff Council set a deadline of the end of March 1999 for agreement on the Agenda 2000 proposals.

Mr. George: I thank the Minister for her reply. I am sure that she is aware just how anxious are the regions, which have to put together the programmes and the programming documents, that those matters should be brought to a conclusion and objective 1 regions confirmed as soon as possible. Can she confirm that the Secretary of State is as enthusiastic as his predecessor was to bring those matters to a conclusion; that she will meet a delegation from Cornwall, as requested by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) recently; and that for regions such as Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly, this matter will be given the highest priority prior to the Dresden conference next year?

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman knows how hard the Government have been fighting the United Kingdom case on structural funds. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was present for last week's debate on this subject, but, during that debate, all parties congratulated the Government and the Secretary of State on their tough stance. I can assure the House that the Government will do all that we can to get the fairest possible outcome for the UK and all its regions.

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that, although much progress has been made on Merseyside, gross domestic product per capita still remains at three quarters of that of Europe as a whole? Does she therefore agree that the continuation of objective 1 status is essential for that region and that the same applies with assisted area status for the whole of Merseyside, including the Wirral?

Mrs. Roche: As regards structural funds and objective 1 status, the figures are encouraging for Merseyside. The House will know that, on assisted area status, we have a review of the map, as the Commission requires us to do. Every hon. Member has been sent a copy of the review and I urge all hon. Members to respond to it. The closing date is tomorrow.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Would not the disparities in wealth that exist within our country, which are significant, be even greater were we to accept a single currency? The differences in economic performance within the United Kingdom with our single interest rate are as nothing compared with differences in wealth within a Europe with a single currency where a single rate of interest would not be universally appropriate.

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman tempts me, and perhaps I can say that we probably have rather different views on the European question. What we have in common is a determination to get the best possible deal for the United Kingdom, which is why, in the negotiations, we are arguing, particularly in relation to objective 2 status, for maximum flexibility, so that we can hone our efforts towards particular areas of deprivation. That certainly will be to the benefit of all regions of the United Kingdom.

Aerospace Industry

4. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): What representations he has received from United Kingdom aerospace companies concerning difficulties in securing Federal Aviation Authority approval. [55054]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Brian Wilson): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this important matter. The problem was brought to my Department's attention by the Consortium of Lancashire Aerospace, and the Society of British Aerospace Companies has also written to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions about it. I understand that DETR has taken the matter up with the US Federal Aviation Authority.

Mr. Prentice: That does not surprise me because it is an immensely serious issue, not just for the Consortium of Lancashire Aerospace, but for aerospace companies across the United Kingdom, as the business is worth about £200 million a year. The long and the short of the matter is that American companies can repair British and European aircraft in the United States, but we cannot always repair American aircraft. The Federal Aviation Authority has been dragging its feet systematically for years and failing to appoint the inspectors that are required in the United Kingdom to ensure that there is a level playing field in aerospace. I urge my hon. Friend to take the matter up with his colleagues in the Department of Transport, and resolve it.

Mr. Wilson: I endorse everything that my hon. Friend says. He is right to raise the issue at every opportunity. He will also appreciate that DETR is the lead Ministry in those matters. I understand that the information that DETR has received is that, by the end of the year, the FAA should be able to devote more resources to approval issues, so it is to be hoped that the position will change and the approval of servicing facilities in the United States will proceed. We are certainly aware of the importance of the issue to UK aerospace companies and are keeping in touch with DETR. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to stress the importance of the industry and the issue to the British economy.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): What we seek is that the FAA should act fairly and impartially as a regulator. Does the Minister agree that the Government's hand would be strengthened if the Secretary of State could be seen to be acting fairly and impartially in his own regulatory role vis-a-vis sponsors of the dome, which include British Aerospace and GEC? Can he explain why the Secretary of State will not follow the advice in a leading article in the pink paper, the Financial Times, calling on the Secretary of State to hand over responsibility for the dome to a Government colleague and thereby

"avoid the appearance of impropriety"?

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman has a very loud voice, but that does not guarantee that he will say anything sensible. As he very well knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acted impeccably on the advice of officials. He will continue to do so and is well aware of the importance of the issues. Everything is transparent and above board—exactly what could not be said of the previous Administration, whom the hon. Gentleman supported.

Small and Medium Enterprises

5. Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): If he will make a statement on his Department's work in supporting high-technology small and medium enterprises. [55055]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): High-technology SMEs are crucial to Britain's economic success and the enterprise and innovation which are needed to generate them will be at the heart of the forthcoming competitiveness White Paper. The Department's current support for high-technology SMEs includes grants for research and technology transfer through schemes such as the small firms merit award for research and technology—SMART—improving their financial management and marketing skills through advice and support from the business links network, and advising on how to access private finance and working with the financial community to improve the quality of appropriate finance available. We aim to extend and improve that support and we shall do so.

Mr. White: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that one of the key problems for many small high-tech companies is the gap between coming up with the idea and the innovation and being ready to go to the market to get venture capital? There is a difficulty with securing funds. Does my right hon. Friend recognise that many small companies face the barrier that financial institutions and civil servants are ultra-cautious? Will he ensure that those barriers are addressed in the forthcoming White Paper on competitiveness?

Mr. Mandelson: We shall certainly address all those issues in the White Paper. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's comments about the paramount importance of providing finance for small and medium enterprises. We certainly need more technology banking in the United Kingdom, and if we were better able to have our banks acting as investors, perhaps in a more competitive banking sector, we might be able to achieve an altogether better service.

I also agree that we need well-performing capital markets and mechanisms to provide finance through successive stages of enterprise growth. I welcome the positive and practical proposals made in that context by the British Venture Capital Association. We shall follow up those proposals, and others, in the forthcoming White Paper.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Will the Secretary of State have a word with his opposite number at the Department for Education and Employment about the perhaps excessively complicated overseas labour section rules on overseas work permits? They are cumbersome and difficult for small high-tech companies, in which the acquisition of an overseas employee may frequently be crucial to growth.

Mr. Mandelson: That is an extremely good point, and it is well taken. On my recent visit to the United States, I spoke with entrepreneurs who managed new high-tech businesses in Silicon valley, and I was struck by how many of those enterprises got off the ground using people who had gone to the USA from around the world and who had the skills and entrepreneurial flair necessary for the success of such enterprises. If there are blockages in the system, in relation to either the Department for Education and Employment or the Home Office, they will be closely scrutinised by my Department.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, South): May I welcome those comments? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in comparison with the position in the United States, too few companies spin off from United Kingdom university sites and engineering bases? Will he talk to his colleagues at the Department for Education and Employment about ensuring that academics in British universities are encouraged to work more with business so that there are more academic entrepreneurs and more entrepreneurial universities?

Mr. Mandelson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. One of the key objectives of the Government, and of my Department, is to turn universities from ivory towers into business partners. That practice has been successfully followed in the United States, and we could do with more of it here. My hon. Friend will not be disappointed by the measures that we shall propose in the White Paper.

Mr. Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare): Is the Secretary of State aware that, by 16 October, only 194 people had been trained as millennium bug busters? The Prime Minister suggested that we would have 20,000 by April 1999, but at that rate we shall not have that number until 2050. Would the Secretary of State care to comment?

Mr. Mandelson: If the previous Administration had recognised the problem of the millennium bug and had done more to prepare by carrying out measures that were needed long before we were able to begin on them, we would be in a better position. The Government have moved with alacrity to put necessary measures in place. I recently met Mr. Don Cruickshank, who is directing Action 2000, and if the Government need to take any further steps to ensure that we are properly prepared to overcome the problem, we shall certainly do so.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I welcome the Secretary of State to his first departmental Question Time, although the fact that it is his first shows how little accountability the Government have. High-tech businesses are already being sandbagged by higher taxes, higher interest rates, an erratic sterling and a massive increase in regulation introduced by the Government. Will the Secretary of State tell us whether high-tech businesses will be in for a pounding from his predecessor's proposals on trade union reform, or whether he will water down those proposals in the light of strong business opinion against them? I have read stories in the press both ways. Some newspapers of a leftward inclination say that the right hon. Gentleman is standing by every dot and comma of his predecessor's proposals to suit the left of his party; others say that he will water them down because business does not want them. The Secretary of State has said, "No more spin, honest." Will he now, loud and clear, tell us whether he is standing by every word or watering them down? Honesty is the best policy—in all things.

Mr. Mandelson: I am tempted to say that that is rich coming from the right hon. Gentleman. I reassure him, and anyone else who is interested in the fairness at work proposals in the White Paper, that they are designed to encourage partnership in industry and at places of work. We want to encourage in all those employed in firms and companies a commitment to their success and profitability. That is what the proposals were designed to do. I am sure that, in translating those measures into the Bill that will be published by the end of the year, we will be faithful to the tenets and principles set out in the White Paper and, as a result enjoy considerable support and good will from all parts of the business community.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Will the forthcoming measures recognise the credibility gap that exists—certainly in the west midlands—between his Department's assessment and administration of grants and the great length of time that it often takes for companies to benefit from them? If the gap is recognised, what measures will the Secretary of State take to overcome it?

Mr. Mandelson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing that to my attention. If he has any specific cases in his inside pocket, or anywhere else about his person, I hope that he will draw them to my attention. It is no part of the Government's responsibility, in making much-needed financial and other assistance available to companies, to let it be held up by poor administration.

Social Chapter

6. Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): What his Department estimates to be the cost of the social chapter's parental leave directive, works councils directive and part-time work directive to British business. [55056]

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): Compliance cost assessments were attached to the explanatory memorandums submitted to this House and another place on 28 October 1997 in relation to the parental leave and European works councils directives and on 17 March in relation to the part-time work directive. The Government are carrying out further work to update and refine those estimates.

Mr. Brady: I cannot thank the Minister for the detail of his reply because it was somewhat lacking. Given that Ministers have recently had the experience of BMW stating that it must cut jobs at Rover because of higher business and employment costs, does he accept in principle that the increased costs that he is applying to business will cost jobs and will he give some estimate of how many jobs the proposals will cost?

Mr. McCartney: If the hon. Gentleman had been doing his job over the summer, he would have read the documents set out in my answer. The Confederation of British Industry said, in the last year of the Conservative Government, that British industry lost £25 billion through unregulated absenteeism, a huge on-cost to business affecting its competitive advantage. Our proposals will help to cut such unregulated activity and ensure a better atmosphere in the workplace between employers and employees. On investment in this country, we have just had the biggest increase in inward investment in the past 20 years: more than 600 projects, including a new multi-million pound project in the car industry at Jaguar, which I was pleased and proud to have negotiated between Ford and the Government.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): Do not those three directives represent a small increase in protection for people in the workplace? Could not that protection be better obtained by enhancing the role of trade unions in the workplace? Will my hon. Friend go a little further than the Secretary of State and confirm that there will be no significant alterations to the principles outlined in the "Fairness at Work" White Paper?

Mr. McCartney: There were very good discussions between my comrades in the Confederation of British Industry and the TUC. One could not put a trade union card between me and my right hon. Friend on those matters.

From day one, the Government have set out their stall regarding partnership in the workplace, including employment rights. Employment rights are about not whether workers are union members but the right to be treated properly in the workplace, irrespective of union membership. If a worker is a union member and wishes to be recognised as such, the legislation sets out the relevant proposals clearly and specifically. My right hon. Friend has confirmed today that the Government will proceed, as we promised, to set out a framework for partnership in the workplace, which includes trade union representation.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Before the Minister slips up again and perhaps mentions the "socialist" word in the Chamber, will he tell us how many redundancies will occur and how many businesses will go to the wall before the Government conclude that it is not extra regulations and burdens that create jobs but deregulation and competitive conditions that allow businesses to create extra jobs?

Mr. McCartney: That is a bit rich coming from a member of a Government who cast regulation after regulation upon business.

Since Labour came to power, 400,000 new jobs have been created in the economy. We have put in place the biggest job investment and training package to help young people get off the scrapheap on to which they were thrown by Conservative Members. The hon. Gentleman knows full well—as one of the biggest offenders in his almost creeping defence of the previous Government in a failed attempt to serve on their Front Bench—that, when the Conservative Government could not hide the level of unemployment, they tried to fiddle their way out of it. That is why the Conservatives are in opposition and we are in government.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): Do we not need those measures to restore some basic fairness in the workplace, and do we not also need a sensible and rational debate about what level and scale of social protection is compatible with the enterprise economy? In that light, does my hon. Friend agree that the simplistic party political posturing on this issue that we see from the Conservatives—who oppose any form of regulation, wherever it occurs, under whatever circumstances—is completely wrong and unhelpful to the debate?

Mr. McCartney: My hon. Friend is right. That is why the British business community and the Government are absolutely committed to the principle of achieving competitive advantage by not spiralling down wages and conditions but by investing in a trained and skilled work force that is dedicated to the enterprise and its success. Only Conservative Members maintain the principle that Britain can succeed only by becoming the sweatshop capital of Europe. We reject that principle, as do the British people and British business.

Interest Rates

7. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): What research his Department has undertaken on the cost to British industry of increases in interest rates. [55058]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): The tough and decisive action by the Government, including taking the politics out of interest rate setting, will create the long-term economic stability that industry needs and ensure that Britain steers a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world.

Mr. Bercow: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that small businesses, which make up more than 90 per cent. of all enterprises in Britain, do not ordinarily pay the implausible interest rates that Ministers habitually parrot in this Chamber. but typically pay 11 per cent. or more on their overdrafts and other business borrowings? What confidence can business men and women, who face the prospect of a deepening economic crisis and who strive daily to keep their heads above water, have in Ministers who fail woefully to understand the real interest rates that real businesses must pay daily in the real world?

Mr. Mandelson: Under the previous Administration, a small business closed every three minutes as a result of the economic policies pursued by that Government. The hon. Gentleman has to understand that industry as a whole—small, medium and larger companies—would stand to lose a great deal more if the Government were to allow the economy to lurch back into the stop-go policies of the past. If we had failed to take the prompt and decisive action that we have taken since coming into office, industry would pay a higher cost in interest rates in future years. That is exactly what happened when interest rates reached 15 per cent. in the early 1990s, precisely because the Government failed to take the necessary action early enough to avoid that happening.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil): I welcome my right hon. Friend to the Dispatch Box. What advice will his Department be giving the Monetary Policy Committee now that inflation has been settling at around 2.5 per cent? Can we now look forward to the Government—particularly the Department responsible for manufacturing industry—giving a clear signal, as they are entitled to do in their advice to the MPC, that this is the time for interest rates to start falling even further than last month's welcome quarter of a per cent. cut?

Mr. Mandelson: As my hon. Friend has said, it is the MPC that sets interest rates to meet the Government's inflation target. In doing so, the committee takes account of all available information, some of which comes from my Department. The Government will continue to give the committee full support in whatever difficult decisions on interest rates it has to take. In announcing its last quarter of a per cent. cut in rates, the committee noted that the international economic and financial environment had deteriorated and the outlook for demand had weakened. I am sure that, in view of that, the decision that the committee took was a wise one. I am also sure that that wisdom will continue to be shown in all its decisions.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Is the Secretary of State aware that our interest rates are more than double those in France and Germany, making it extremely difficult for our manufacturing businesses to compete? Is he aware that the Bank of England has cited two Government policies as being especially damaging, leading it to leave interest rates higher than manufacturing can afford? The Bank has cited the coming minimum wage and the impact that it thinks that that will have on wage inflation higher up the scale. In addition, it has cited the big increase in public spending—my right hon. and hon. Friends and I have always criticised the surge in welfare spending over which the Government are presiding.

Why will not the Secretary of State and his colleagues now release us from the pressures of the minimum wage? Why will he not restore family credit, instead of introducing the working families tax credit scheme, which is so much dearer? Does he not realise that the Bank of England would be more relaxed about Government policy if he did so? The Bank would see that expenditure and wages were under better control and it could then start to cut interest rates, as business wants. That is what business desperately needs from him and his colleagues.

Mr. Mandelson: On the subject of public spending, the right hon. Gentleman needs to have a word with his colleagues in the shadow Cabinet, especially the shadow Secretaries of State for Education and Employment and for Health, both of whom have been complaining that the Government, far from spending too much, are spending too little. By what voice should we judge the policies and approach of the Opposition? They speak with many voices and they need to clarify exactly what their view is.

As for the national minimum wage, I note that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to continue the policy of his predecessors, which is to support poverty wages in this country. I have certainly had no sign at all from the Governor of the Bank, who in conversation offered a view on that very subject, that the national minimum wage has been wrongly set. The real disaster for the economy would be to retreat to the boom-and-bust policies of the previous Administration, which did such enormous and long-term damage to British jobs and British prosperity.

Mr. Redwood: Perhaps if the Secretary of State read the minutes of the Monetary Policy Committee, he and his colleagues would start to relieve the pressure on businesses, as they need him to do. Will he stop peddling false rumours about the Opposition's position? All of us—the Leader of the Opposition, the shadow Chancellor, the relevant spokesmen and myself—support improved provision for health and education. We all condemn the wasteful rake's progress and breaking of promises on welfare. If the right hon. Gentleman sorted out those matters and read the minutes of the MPC, industry might not have to suffer so much.

Mr. Mandelson: The right hon. Gentleman is obviously determined to add bluster to his policies of boom and bust. The Conservative party's spin doctors are responsible for sorting out the rival positions of members of the shadow cabinet; I am glad that I moved on from that responsibility some time ago.

Employment Opportunities (Small Business)

8. Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): What plans he has to increase employment opportunities in small businesses. [55059]

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): The creation of new employment in small businesses is dependent primarily on a climate of stable, sustained economic growth. The Government have taken decisive action to establish a new framework for monetary policy to ensure economic stability.

The Government are also committed to helping businesses to overcome financial, regulatory and other barriers to growth.

Mr. Heppell: My hon. Friend will be aware that many small businesses in Nottingham have sensibly taken advantage of the Government's new deal to ensure that they have a well-trained and highly motivated work force. Has she made an assessment of the importance of the new deal in creating employment opportunities?

Mrs. Roche: My hon. Friend makes a good point about the opportunities offered by the new deal for people gaining employment and for small and medium enterprises. More than three quarters of the 25,000 employers who have signed up to the new deal are small companies, which means that they are often, valuably, filling gaps and creating necessary skilled jobs. That is why the new deal has been so warmly welcomed by small businesses.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My question seriously follows up earlier questions and is relevant to this matter. Does the Minister agree that the best way for the Government to encourage additional employment by small businesses would be to change the guidelines and criteria of the Monetary Policy Committee so as to enable it, under the Governor of the Bank of England, Eddie George, to reduce interest rates to make them competitive for companies in this country? I am following up the request made, in person, of the Government and the Secretary of State by the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill), who chairs the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. Is it not important for us to consider interest rates, because they are so fundamental to investment by small businesses which would increase employment?

Mrs. Roche: I know that the hon. Gentleman has an impressive record of support for manufacturing industry and interest in small businesses. I know from my extensive discussions with small businesses and my visits to them that the most important factor for them is economic stability. Nothing was more damaging than the record of the previous Government, which saw us going from boom to bust and back again. We need a period of stability, which is exactly what the Government are providing.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Will my hon. Friend remind the Opposition that, if we want to know about long-term competitive conditions for small businesses, we must consider long-term interest rates? For many years under the previous Administration, we suffered from penal long-term interest rates. Since Labour came to power, we have started to reduce those rates, which is good for large, medium and small businesses.

Mrs. Roche: My hon. Friend is right, and he speaks with many years' knowledge of this matter. It is essential that all businesses, but particularly small and medium businesses, know what conditions will be, not only for the next few weeks but for the next few months. We are providing that stability and certainty.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Does the Minister recall her colleague, the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities, saying, when in opposition, that, if Britain dragged behind its Community partners on economic and monetary union it "would be a serious blow . . . would make Britain a" far

"less attractive place" to invest in and would jeopardise even

"more jobs"?—[Official Report, 24 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 964.]

Does she agree with him?

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman knows precisely what the Government have said about economic and monetary union. The key thing that we must do at the moment is to prepare all our businesses—small, medium or large—for the fact that there will be 300 million consumers in the euro zone. The key thing that the Government must make up for is the deficiency of the previous Government, who wasted precious time squabbling among themselves instead of acting for the country, and thereby let those small businesses down. That is why we are doing so much work on preparing our businesses, so that they can take true competitive advantage of the euro zone when it comes into being on 1 January.

Steel Industry

10. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): If he will make a statement on the prospects for the steel industry. [55061]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): The UK steel industry is facing pressures from international competition, but it is one of the success stories of the British economy. It is one of the most efficient and productive steel industries in the world. The industry continues to attack its cost base to ensure that it remains profitable and is better able to compete at home and overseas.

Helen Jackson: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. He may be aware that the plant at Stocksbridge in my constituency is one of the most efficient producers of special engineering steel in the country and in Europe, and that it fulfils more than 50 per cent. of the needs of the home market for that type of steel, which provides the vital bits and pieces in car engines and aero-engines that we all depend on. However, by its nature, it requires stability and consistency in its supply chain and its energy costs. What will the Government do to help provide that consistency and stability, to ensure that Stocksbridge remains one of the prime manufacturing locations in the country?

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend is right in the way in which she describes the success of that company and of that plant. I shall happily—as I would expect to do—learn a great deal more of its success when I visit Sheffield later today, when I shall probably meet representatives, if not of that company, at least of the steel industry in Sheffield. The UK steel industry has undergone substantial restructuring since the 1970s, but productivity has increased fourfold and it continues to invest more than £350 million a year in new plant and innovation. I believe that, with that commitment to productivity, to investment and to increasing the industry's competitiveness, we shall continue to see further success. It will certainly have the full support of my Department.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): The Minister mentioned visits. I wonder whether he will shortly visit a country that is one of the most attractive and growing markets for British steel because of the careful way in which it has balanced political and economic forces—Chile?

Mr. Mandelson: I have no plans to visit Chile, although, if I had been able to add a visit to it to my forthcoming visit to Brazil and Argentina in the time available, I should have been only too pleased to do so.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): In welcoming my right hon. Friend to his post, may I tell him of the dismay and desperation of steelworkers at the Shotton works in my constituency, who see yet more redundancies on the horizon? How might he help the industry and Shotton with regard to energy costs and to dumping from the far east of steel products? I know that he will not tell steelworkers in my constituency to sharpen up their act, because they are the most competitive, productive and co-operative—and have been the most successful—steelworkers that one could imagine. In 1980, they suffered 8,000 direct steel job losses in just two months. I know that he will do all that he can to help them.

Mr. Mandelson: I should never dream of simply asking any work force in any company to sharpen up its act. I should, however, always say to any company, all those who are employed in it and particularly all those who manage it and are responsible for its long-term strategic direction, to raise their game and performance and sharpen up their act. That injunction is well taken.

In the case of any redundancies in any industry or locality, the local Employment Service will work closely with the companies concerned and the resettlement consultants appointed. We take that responsibility seriously.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the EU Commission is responsible for taking any anti-dumping action and, in working with the EU Commission, we shall consider each complaint on its merits.

Brewing Industry

11. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): What assessment he has made of the impact of the provisions of the Competition Bill [Lords] on employment in the brewing industry. [55063]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Dr. Kim Howells): We have a fine brewing industry which understands the need for all sectors to be capable of taking on international competition. I should expect the Bill's provision of a more effective regime to help in that respect by deterring and tackling anti-competitive agreements and conduct in the brewing industry as in every other. It will lead to a more competitive market, which will provide the basis for greater employment opportunities.

Mr. Gray: I think that I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, although I am concerned that he seems to be reconfirming that agreements between breweries and tied houses will be within the provisions of the Bill—something that was not clear before. I am particularly concerned about the agreements between small country breweries, such as Wadworth and Arkell's in my constituency, and the country pubs. Will those agreements be within the terms of the Bill or not?

Dr. Howells: Yes, they will be. On supply agreements, we have received notice that the European Commission intends to take a favourable view of a number of standard United Kingdom pub leases. Formal exemption decisions will be expected in the next few months.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the growth in small and independent breweries throughout Britain, which will benefit not only from the proposals in the Competition Bill but from the legislation due on 1 November on late payment to companies, a crucial factor affecting the success of small businesses? It will help to create not only a better environment for the future but a business culture and climate in which late payment is unacceptable.

Dr. Howells: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We are the first Government to tackle successfully the question of late payment. We have raised it as an issue and acted upon it. Given the Conservative party's attitude to the brewing industry, the question is a bit rich coming from them. Just last July, Conservative Members talked out a private Member's Bill that would have allowed every beer drinker in Britain to have a proper measure of beer. How many more jobs in the brewing industry would that have created? In everything the Conservative party touches, it short-changes consumers and workers. We put consumers and workers at the centre of everything that we do.

Libya

12. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What representations he has received from the British-Libyan business group concerning actions taken since July 1998 by the Libyan Government against UK firms involved in work in Libya. [55065]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Brian Wilson): The Secretary of State has received two letters from Mr. Kevin Boyle, chairman of the British-Libyan business group, covering several points on UK Libyan trade. Those have not included specific references to actions taken by the Libyan Government.

Mr. Dalyell: What was the Department's understanding about an embargo against British goods and services in relation to the great man-made river project, possibly the biggest engineering project in Africa? Will my hon. Friend discuss with Kevin Boyle the problem surrounding visas, which is a great difficulty for British business men in what is a potentially lucrative, once British, market?

Mr. Wilson: As my hon. Friend is well aware, those issues do not take place within a vacuum. I am well aware of the potential and the past trade with Libya. If the other issues could be resolved, as I am sure my hon. Friend wishes, and I and the Government wish, it would be extremely healthy and positive for our relations with Libya, including our commercial relations.

I am not aware of an embargo on British contracts in connection with the great man-made river. The Department receives many inquiries from British firms about it and we give them balanced advice. Problems with visas should not arise for legitimate business people and, if they do, I would be pleased to discuss them further. I shall ask my officials to speak to Mr. Boyle on those matters.

Fairness at Work

13. Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham): what representations he has received on the fairness at work White Paper. [55066]

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): The Department has received 474 responses, reflecting a wide range of views, to the White Paper on fairness at work published on 21 May. I have placed a list of respondents in the Library of the House.

Mr. Marsden: I assume that all sides in British industry have replied to the proposals. Will my hon. Friend lend his support to making partnerships in British industry work? As a former manager in British industry, I have seen the damage caused by conflict and disagreement. We need far more compromise and reconciliation. What are my hon. Friend's views on the proposed partnership fund?

Mr. McCartney: There has been an overwhelmingly positive response to the concept of partnership at work set out in the White Paper, and to the specific proposal for establishing a partnership fund for innovative projects to improve the training of managers in the workplace and employee representatives, to encourage partnership approaches across a range of activities currently taking place in companies. That will ensure over time that the Government put their money where their mouth is and invest in processes to improve industrial and employee relationships across the workplaces of Britain. I am delighted to say that discussion with the social partners so far will enable my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make an announcement about those matters in due course.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the business for next week?

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 2 NOVEMBER—Debate on the security and intelligence agencies on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

TUESDAY 3 NOVEMBER—Debate on personal pensions mis-selling on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

WEDNESDAY 4 NOVEMBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Opposition Day (20th allotted day).

Until about 7 o'clock, there will be a debate on the economy, followed by a debate on agriculture. Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

THURSDAY 5 NOVEMBER—Debate on the report of the Independent Commission on the Voting System on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 6 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

MONDAY 9 NOVEMBER—Debate on the fifth report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life on the funding of political parties in the United Kingdom on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House will also wish to be reminded that, on Wednesday 4 November, there will be a debate on the social action programme 1998–2000 in European Standing Committee B.

The House will also wish to know that it is proposed that, on Wednesday 11 November, there will be a debate in European Standing Committee B on Agenda 2000: financial aspects.

Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

[Wednesday 4 November:

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community document: 8328/98, Social Action Programme (1998–2000); and relevant European Legislation Committee report, HC 155-xxx (1997–98).

Wednesday 11 November:

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community documents: (a) 7046/98, Agenda 2000: The financial perspective 2000-2006, (b) 7221/98, Agenda 2000: The interinstitutional agreement of 29 October 1993, (c) 9302/98 ADD1: Own resources based on VAT and GNP, (d) COM(98)560, Financing the European Union; and relevant European Legislation Committee reports: (a) HC 155-xxvi and HC 155-xxxvii (1997–98), (b) HC 155-xxvi (1997–98), (c) HC 155-xxxvii (1997–98), (d) HC 155-xxxviii (1997–98).]

Sir George Young: We are grateful to the right hon. Lady for providing the business for next week. Her predecessor was able to announce two weeks' business in advance, which was found to be helpful both inside and outside the House. Will the Leader of the House confirm that that is her intention, and that she will revert to that practice as soon as she can?

I welcome the right hon. Lady's response to my request last week for an early debate on the Jenkins report. I hope that, in that debate, the Government spokesman will reconcile two sentences from the Labour party manifesto:

"We are committed to a referendum on the voting system for the House of Commons"

and

"We have promised only what we know we can deliver."

Can she tell us whether a promise is to be broken?

The Leader of the House will know that we asked for a statement about Senator Pinochet. Of course we understand the sub judice rule, but will the right hon. Lady accept that, once the matter ceases to be sub judice, serious questions will remain to be answered? Will the Home Secretary make a statement before the House about the confusion that arose between Government Departments? Can the Foreign Secretary explain how relationships with Chile can be restored, as their democratic Government have made it clear that they want this matter to be brought to a swift conclusion?

Although we regret the Prime Minister's failure to make a statement following last weekend's European summit at which a number of key issues were covered, can the Leader of the House confirm that the Chancellor will make a statement on Tuesday? Can she confirm that we shall have, in Government time, the two-day debate on the economy that we usually have at this time of year? Following the further fall in business confidence reported in the press today, the Government have refused yet again to find time for a debate on the economy.

In view of the continuing uncertainty in Kosovo, may I press the Leader of the House for a debate on foreign affairs? Finally, is she yet able to give us the date of prorogation?

Mrs. Beckett: By chance, the first and last of the right hon. Gentleman's questions work well together. He asked the date of prorogation; he also asked me to return to the arrangement whereby we give two weeks' notice of business. My difficulty in both respects relates directly to the operation of another place. I cannot give a date for prorogation, although I can confirm that it is likely to be late because of the timing of debates in another place. Similarly, that is why I cannot give two weeks' notice of business. I very much regret that. I entirely share the right hon. Gentleman's view that it is highly desirable to do so, and confirm that it would always be my wish to do so as soon as that once again becomes possible.

I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks about the debate on the Jenkins commission report. It is clear from the announcement that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is making on that matter—I know that he will make it clear in the debate—that the Government primarily seek the fullest possible debate. The Government are committed to a referendum on those matters so that the people of this country can give their view, but it is clear, too, that the timing of that must be looked at in the context of the Jenkins report. It is certainly not ruled out that it may well be within this Parliament.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me for a statement on the Senator Pinochet issue when it ceases to be sub judice, which it is not yet. However, I can say that, as the Prime Minister made crystal clear yesterday, there has been no confusion between Government Departments. As he pointed out, the request came from the Spanish Government to the magistrates, not via this Government.

The right hon. Gentleman regretted the failure to report on the EU summit. As he is aware, it was an informal meeting in Austria. There were no formal conclusions to report to the House, and no formal statement was issued. The Prime Minister has always followed the practice, where there are such statements or communiqués, of reporting to the House, and he will continue to follow it.

As for a debate on the economy, I can confirm that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer hopes to make a statement on the matter. Arrangements for future debates on the economy are generally a matter for the usual channels, but we are likely in the not-too-distant future to have a Queen's Speech and an opportunity to debate such matters.

We shall continue to keep the House informed about developments in Kosovo, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has done throughout.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): Does my right hon. Friend recall that, some time ago, the Modernisation Committee reported on the need to improve the scrutiny of European legislation, both within the House as a whole and within its specific Committees? Can she give a firm undertaking that those recommendations will be debated on the Floor of the House before this Session ends so that they can come into effect in the next parliamentary Session?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot absolutely give my hon. Friend the undertaking that he seeks, but I can confirm that I share his wish to see such an outcome. As he knows, the House is under some pressure at present, but I hope to accommodate him before the end of the Session.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Can the Leader of the House give us any more details about the nature of the motions that the Opposition will be tabling next Wednesday? It will not have escaped her notice that we had debates on the economy and agriculture on Monday, and Conservative Members not only did not turn up or table an amendment, but did not vote. It is well known that some Conservative Members find difficulty in reaching the Chamber in eight minutes, but 10 days to get to the Division Lobbies is rather a lengthy time.

The Leader of the House has made an announcement about the timing of the Jenkins report, and we certainly welcome an early debate in the House on the independent commission's recommendations. Does she think that sufficient time will have elapsed for the Conservative party to get its act together between now and then? She will have noted that the Conservative party published its reaction to the report before the report was published, and so missed all the rebuttal of its arguments contained in the report. Will she particularly note that the Conservative party has decided not to use the first-past-the-post system to elect its leader, although Conservative Members now seem to think that that is the one type of election that they can all rally around?

Will the Leader of the House give us a specific answer to a specific question: is it not right that every member of the parliamentary Labour party was elected to the House on a manifesto commitment to hold a referendum on the subject of the Jenkins report in this Parliament?

Mrs. Beckett: May I begin where the hon. Gentleman ended? The manifesto commitment, on which—he is right—every Labour candidate fought the election, was that we would have a referendum on proportional representation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): In this Parliament?

Mrs. Beckett: No, the manifesto did not say that. It was, broadly speaking, the expectation, and might well indeed be the outcome, that the referendum would be held in this Parliament, but that was not the wording of the manifesto, which is what the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said. It is only fair to set the record straight.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to comment on the attendance of Conservative Members at Liberal Democrat Opposition day debates. It would not be right for me to intrude on private grief in that matter. He also asked me to speculate on the wording of the motions. That, also, is not directly within my area of responsibility, although we can be quite confident that, in some way or other, we will discover that the blame for everything that has gone wrong in this country lies at the door of the Government, and that nothing whatever relates in any way to the actions of the Conservative party or to its 18-year tenure of government.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me whether I believe that the Conservative party will get its act together on Jenkins. It would be wrong for me to predict that it will either get its act together on anything or that Conservative Members will all rally around anything.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): May I, too, add my welcome for the early debate on the report from the independent commission and express my hope that, whatever our different views on the report, we debate what is in it, rather than things that are not in it, as has happened today? What happened was hardly surprising, because some views were published before the report was published.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the important debate on the report will take place not in the House, but outside? It is the responsibility of all hon. Members to ensure that that debate is as informed and open as possible, because the British people should have the final say on the way in which Members of Parliament are elected, rather than Members of Parliament working it all out for themselves.

Mrs. Beckett: I agree with most of what my hon. Friend said in the sense that I whole-heartedly agree that it is enormously important that there is a thorough, proper and well-considered debate on those issues in the country. I take the view, however, that it is right for the House, if I may venture to say so, to lead that debate. It is important that hon. Members make their own contribution and, although the decision in the referendum will ultimately rest with the British people, the outcome will undoubtedly be influenced by discussions in this place.

[Mrs. Beckett]

My hon. Friend is absolutely right to call for a thorough and long public debate—I certainly believe that it should be constructive, and hope that that will be the outcome—but it is also right to recognise that this House has its proper place.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Does the Leader of the House recall that, last week, when I put to her my complaint about the draft order on the arrangements and expenditure involved in The Hague trial of the Lockerbie suspects, she kindly suggested that I should raise the issue with the Foreign Secretary on Tuesday, which I did? He said that there was no reason why hon. Members could not have a debate on the subject. Sadly, however, having applied to Madam Speaker, I was advised this morning that I was unsuccessful in the ballot.

As the United States has said that time is running out, and as this matter is vital to the relatives of those who lost their lives and to the people of Libya, would the Government agree to hold a debate to let the House express a view on what some consider to be an incorrect policy and others think is correct? Surely the House should debate an order produced by the Government on a vital issue of public policy.

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot undertake to find time for a debate for the hon. Gentleman in the near future. I suspect that he has not wholly exhausted the procedures. Knowing his skill and experience as a parliamentarian, I am confident that he will continue to explore the means open to him to secure a debate on this matter in the near future. I shall draw his observations to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): My right hon. Friend may have heard the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry refer in Question Time to the need for more competition among the banks. May we have a debate on the banking sector, because the National Westminster bank's operations are causing much damage to many businesses in our constituencies, and much heartache to our constituents? The banking practices of the National Westminster bank, including the practices of its subsidiary Lombard, should be exposed to Parliament. May we have that debate as a matter of urgency?

Mrs. Beckett: I fear that I cannot promise my hon. Friend such a debate as a matter of urgency. Like the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), my hon. Friend is skilled in finding opportunities to raise matters, and I am confident that he will do so.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware that, last October—a year ago—the Government published a Green Paper on the provision for children with special educational needs. In December last year, the Minister for School Standards, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), promised that, when the Government gave their response to the Green Paper, they would come to the House. A response has been promised since last April, and there have been rumours that it will be made in a statement to the House. However, I learned this afternoon that the Government intend to make their response not to the House as promised, but in a press conference next week. Will the Leader of the House ensure either that the response is made to the House in a statement or that we have an early debate on special educational needs and the Government's response to the consultation?

Mrs. Beckett: I understand the hon. Lady's concern. The subject of special educational needs arouses great interest on both sides of the House. I hear what she says about expectations of the outcome of the consultation, and I shall draw her views to the attention of my right hon. Friend and hon. Friends in the Department for Education and Employment. However, I cannot undertake to find time for a debate next week.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that, in next week's debate, the Government will be astute and will not get tied hand and foot to the tinpot Jenkins proposals which were published today? If those proposals were carried into practice, every constituency in Britain would have to be changed, there would be first and second-class Members of Parliament, and for some the entire constituency link would be removed. As for the report, we need two bottles of claret to digest it.

Will my right hon. Friend always remember that Roy Jenkins—"Woy of the Wadicals"—was the man who tried to destroy the Labour party some years ago, and failed? He destroyed the Social Democratic party, and now he is among the Liberal Democrats. Word has it that even some of the Liberal Democrats do not like the Jenkins proposition. He is trying to destroy them as well.

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend has made it plain why it is necessary for a full debate to take place on those issues, about which he has raised important points. As for his call for the Government to be astute, I assure him that we endeavour to be so.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May we have a debate, as a matter of urgency, on transport in London, in view of the exorbitant and scandalous increases in tube fares that are to take place from January next year? Tube fares are to rise to five times the inflation rate, while bus fares will rise to six times that rate, and further increases above inflation are projected for every year until 2002. Is that the Labour party's integrated transport strategy in action? The debate in question should surely be wound up by a Treasury Minister, as the travelling public will have to travel not by tube or bus, but by car, and will thus be caught not only by duty rates that are above inflation but by congestion tax. It seems that the only possibility for Londoners is to travel on foot.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman asks me to arrange a debate in the near future, which I am not sure that I can undertake to do. He also asks whether that increase is a consequence of the Labour party's integrated transport policy. No; it is a consequence of the Conservative party's neglect of London Transport, its failure to invest and its ignoring of Londoners' transport needs over the past 18 years. As I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware, London Transport fares are the statutory responsibility of London Transport, not of Ministers, and the balance between fare levels and the need for investment is always difficult to strike.

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): May we have a debate on the role of private firms and private capital in education action zones? I understand that McDonald's has become involved in one zone. I cannot believe that its motive is entirely altruistic; it is more likely to be the wish to stuff hamburgers down children's throats.

There are various worries about the role of private firms in the new education action zones. May we have a debate soon?

Mrs. Beckett: I know that the issue of education action zones, how they might work and how they could deliver different ideas on the running of the education system is a matter of interest and controversy throughout the House. I will bear my hon. Friend's request in mind, but I am afraid that I cannot promise a debate in the near future.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I am grateful to the Government for lifting the siege of the London clinic, a subject to which I shall want to return when the case ceases to be sub judice, but did the Leader of the House really mean to say that the extradition request had come from the Spanish Government? I had understood that that was the one source from which it had not come.

Mrs. Beckett: I think I am right in saying that, although the request originated with a Spanish judge, it had to have the imprimatur of a Spanish Minister in order to be delivered. If I am incorrect, I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman, but 'in any event' that does not affect the main thrust of my earlier answer, which was that the matter was not dealt with through this Government.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Has my right hon. Friend read the comment attributed to Sir Paul Condon this morning that pay levels in the Metropolitan police somehow excuse corruption? I am sure that that rather strange comment was a misquotation, or that it was quoted out of context, but does it not highlight the fact that the sooner we have the annual Adjournment debate on policing in London, the better? I wonder whether it could be fitted in before prorogation.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not know whether the remarks that Sir Paul Condon is reported to have made have been quoted accurately, but I recognise and understand my hon. Friend's active interest in policing in London, and agree that it is worthy of debate in the House. I fear that I cannot undertake to find time for a debate during this Session, but the next Session might be another matter.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The Leader of the House is aware that western parts of the United Kingdom have experienced severe weather and flooding in recent times. In my constituency, Garden street, Steeple street and Hurdsfield road, and the houses in those streets, have been under water. In the village of Bollington, north of my constituency, Water street and John street have been under water. The village of Adlington has experienced severe flooding, and part of the village of Prestbury, at Bridge green, has also been under water.

As the House will have time over the next week or two, will the right hon. Lady arrange for the appropriate Minister to come to the House and make a statement about the experience in the west of England that has resulted from the severe weather, so that we know what action we can take to help our constituents and what help may be available to our local authorities—whether borough or county councils—so that they can try to alleviate the suffering?

Mrs. Beckett: Like hon. Members from both sides of the House, I entirely share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the distress that is being experienced as a result of the flooding. I will certainly bear in mind his request for a debate, although, as I know that he will appreciate from his long experience in the House, we are approaching a point in the Session when time will be under pressure in various ways. He will know that, on 20 October, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made a statement on the lessons to be learned from the Easter floods. The Government keep those matters under review and will certainly bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's concerns.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the relationship between Members of Parliament and their constituencies, particularly the fact that they have a responsibility to represent the areas for which they are elected? In the context of the Jenkins debate, will she make it clear that any proposal for a two-tier system of Members of Parliament, in which Members at large could interfere in any of the 10 constituencies within an area, would be contrary to the tradition in which Members of Parliament represent the electorate of a town, city or constituency for which they are elected?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend, too, alludes to the proposals in the Jenkins commission report. He identifies important aspects of those proposals, which I know the House—whether hon. Members support or oppose them—will want most thoroughly to debate and to encourage the public to debate.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): May I press the Leader of the House on the issue of the floods that are causing so much havoc not only in the west of England but in the Welsh borders? In my constituency, the city of Hereford is effectively cut off—there are no trains in or out of the city and the main A49 is blocked by waist-high water at the Belmont roundabout. The city is in gridlock and Herefordshire's largest trading estate—at Rotherwas—has been closed. People are today being evacuated from their homes, at least one farmer is believed to have drowned and two old people's homes have been closed. Floods are heading for Ross-on-Wye, where evacuations will take place later today and a school is being made ready as a reception centre. Moreover, four Royal National Lifeboat Institution inshore lifeboats have been stationed in Herefordshire. Although, as the right hon. Lady said to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), we have had a statement on the Easter floods, clearly the lessons have not been learnt, so why can we not have a statement on those floods?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot recall whether the hon. Gentleman was here when my hon. Friend the

[Mrs. Beckett]

Parliamentary Secretary made a statement a few days ago, but part of the problem at Easter was the failure of the flood warning system and, as I understand it, some lessons have been learnt from that. However, that does not detract in any way from the hon. Gentleman's concerns, which the House will share, for his constituents and others who are affected by present developments. I assure him that the Government are monitoring, and will continue to monitor, the position carefully. He will know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, who deal with those matters, are in the Chamber and have heard this exchange.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Are not some of our hon. Friends being somewhat unfair to Lord Jenkins? As for next Thursday's debate, should not Lord Jenkins and his colleagues be warmly congratulated for making recommendations that are so untenable and unacceptable that most people will conclude that, with all its faults, the first-past-the-post system is far preferable to a two-tier House of Commons, which there has never been in the past and which there should not be in the future?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend makes it absolutely plain how wise the Government were to arrange for a debate next week.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Has the right hon. Lady seen early-day motion 1714?

[That this House welcomes the acknowledgement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that his responsibilities for competition policy require him 'both to act fairly and impartially and to be seen to do so'; notes that he satisfied himself he could take decisions about the British Airways/American Airlines alliance, and 'having discussed it with officials' decided he should determine whether the proposed acquisition by BSkyB of Manchester United be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; calls upon him to explain why he concluded that he will be seen to be acting fairly and impartially in these cases, despite the acceptance by the New Millennium Experience Company of sponsorship from British Airways and Bskyb totalling £24 million; further notes that the Director General of Fair Trading is investigating the profitability of supermarkets, including Tesco which has committed sponsorship to the NMEC of £12 million; is concerned that the NMEC is negotiating with the Ford Motor Company over a £12 million sponsorship when it may lay off workers at Dagenham and when the DGFT is about to investigate UK car prices; is concerned that companies may appear to be compromised by the refusal of the Secretary of State to separate his role as regulator and sole shareholder of the NMEC; and calls upon him to give up his position with the NMEC immediately or step aside from any regulatory role regarding any industry involved in NMEC sponsorship.]

Will the right hon. Lady arrange a debate on the difficulties arising from the different interests of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry?

Mrs. Beckett: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware that the issue of interests and understandings for someone who holds the important post of Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is always kept under review by the Ministers involved and by proper officials. It has been confirmed repeatedly that my right hon. Friend does not have a conflict of interest.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Yesterday's statement on welfare reform by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security was very welcome, but will my right hon. Friend discuss with him the urgent need for widowers' rights to be promoted, because the existing anomalies are unacceptable?

Mrs. Beckett: I am sure that my hon. Friend's remarks can and will be drawn to my right hon. Friend's attention. Welfare reform is a major programme that is being conducted benefit by benefit and service by service. I feel confident that further announcements will be made in due course.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Is it possible to arrange an early debate on the Government's energy policy? An application is pending for 15 wind turbines that will stretch from Pendle, a neighbouring constituency, into Ribble Valley, which is an area of outstanding natural beauty which attracts tourists and is used largely for agriculture. There is another application for about 350 wind turbines in Wales. If we have one more wind turbine in Wales, it is likely to take off on a windy day—not the answer to devolution for which we were looking. For a small fraction of the cost that goes towards subsidising turbines, energy conservation measures could save more energy than could ever be generated by those useless, ugly and unwanted wind turbines.

Mrs. Beckett: I take heed of the hon. Gentleman's request. He will know that there are a variety of ways in which to pursue the opportunity to raise such issues, especially if they are constituency related—in Adjournment debates and so on. I will, of course, draw his concerns to the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends who deal with such matters.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Will my right hon. Friend find time for the House to debate the accountability of quangos set up by the previous Government between now and the date they are likely to be wound up? I refer in particular to the Cardiff Bay development corporation and its cavalier treatment of charter fishing vessels owned by my constituents which sail out of Cardiff bay. Up to a dozen small businesses could be destroyed and, I am afraid, people are desperate. I spoke today to Skipper Steve Jones of the Lady Helen; my impression was that, unless the development corporation behaves in an acceptable manner, people may take desperate measures.

Mrs. Beckett: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, and I know of his great regard for his constituents' interests. I feel confident that he has taken steps to draw the matter to the attention of my parliamentary colleagues, but I fear that I cannot promise him a debate in Government time in the near future. Perhaps he might pursue the matter through an Adjournment debate.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): May I draw the right hon. Lady's attention to the Labour party manifesto commitment to end "unjustifiable discrimination wherever it exists"?

She has redefined a manifesto commitment as not necessarily applying to the Parliament concerned—which makes that merely a commitment to keep it in the manifesto—but does she accept that the Sexual Orientation Discrimination Bill, which was steered through all its stages in the House of Lords by the Labour peer Lady Turner of Camden, would be a worthwhile measure to end the institutionalised, widespread and systematic discrimination against homosexuals? As the Member in charge of the Bill in this place, I wonder whether Government time could be found in this spillover period to debate and legislate on that important matter.

Mrs. Beckett: I am deeply touched by the care with which hon. Members have read the Labour party manifesto and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we stand by its contents. I fear, however, that, as he will know, it is always difficult for a Government to find time for other measures, no matter how important and worth while the subject. I take his points about the seriousness with which those matters should be discussed and the opportunity that has been made in the other place. I cannot undertake to find time before the end of the Session, even for such an important measure.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the Leader of the House find time for an early statement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to resolve the ministerial muddle over the future of the Post Office? The right hon. Lady will recall that the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, who is responsible for the Post Office—the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney)—announced on 16 May last year a review of the options for the future of the Post Office with a view in particular to removing "unnecessary and damaging shackles" on it. The right hon. Lady and her colleagues will be aware that, since then, there has largely been an eerie silence in public, punctuated by occasional briefings to some journalists that the Government favour a radical move, and counter-briefings to others that they do not. Is it not time that Ministers stopped arguing like ferrets in a sack, came clean and announced their proposals for the future in the interests of management, employees and customers of the Post Office?

Mrs. Beckett: I am a little surprised that the hon. Gentleman raises the matter with me today, since we have just had Trade and Industry questions—

Mr. Bercow: The matter did not come up. The question was not reached.

Mrs. Beckett: That has never stopped the hon. Gentleman before. I feel confident, knowing the hon. Gentleman's ingenuity, that, had he really tried, he could have worked the matter into some question or other.

There is no confusion about the future of the Post Office. The Government are committed both to giving it greater commercial freedom and to its success. As for talk about removing shackles and concern about its future, all I can say is that when the Tory party had responsibility for those matters, it made an awful mess.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): May I ask the Leader of the House in her capacity as Chair of the Modernisation Committee—[Interruption.] Chairman of the Modernisation Committee—to draw to her colleagues' attention when bringing forward their proposals for the Queen's Speech the excellent new systems for bringing legislation before the House? Will she ask them to fulfil the promise of her predecessor that, in the next Session, there will be a number of Bills that take advantage of those new procedures, which will be to the benefit of the House and the legislation?

Mrs. Beckett: I do not wish to pre-empt any of the processes of the Queen's Speech, but I can say to the hon. Gentleman that I strongly share the view that there is room for improvement of the ways in which we scrutinised legislation in the past, which would immeasurably improve the quality of the legislation and perhaps even our efficiency in dealing with it. I share the hon. Gentleman's view and I can assure him that those matters are under consideration.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): The right hon. Lady has told us that, on Monday, we shall debate the security services. As she knows and as many hon. Members will have heard, Ministers frequently take refuge in the answer that they cannot discuss something because it relates to security matters. Would it be in order to ask a Minister whether the assessments of individual Cabinet members and their possible security risk are submitted in the first instance to the Prime Minister or to Mr. Alastair Campbell?

Mrs. Beckett: I believe that the question about what is in order is not a matter for me, but I suspect that that is not the point that the right hon. Gentleman is seeking to make. The role of the Prime Minister's official spokesman is well known. He is highly respected. We all take note of the fact that the Tory party so much dislikes his efficacy in that role that hon. Members do everything that they can to undermine him.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I congratulate the right hon. Lady on the ingenuity of that answer. I have two points to raise with her. First, following up a point made earlier, will she reconsider having a free vote at the end of next Thursday's debate so that every right hon. and hon. Member can express an opinion on a report which, in effect, proposes the destruction of our parliamentary system, so that she herself can be free, unfettered and unshackled and can tell us what she thinks about such a monstrous proposal?

Secondly, on a point that will unite the House, I am sure that the right hon. Lady will agree that it is a great pity that we have been unable to debate early-day motion 1647, headed "Speaker's Chaplain".

[That this House notes that the Reverend Canon Donald Gray is to retire at the end of the current session after 11 years as Chaplain to the Speaker; pays warm tribute to his years of service to this House both in his formal duties and in his less formal but equally important ministry to honourable Members and staff throughout the House (including his support to the Parliamentary Christian Fellowship); notes also that he and his wife Joyce having made many friends in and outside Parliament, will be greatly missed; and wishes them both many happy and fulfilling years in their retirement.]

[Sir Patrick Cormack]

The right hon. Lady will know that, this afternoon, Canon Gray conducted Prayers in the House for the last time. Does she agree that it would be appropriate for us all to place on record our great respect for Canon Gray and our profound gratitude for the service that he has rendered to the House, to all right hon. and hon. Members in a pastoral role and to so many of the staff of the House and the other place who have gone to him for counsel and help? He has been an exemplary Speaker's Chaplain and it is appropriate for that to be put on record before we move on to the next business.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman asked me for a free vote at the end of the debate next Thursday. It is not the end of the debate or the discussion; it is very much the beginning. It is certainly my view and that of the entire Cabinet that we would like widespread and thorough debate on the issues raised by the Jenkins report.

I thank the hon. Gentleman very much for his remarks about the Speaker's Chaplain and for giving me the opportunity—which might not otherwise have been in order—to say how strongly I share his views, which I know are shared by all right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. The Speaker's Chaplain is held in not only great respect but much affection. The hon. Gentleman referred quite rightly to his pastoral role and his work with staff and with right hon. and hon. Members. If one may put it this way, he has adorned the House for a long time and we shall always find Prayers very different and for some time a little strange without him. I hope that he will be aware of how highly he is regarded and certainly, if that were not the case, I hope that it will be now.

BILL PRESENTED

North American Free Trade Area (Parliamentary Commission)

Mr. Michael Fabricant presented a Bill to establish a Parliamentary Commission to investigate the benefits or otherwise of accession by the United Kingdom to the North American Free Trade Area Treaty; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Thursday 19 November, and to be printed [Bill 251].

Pet Quarantine

[Relevant documents: The fifth report from the Agriculture Committee of Session 1993–94, on Health Controls on the Importation of Live Animals (HC 347-I, published on 23 November 1994).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

4.12 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nick Brown): This is the first parliamentary occasion on which I have had the opportunity to welcome the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) to his new role as principal Opposition spokesman on agricultural matters and I do so now. I know that he will be a robust opponent on party political issues, but on issues of national importance that transcend party politics, such as the date-based export scheme, I hope that I can count on him as an ally.

Today's debate is not party political, although it involves matters on which people hold very strong views. Since becoming Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, much of my time has been consumed by the specific difficulties faced by farmers and the Government's desire to do what we can to respond; Agenda 2000 and the wider search for common agricultural policy reform; and, of course, the beef export ban, on which I have set myself the target of getting the issue resolved before Christmas. I am absolutely determined that the intense focus on those priorities will not divert me or the Department from our other responsibilities, especially food standards and the protection of the public.

Our quarantine laws, and the case for their modernisation and reform, are one aspect of public protection. I am grateful to the Leader of the House for her having secured Government time for the debate. The views of individual hon. Members are especially important on an issue such as this one, in which there is no obvious party political divide. The British people are internationally famous—or notorious—as animal lovers. We keep pets as part of our families, and we object to forced separation. It is no surprise that the requirement of six months in quarantine for dogs and cats entering the United Kingdom has always been unpopular among pet owners, especially those whose work commitments require them to travel abroad. That has a particular application for the armed services.

There are good reasons for quarantine, however. Rabies is an appallingly unpleasant disease which still causes many deaths in some parts of the world. It is right to take strict precautions against it. I am not willing to recommend to the House anything that puts our population at risk from rabies. Nor am I willing to put to the House anything that would inflict rabies on our wildlife or our pets. There has been no native case of rabies among animals for more than 75 years, and it is 95 years since someone last died of the disease after contracting it here.

We maintained that record during a period in which an epidemic in wildlife made rabies common on continental Europe. It is no longer common, however. A successful campaign is pushing the disease back beyond the frontiers of the present European Union. Western Europe is now largely free of rabies. There were only 100 cases last year in animals other than bats, compared with 14,000 cases in 1989.

We must also take into account the freedom to travel that people now enjoy. Holidays abroad are part of modern life. In particular, the channel tunnel has made travel easy. Against that background, we must ask whether our arrangements are still justified. In 1971, the Waterhouse committee recommended retention of six months quarantine as a standard requirement. In 1994, the Select Committee on Agriculture had a fresh look at the subject, and it reported that vaccines were available for the prevention of rabies, that blood tests could show whether the vaccine had taken and that microchips could identify whether an animal was the one mentioned in a vaccination or blood test certificate. The Select Committee concluded that

"scientific advances since the Waterhouse Report now make it not only feasible, but desirable, for the UK to permit anti-rabies controls based upon vaccination and blood-testing as an alternative to quarantine for pet dogs and cats arriving from other EU countries and all other countries internationally recognised to be rabies-free and carrying out appropriate policies to maintain their rabies-free status".

That report is before us today to help inform our debate.

The then Government welcomed that report, but concluded that the changes proposed were premature. The Conservative Government argued that the eradication programme in the European Union had not been completed. They said that new arrangements for importing traded cats and dogs to the UK were still untested. They said that similar relaxations recently introduced in Norway and Sweden were also untried.

Whatever the case may have been at that time, those objections surely have little force today. Highly respected bodies—including the British Medical Association, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the British Veterinary Association—have argued that the time has come for a re-evaluation.

When we came into office, the Government were aware of strong opposition to quarantine among many pet owners, but aware also of deep fears among those who support the existing system. To help to reconcile those views, my predecessor called for a scientific assessment of the risks that we run under the policy of quarantine and under five other options. It is, perhaps, remarkable that that had not been done previously, and I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend, now the Minister for the Cabinet Office, for his decision. Professor Kennedy chairs the advisory group on quarantine that conducted the review. On 23 September, I published his report "Quarantine and Rabies: A Reappraisal". The report is an excellent and thorough analysis which gives a sound basis for conducting the public debate. I commend it to the House, and am most grateful to Professor Kennedy and all the members of his group.

The essence of the report lies in the first two of its 41 recommendations. It recommends an alternative system for bringing pets into this country from the European Union, European Economic Area and rabies-free islands. For such animals, the alternative system gives safeguards equivalent to quarantine, which would be abandoned for those areas. That would apply both to pets taken from Great Britain to those countries and then returning, and to pets coming into Great Britain from those countries if they satisfy the same conditions.

The key to the new system will be certification showing, first, that the animal is identified by a microchip; secondly, that it was vaccinated against rabies at or over three months of age using an approved vaccine; thirdly, that it has had a blood test to confirm the effectiveness of vaccination carried out at least six months before entry into Britain; and, finally, that it has had treatment against ticks and a parasite no more than 24 hours before entry. The reasoning behind the requirements is well set out in the report. Of course, we shall have to review them in the light of comments on the report, but the basic structure of identification, vaccination, and certification is fundamental to any new system.

In considering the options, the group recognised that even the present system is not risk free, because smuggling clearly occurs. It found that its recommended alternative did not involve any significant increase of risk. It could make no assessment of the impact of smuggling in the modern environment. This is a personal view and not something on which the group felt able to advise me, but I think that some of the incentive to smuggle lies in the six-month period of separation. People do not want to be separated from their pets, and some of them, foolishly and wrongly, decide to try to circumvent the law by smuggling. It logically follows that, if we can find a legal alternative that does not require separation, at least part of the incentive to smuggle will be removed. We are, therefore, providing a further public safeguard, rather than undermining the protection of the public.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): If anyone needs evidence of what is going on with smuggling and its vast scale, particularly in respect of cats and dogs, they need only ask around confidentially in the expatriate English-speaking communities in any capital in Europe. One of the reasons is that to which my right hon. Friend alluded, but there is another: it can cost between £1,000 and £1,500 to put a cat away for 15 months. Most people cannot afford that, which is why they have to smuggle, sad as it is. I look forward to a change in the law because it is desperately needed.

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is on the right track. It is difficult to estimate accurately how many pets are smuggled because of the nature of the activity. To judge from anecdotal evidence of the sort that he mentioned, it is a problem and, at least in part, the desire to avoid separation between pet and owner is the motivation. If we can put in place a system that avoids that motivation, we may diminish the amount of smuggling, and, because ours is a tested route, diminish risk to the public.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his appointment. While I agree broadly with the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), does the Minister accept that the Government need to maintain a system of emergency regulations in the event that an outbreak of rabies occurs in a given geographical area? Will he ensure that, if he goes through with the reforms posited in the Kennedy report, any collection of emergency regulations will not damage activities, such as farming, more than the evil from which protection is sought?

For example, the Government might intend to ban at short notice all animal movements within a given area. That could have a direct effect on horse race meetings and other equine events, such as Badminton and Burghley by Stamford. While taking every care to prevent the spread of rabies, the Government should not simultaneously damage the economic value of activities involving horses.

Mr. Brown: I take the hon. and learned Gentleman's point and thank him for welcoming me to my new position.

The emergency regulations are designed to deal with a rabies outbreak after it has been identified. They do not take into account the source of that outbreak—although the appropriate authorities will prosecute those who caused it. We do not intend to change the emergency procedures for dealing with an outbreak or to alter the criminal sanctions that are already in place regarding smuggling. Those people who attempt to smuggle animals into the country in defiance of the rabies regulations are being very selfish and foolish, and I deplore their actions.

The Kennedy group considered other options, but they were found to carry a greater risk and, therefore, were not recommended by the group. The Kennedy group rejected the option of simply reducing the quarantine period to one month. It did not find a system of identification, vaccination and certification to be a good enough safeguard for pets coming from every country in the world. Indeed, the report advocated European Union action to put adequate controls in place against animals coming from third countries, including the candidate member states. However, it recommended a further study of the number of animals that might come from North America, and a risk assessment in light of that. That seems to me to be a reasonable recommendation.

The group envisaged controls coming into force at the port of entry, and was very clear about the need for proper enforcement. Any scheme that is introduced to parallel existing quarantine rules will rely on enforcement, and I am determined to ensure that enforcement features strongly in any such scheme.

Upon entry, the pet and its certificate would be presented to an official whose sole responsibility would be to check imported animals. Although nothing has been firmly decided in this area, the House will want to know that it is pretty certain—as certain as we can be at this stage—that, if such a scheme were to come into effect, those officials would come from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The official would read the pet's microchip number and check it against the certificate. Provided that they matched and the certificate was satisfactory, the animal would enter the country without further ado.

In order to avoid any doubt, I stress that the Kennedy group did not propose—and the Government would not accept—anything that would imply a green channel whereby animals would be waved through. That is not the proposal on which we are consulting. Animals that failed to meet this simple requirement, for whatever reason, would be quarantined for six months or until such earlier time as their certification was shown to be in good order.

It is important to stress that quarantine would remain the rule not only for pets coming from most countries outside Europe, but for animals that failed to meet the new requirements in full. If animals failed to meet the requirements, they would go straight into quarantine.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. This may be an appropriate moment to congratulate him on his new position. I was in the House when he made his maiden speech from the Opposition Benches, which roughly coincided with my own debut at the Dispatch Box.

I was interested to hear the Minister say that it would be his Department's staff who monitored compliance with the new regulations or criteria. It is clear that that will be an expensive matter. As he knows, the considerable delay envisaged in the report has been the subject of objections and is a matter of great concern. During his opening speech, will he tell us that he has already started the costing of the arrangements; that he is making allocations in the next public expenditure survey round for his Department's proposed expenditure; that there is a realistic progression of stages leading to the implementation of the new proceedings; and whether those can be accelerated?

Mr. Brown: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for welcoming me to my new duties and thank him even more for having sat through my maiden speech, which was delivered in 1983 at around midnight, if I remember correctly.

Mr. Clark: It was memorable.

Mr. Brown: It did not strike me as being memorable, although I did have one good joke. I have been telling it ever since and it has carried me a long way.

The arrangements will have to be paid for, of course, and I shall talk about costs later in my speech and deal with the main thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's question then. When I referred to the official being a MAFF official, it was not to invite the House to go through the Department's whole budget to see whether existing resources would cover the money to pay that official, but to make the point that the official would be dedicated to that specific duty and that it would not be added to the responsibilities of other officials who have duties at points of entry. The Government will take enforcement extremely seriously.

One of the Kennedy report's most important recommendations is for a large-scale education and publicity programme. Everyone who might use the system, as well as those operating it, will need to know the rules well in advance. Otherwise, people will try to bring in pets that do not qualify and there will be chaos and ill feeling at the point of entry, as pets are refused entry and sent straight into quarantine. The group recognised that the new system could not be brought in overnight and recommended that up to three years be taken to get it up and running. Sites at port should be ready, staff recruited and trained and the public properly informed. I shall return to the issue of timing later.

The group emphasised that its proposals must be viewed against our obligations within the European Union. I am also mindful of our special obligation to Ireland, with which we have a common land border. I am grateful to the group for covering several detailed aspects that are often left by the wayside when quarantine is discussed.

As to the Government's response to the report, without pre-empting the public consultation, I am sympathetic to the case for change. In the light of the Kennedy report, we cannot maintain the status quo, nor can we any longer argue that quarantine is the only way in which to protect our country against rabies. I do not see how we can keep our current system unchanged when there is a less onerous alternative that gives rise to no greater risk and, indeed, has some advantages over the current system.

The report confirms that we have the scientific knowledge and techniques to take the necessary precautions against rabies. Many have said that before. That is not the key issue, even though some important technical details remain to be settled. The report treads new ground in its emphasis on implementation and the effects of change. It puts that into context through its risk assessment, which helps us to devise a new system and warns of the points to watch. Compliance with the rules is essential to the success of any scheme, but particularly this one.

First, we have to be ready for a vast increase in the number of pets taken to and fro. The report assumes that the number of animals might reach 250,000, rather than the 8,000 that currently go into quarantine. That would be in line with the Swedish experience. Gearing up to deal with that number of animals is a task we cannot afford to underestimate. Secondly, vaccination and blood testing are not infallible. Checking remains important and we shall have to consider how that is best carried out. I am determined that we should remain a rabies-free country with strong safeguards against the disease.

Thirdly, we must be ready for people who are willing to break the law. The report recommends that we should check the certificates of every animal coming into the country and makes further recommendations designed to make enforcement easier and more effective. The problem lies not with pets going to, and coming from, rabies-free countries, but with the difficulty of distinguishing those animals from others that carry a risk. Following up the report will therefore not be a straightforward task.

When we published the report on 23 September, I announced that we were inviting comments by 31 December. We are anxious to have reactions to the proposals. We have already received more than 300 responses from more than 20 countries and expect many more. I welcome today's debate as part of that process.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Brown: The House would probably like to know how the consultation is going. Eighty-seven per cent. of the responses are broadly in favour of change as proposed by the Kennedy report, but not going beyond that; 10 per cent. are opposed to change, mainly on the grounds that they do not have pets and do not want to be placed at any risk by other people's pets, and 3 per cent. made neutral points. I give way to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

Mr. Forth: Will the Minister give us his view on paragraph 11.9.1 of the report, which says:

"We understand that the Minister may wish the animal owner to meet the cost of any enforcement under any new system", and goes on to offer observations? It would be useful if he told the House whether he believes that it would be proper and reasonable for the users of the system to pay the full cost and that the cost should not fall on the taxpayer.

Mr. Brown: That is a fair point, which parallels that made by the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark). I am about to deal with that matter in terms that will brook no misunderstanding. I assure the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst that I shall not equivocate on that issue—because the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not let me.

Mr. Forth: Good man.

Mr. Brown: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for confirming that the Chancellor is a good man. I strongly agree with that.

While consultation continues, we are doing some preparation and taking a hard look at all that would have to be done to put a new scheme in place. We must concentrate on three aspects at this stage. First, there are legal issues to be resolved. We must be sure that what we do is compatible with European Community law. I am keeping the Commission informed of progress in my Department. We also need to consider how we shall link together the three systems that might in future apply: quarantine, the so-called Balai system for traded cats and dogs and the new arrangements for pets based on vaccination and certification. Linked with that is the need to specify certification that we will have to ask other countries to provide.

Secondly, the pet owners who benefit from the new system will have to pay for it. I hope that that is sufficient answer to the question asked by the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea.

Mr. Alan Clark: That is an interesting and perfectly legitimate response. If that is the case, surely the pet owners—the paymasters—can determine to a far greater extent than if cost were a matter for the right hon. Gentleman's Department when the measures will come into force, and plainly they will want that to happen at the earliest opportunity. Since pet owners can no longer be put off by the explanation that the scheme will take a long time to put in place and the provisions must be passed through the public expenditure survey and the Chancellor, surely there are good grounds for accelerating the implementation of the measures.

Mr. Brown: I am keen to do what I can to meet the legitimate aspirations of pet owners, but my primary concern is to protect the country from rabies. The interests of my fellow citizens and public health and safety come first, and within that I shall consider what can be done to meet the legitimate requests of those who own pets and want to take them abroad. Professor Kennedy's report will inform and advise decision making in the Department.

However, the fact that pet owners will have to pay for the new arrangements does not mean that they can set out their terms and conditions. Under the existing system, it is a requirement not only that pet owners are separated from their pets for six months if they have brought them in from abroad, because of the quarantine requirement, but that they pay for quarantine. The state does not pick up the cost of those arrangements, which can be quite high—£1,600.

Currently, anyone who wishes to bring a pet into the country is required to pay. It does not seem unfair and unreasonable, therefore, for the arrangements to continue if the test and the public protection arrangements—and that is what they are—are to operate differently from the quarantine procedures when we deal with the European Union.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): Can the Minister confirm the valid point that he is making—that at the moment, there is a cost to the Exchequer of inspections of quarantine kennels and the like, so the present system is costing us in any case?

Mr. Brown: What the hon. Gentleman says is completely right. There is a cost to the Exchequer of kennel inspections, and that cost will continue to be incurred—although its extent might be different under the new arrangements—because Kennedy does not propose, and the Government are not considering, the abolition of quarantine.

Quarantine will remain for animals coming to the UK from countries outside the scheme. It will also be needed for animals brought in by people who believe that their pets comply with the regime, but find that the pets do not. Those pets will go into quarantine, and the obligation will be on the owner to be able to show that the pet can be brought into compliance—perhaps by providing the certificate that they left outside the country—but the effect will be the same. They will have to be able to comply with the new arrangement or the old arrangement will carry on, and I am afraid that they will be charged for it.

The third aspect that the Government will need to consider closely is the question of the time that will be needed to put the new arrangements into place. The Kennedy estimate—three years—seems a long time. I am examining the case for an earlier pilot project—perhaps funded at a premium—to establish new arrangements, or perhaps one covering a limited number of animals. These are early days. I am considering the possibility of speeding up progress—at least for part of the scheme. However, I ask the House not to underestimate what needs to be done. I emphasise that the project is being driven forward by considerations of the safety of the public in the United Kingdom—not by the views of others who will benefit from the project.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): Does the Minister agree that, if it is known that quarantine will shortly be abolished for some categories of country, the temptation to smuggle will be much increased in people who—perhaps having served in the Army abroad—have been waiting a long time to return a pet? They will think, "This system will die anyway in a few months, so why should I go through all that?" If it is possible to accelerate the process for an especially urgent case of that kind, it might help increase security.

Mr. Brown: I do not think that it is fair to describe the desire of individuals to move now and bring their pets with them as urgent in the sense of public policy. I hope that nothing that I say in the House today will give any comfort to anyone who has smuggled animals or is even thinking about it. If they are caught they will be punished, and punishment can involve custodial sentencing. A more likely outcome of today's debate, and the broader understanding that the Government are minded to agree to change and reform, is that those who can adjust their travel arrangements will wait a little to see whether a scheme comes on stream that is more acceptable to them than the existing quarantine arrangements.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the quarantine arrangements are very harsh if they are not strictly necessary for the protection of the public. Professor Kennedy and his group have made a very persuasive case that, at least in the context of the European Union and other rabies-free islands, the case for continuing the existing arrangements is pretty weak. Substitute arrangements will be put in place.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Many rabies-free countries are not islands. Has the Minister considered, in the consultations, including some more of those countries in the scheme?

Mr. Brown: The Government proposal will have to be very area specific when it is set before the House, and I shall consider those questions of nuance when the consultation is finished. However, if I err, it will have to be on the side of the safety of people in the United Kingdom, not on that of people's desire to move their pets around.

I have made a specific comment about arrangements in north America, which is the pretty obvious great exception to what is proposed. Very reasonably, Kennedy asked for a further look to be taken at that, and I find that request very persuasive. Rabies is endemic in wildlife in north America, but those who travel from north America—perhaps to work in this country, for business reasons or to take an extended holiday—are very unlikely to keep a rabid animal in their household as a pet, and veterinary standards in the United States are very high indeed. It is not beyond the realms of possibility that we shall be able to devise a parallel system for north America, but that is for the future.

I shall now discuss arrangements for establishing the new system. We must gear up ports to receive arrivals in a way that is compatible with the rules that we intend to impose. We shall need to install facilities and procedures, which will, I am afraid, slow down pet owners. Currently, ports usually move people through as fast as is compatible with the duties of Customs and Excise and immigration controls. Pet owners will have to do something different from other travellers: there will be a separate official for them to see.

We must tell other countries about the certificates that they may need to provide for those of their nationals who want to bring pets here. We must consider the diseases, other than rabies, that dogs and cats may carry. Moreover, we want the arrangements to be agreed for the whole of the British Isles, not for Great Britain alone. None of the details to be worked out seem to carry with them insuperable obstacles.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Eurotunnel and Eurostar got in touch with me today to say that the concept of Eurotunnel was designed specifically with such changes in mind, and that they could implement the regulations very quickly indeed. Eurostar would be delighted to offer its services for a pilot study.

Mr. Brown: That is excellent news, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that helpful suggestion. I shall arrange to get in touch with Eurotunnel and Eurostar through the Department to discover whether we might devise such a scheme. It seems logical that, if one were to set up a pilot project, the terminal at Waterloo and embarkation at Paris would be suitable—but I seem to remember that Eurotunnel also stops at Ashford and Lille, so the latter might be better. As I have shown, the details are best not worked out over the Dispatch Box. There is at least a possibility of a pilot project, which will be explored.

In the meantime, we have no choice but to continue to apply the existing laws; I hope that no one is under any illusions about that. We shall move as fast as we can, depending on the outcome of consultation, but quarantine will stay until we have something as effective to put in its place. Madam Speaker—I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker is in the Chair. How easy it is to lose friends in this place! Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am grateful to the Leader of the House for arranging the debate. I know that other hon. Members want to take part. I take the views of Members of Parliament from both sides of the House on such a topic very seriously indeed.

4.49 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): I thank the Minister warmly for the welcome that he extended to me at the start of the debate. I assure him that the Opposition are ready to support any measures that address the acute problems which have arisen in the industries for which his Department is responsible.

I take this opportunity of offering the Minister an apology for mistakenly suggesting earlier this month that he was once a member of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, a mistake that he hastily pointed out to me. In making that suggestion, I had his own best career interests in mind, because I was seeking, with some difficulty, to find aspects of his early career that he shared with the Prime Minister. Nevertheless, I regret the error.

This is the Minister's first chance to speak in the House since the summer recess started three months ago. It is a matter of some regret that in this, his first debate since the recess in Government time, the subject is quarantine. It is an important subject of course, but I cannot believe that, in House of Commons terms, it is particularly urgent, since the consultation period does not end until 31 December. That will be noted by farmers up and down the country. They will be puzzled—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The reaction of those on the Treasury Bench who are trying to deride this important point is extremely instructive. Farmers throughout Britain will note and be puzzled about why the Government and the Leader of the House, and possibly the Minister, think it more important for Parliament to discuss quarantine this afternoon than to address the crisis in agriculture, which became so much worse during the parliamentary recess.

Mr. Nick Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind words about me and for putting the record right. I am not and never have been a member of CND. On the question of the difficulties that the agriculture sector is experiencing at present, I and my Department have been working hard on those very issues and, at an appropriate time, I shall come to the House and have something of significance to say. Farmers are looking not for a debate, but for answers. When I can, I shall come to the House and say what I am able to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Now that the point has been made about the farmers and it has been responded to, we can go on to quarantine.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your guidance. In reverting to quarantine, I would just say that the Opposition are not at all reluctant to debate agriculture, as we hope to do next week. We look forward to the Minister's statement in due course.

The Opposition fully recognise the powerful case for reforming the present laws. Matters have moved on since the previous Government considered the issue. I endorse the Minister's appreciation of Professor Kennedy's report. We fully accept that the onerous restrictions imposed by the current quarantine requirements cause real anguish for many pet owners—for families who have to live abroad for professional reasons and particularly for those in the armed forces who serve this country. For all those people, the system is an extra burden on top of those that they already carry.

We are mindful of the example of Sweden where there is now a certain amount of experience and where the determination to exclude rabies matches our own. We also have the 1994 report of the Select Committee on Agriculture, which reached the clear conclusion that an alternative to the existing arrangements was desirable. I also accept the force of the argument that a change in the regulations will reduce the incentive for owners misguidedly to try to smuggle pets into Britain.

The Opposition will support the removal of the present tight controls subject to two essential conditions. First, the ending of the present restrictions on the movement of animals should not increase the risk that rabies will enter Britain. I warmly welcome the tone in which the Minister has assured us that that is also his concern. Secondly, the practical arrangements needed to make the proposed new system work should be feasible, realistic and watertight and not be a burden on the taxpayer. That point has already been raised by Conservative Members, and the Minister has said that the pet owner will bear the cost of the new system. I am glad that, on this matter, there has been no equivocation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hope that the Minister's right hon. Friend is equivocating like anything over some other matters which he is no doubt debating with him at the moment.

The question of risk is clearly the overriding consideration, and I have read the relevant chapter in the report. As the Minister said, no responsible Government would wish to be the instrument by which the country lost the freedom from rabies that it has enjoyed for almost the whole of this century. I do know how concerned the Government are with risks, even with quite small risks, as we have learnt from their imposition of a ban on beef on the bone. That ban was imposed despite the risk of dying from eating beef on the bone being less than the risk of being struck by lightning. The Minister will be familiar with the Opposition's view, which is held as strongly today as when last expressed, that that ban should be lifted.

I assume from what the Minister has said and from my reading of the report that it is the Government's view that, since the risk of eating beef on the bone in the past year was unacceptable, the risks that might arise from ending the current quarantine arrangements—I appreciate that we are not abolishing quarantine altogether, but we would be proposing a substantial relaxation of the arrangements in respect of some countries—are even lower.

Mr. Nick Brown: Strictly speaking, comparing like with like, I cannot truthfully tell the House today that the Government have measured the risks identified in Professor Kennedy's report against the risks of consuming beef on the bone. A direct comparison is not quite so easy as the hon. Gentleman suggests. If he studies Professor Kennedy's report carefully, he will see that the risk assessments cover a pretty wide range.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful to the Minister for that clarification. It is a point to which we might wish to return later. I am sure that the Minister agrees that the emphasis must be on making only those changes that do not impose any measurable risk. One important difference between the two examples in my comparison is that a risk that results from eating something is more or less run knowingly, while a risk from rabies might be outside one's control.

A number of detailed aspects arise with regard to the effectiveness of the practical arrangements proposed. The first concerns the position, which might arise, of a British pet returning to Britain from another EU country. From what I have read and heard so far, I am not clear how the checking station at the port of entry, say, Dover, will know whether, during the time that the animal has spent abroad, it has been outside the EU to a third country that might not be rabies free. It is at least possible that checks on animals re-entering the EU—outside Britain—might be rather less rigorous than those envisaged for the UK. So a UK resident who had a second home in another EU country, as a growing number do, and who might spend a substantial part of the year there, say six months—

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Tuscany.

Mr. Yeo: I believe that that is favoured by a number of the Minister's colleagues. If the cat had not mysteriously disappeared from No. 10 Downing street—who knows?—it might have been favoured with a trip to an expensive villa in Tuscany where it might have received extremely generous hospitality.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): A retirement scheme.

Mr. Yeo: Possibly so. Anyway, a British resident who made an extended visit to another part of the EU might, during the course of that visit, travel from there to a non-rabies-free country, return to the EU country where the second home was maintained, and then return to Britain. I should be interested if the Minister could give assurances about such a situation, which might easily arise.

Mr. Brown: One of the conditions of the scheme proposed by Professor Kennedy is that the animal must be inside the European Union or one of the islands referred to in the scheme for at least six months. It will have to have been vaccinated, the effectiveness of the vaccine will have to have been checked, and the animal will have to be deloused 24 hours before coming in, so that parasites that might carry rabies or other equally damaging diseases will be killed off. The safeguards proposed by Professor Kennedy are severe.

Mr. Yeo: I understand that. I have read the safeguards, and I have a continuing concern about the first one, which stipulates that an imported animal should have been in an EU country for the six months before it enters Britain. I am not clear how that fact will easily be verified at the point of entry into Britain. In trying to avoid the risk that an animal might not have been continuously in the EU for the previous six months, there is a danger that we will effectively be relying on standards at every point of entry into the EU to be as stringent as ours. The consultation is no doubt intended to cover such points. There is a loophole which I hope will be dealt with.

My second concern relates to the possible enlargement of the European Union. If countries where rabies exists were admitted as EU members, how do the Government envisage that the safeguards will be maintained? Can the Minister say whether any of the countries likely to negotiate EU membership are not rabies free? Does he agree that, unless a special system of protection is established, the admission of a non-rabies-free country into the EU could drive a coach and horses through the controls that are envisaged?

In that connection, will the Government publish a list of countries outside the present EU that would qualify as rabies free? The list that is envisaged does not precisely coincide with the list defined by the World Health Organisation as rabies free. It would clearly be helpful to know which countries are envisaged.

My third concern relates to the technology that will be used to identify animals. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) will deal with the matter in more detail in his speech, so I shall flag it up briefly at this stage. I understand that more than one type of microchip is already in use. Is that likely to cause practical difficulties?

Like other hon. Members who will no doubt take part in the debate, I have a constituent who runs a quarantine kennel. Miss Valerie Sheldrake has raised her concerns with me, one of which relates to the microchip. She suggests that it can move around inside an animal and could be reprogrammed or replaced. I hope that the Government will comment on that risk in due course. Like many other kennel owners, Miss Sheldrake points out that she has invested heavily in the facilities that she provides for quarantine. I hope that the Government will take account of her concern about the future of her own and other people's investments.

It would be interesting to know what proportion of the animals that currently go into quarantine—about 8,000 a year—would still have to do so if the new system were adopted. It is clearly impossible to forecast how many animals will be brought into the country in the future. The Minister referred to 250,000. I assume that, whatever the number, the Government will be flexible about the number of staff needed to maintain the new controls adequately, given the assurance that we have received that the costs will be borne by the pet owners, not by the taxpayer.

The Opposition support in principle the case for a fundamental change to the quarantine laws. We believe that the change should take place only when the legitimate concerns about the risks and the effectiveness of the arrangements proposed have been satisfied. I welcome the way in which the Minister has addressed the problem, and the tone of his comments and his reassurances. We welcome the fact that the consultation is taking place. I hope that that will help to meet the concerns that I have outlined.

5.4 pm

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover): I add my congratulations and welcome to my right hon. Friend the Minister on his first outing. He might remember coming down to my Dover and Deal constituency three months before the election and introducing me to the now famous pager. Much water has passed under the bridge since then.

One could easily be tempted to treat the subject of quarantine and the potential spread of rabies in an alarmist and emotive manner. I know that, in previous debates in the Chamber, that has happened. I shall avoid that temptation, but we cannot avoid the reality that rabies is, as Professor Kennedy states,

"still a horrific disease in animals and man".

That has been acknowledged in the debate.

We should not ignore the fact that, last year, there were more than 100 reported cases of rabies in mammals in EU countries, and more than 3,000 reported cases in central and east European countries. No one would deny the seriousness of the subject, and the need to approach the changes and relaxation of controls with care and consideration. The Kennedy report reflects a measured approach. I am sympathetic to the animal welfare case presented by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

My constituency, Dover, is in the front line in the importation from mainland Europe of animals that might be infected with rabies. Officials in the port of Dover are committed to preventing the illegal importation of animals. East Kent has a significant number of boarding kennels which are licensed to hold animals in quarantine and whose primary business has evolved to meet the Government's requirements in respect of the existing quarantine laws. The vast majority of those kennels meet the high standards of care required of them.

There are some 80 licensed kennels in the United Kingdom. Almost 80 per cent. of those are members of their representative body, the Quarantine Association. The association understands the need for change, and wants the Government to understand the implications for its members' business if the sweeping changes proposed in the Kennedy report are implemented in full.

Mr. White: Given that the number of animals coming through the port would be much larger, does my hon. Friend agree that one of the ironic consequences of introducing the new system might be more animals in quarantine than there are at present, because they would fail the strict conditions laid down by the Government?

Mr. Prosser: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment, but we would have difficulty convincing the kennel owners whose businesses go bust over the next three or four years that the proposals contain good news.

The kennel operators want to draw on their considerable experience and make positive and practical responses to the consultation, but they are deeply concerned about the uncertainty that will affect their businesses over the next few years. Kennel owners and their employees are worried about the impact of the changes on their businesses and the consequent loss of jobs. They realise that the present system, which has been in use since the turn of the century, is out of date and needs modernising, but they are anxious that all the necessary infrastructure should be in place before any new arrangements are implemented.

I was a little alarmed to hear suggestions from my right hon. Friend on the Front Bench about accelerated schemes, hurrying up the system and filling the channel tunnel with cats and dogs. We have had the present system for 100 years, and it is less than 100 days since the report was published. We should make a considered response and let the consultation process take its course over the next two months. We should listen to all the arguments, rather than rushing into change under pressure from a few particular lobbies.

While the association realises that the system needs reforming, kennel owners, and their association, have raised a couple of specific concerns. One that has been mentioned this afternoon involves lax border controls. An animal could be taken from one area to another and falsely licensed. The Minister has given some assurance on that in respect of the six-month rule, but we shall have to consider it a little more closely.

Mr. Loughton: I fully appreciate the interests of quarantine kennel owners in the hon. Gentleman's part of the country, but to coin a pun, one does not want to let the quarantine kennel owner's tail wag the animal welfare dog. Can he suggest a scheme allowing the 50 per cent. of quarantine businesses that will be lost under the proposals to receive some form of decommissioning compensation, perhaps along the lines of the scheme for the fishing industry? Is the hon. Gentleman in favour of that, and will he press the Minister for such a scheme?

Mr. Prosser: The hon. Gentleman has anticipated issues that I shall deal with later in my speech.

The second issue is the possibility that an animal owner living in, say, France might do a tour of central and eastern Europe before returning to France and crossing the channel. Can the Minister reassure us about that risk, which concerns proof of residence?

[Mr. Prosser]

Kennel owners have also voiced concerns about the proposed means of validating incoming animals. Last year, 150,000 pets entered the country through the port of Dover. The bulk of them entered during the busy summer period. There would be major problems in dealing with the increased number that would result from the changes.

The proposals have implications for both airports and sea ports. Dover Harbour Board says that it will be pleased to discuss ways and means of handling any new arrangements, but would have to take a commercial approach to any additional facilities or boat space that it might be asked to provide. It emphasises the need to deal with different ports in different ways.

For instance, the recommendation that there should be a dedicated lane for traffic from ferries to the new inspection facility is simply impracticable for Dover, which is the busiest ferry port in the world. Last year, it handled more than 21 million passengers. It has seven berths with seven carriageways serving each "link span", and incoming traffic is separated from outgoing traffic by a complex arrangement of overhead roadways and underpasses. If one adds to that the squeeze on available land, the extreme difficulty of providing dedicated lanes for travellers with pets becomes obvious. However, the port is happy to explore other options for facilities within the port.

Some kennel owners have suggested alternative options. For example, pets could be removed, under appropriate security, to inland sites such as existing quarantine kennels. That would allow adequate space and time for checks, including, where appropriate, blood tests.

Kennel owners have other practical concerns which they want to put to the Government as part of the consultation process. They are particularly concerned about the uncertainty of the present climate of change, which means that they cannot produce business plans, reassure their staff about their future, or invest in their kennels. They rightly feel, having effectively been an instrument of Government policy for so many years, that, if the Government's change in policy now threatens their existence, it is reasonable to expect some decommissioning funding or other special support to help them either to close their businesses in an orderly way and meet redundancy liabilities or to adjust to the new circumstances.

The Quarantine Association believes that full implementation of the proposals would lose its members some 46 per cent. of the market. If the changes are followed by a relaxation in quarantine regulations in north America, they would lose a total of 79 per cent. of their work. Such a dramatic impact would drive smaller kennels out of business. The association anticipates that fewer than 20 businesses would survive and more than 60 would be driven into bankruptcy.

I urge the Minister to consider all the responses to the report so that he can give due regard to the input from the quarantine kennel industry and its staff. I hope that, as he moves towards decisions that may seriously affect the prospects of hundreds of kennel workers across the land, including my constituents in Dover, he will agree to meet some of their representatives and explore ways to ease their difficulties.

5.15 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): May I add my congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box and on introducing this debate in such a non-partisan way? I fully understand the caveat that a significant number of agricultural issues need to be debated in the House, but it would be wrong of any of us to suggest that the issue is not of considerable concern to many people in the United Kingdom, as well as UK expatriates. The attention that the matter is at last receiving is long overdue.

As the Minister reminded the House, Sir Jerry Wiggin introduced the Agriculture Select Committee's report in 1994, when he was Chairman of that Committee. It said that the current quarantine system could no longer be justified and change was clearly overdue. At that time, the all-party parliamentary animal welfare group, which I had the privilege to chair, made it plain that we supported that view, and we have pressed for change ever since. I am delighted that the Parliamentary Secretary, who will wind up the debate, is in the Chamber because he has been a doughty fighter in the cause of change. I hope that my saying that does not embarrass him.

As the Minister said, the status quo is no longer an option. Even in the best quarantine kennels, quarantine is inhumane, to a large extent ineffective, and unnecessary. That is not to say that those of us who support change do not recognise the clear warnings that have been issued and the need to ensure that whatever replaces the quarantine system is every bit as secure as the current system. In that regard, the proposal by Professor Kennedy in his excellent report is not only as secure, but is arguably better.

It has already been said that significant numbers of animals are believed to be smuggled into the country by an increasing variety of means. It may originally have been by private yachts, but latterly it is by cross-channel ferry and, most recently, through the channel tunnel. We are led to believe that it is relatively easy for somebody who wishes to bring an animal into the UK illegally and to avoid quarantine to secure the services of a veterinary surgeon in northern France to have a cat or dog anaesthetised. It can then be put into the boot of a car with a blanket thrown over it, and it will not miaow or bark as it enters the country. We all know that, given the volume of traffic that now comes across the channel, the chances of detection are extremely remote. That is clearly going on, so to suggest, as some do, that the current system is somehow foolproof is very wide of the mark.

There is a tremendous incentive to smuggle animals into the country. The financial penalty of putting an animal into quarantine is £1,500 to £2,000 per animal, and many families have more than one animal. That is a great deal of money to spend for six months. That is not the animal lover's prime concern. What is, especially for the owner of a relatively elderly animal, is the animal's welfare. The owner desires not to be parted from that cat or dog for six months, so, because the animal lover knows that the animal is healthy, there is tremendous incentive to skirt round the rules, in the knowledge that no real harm will be done. However, there is always the danger that harm will be done and what Professor Kennedy is suggesting will therefore probably enhance rather than weaken the existing position.

As an honorary associate of the British Veterinary Association, I attended its annual congress this year. It will not surprise hon. Members to learn that, following publication of Professor Kennedy's report, this issue was a major topic of discussion throughout the three days. The then president of the association made his view plain, and he represents the view of a considerable number of veterinarians, which we should not ignore. Although they are reasonably content for there to be change, they urge haste with caution.

We must put the proper safeguards in place. If something goes horribly wrong, the veterinarians will be right at the sharp end, dealing with the problem. It is therefore not entirely surprising that they, more than some others, are expressing concerns, but whereas they were cautious about the quality of vaccines, the efficacy of blood testing and the reliability of microchips when Sir Jerry Wiggin's Agriculture Committee report was published in 1994, they are now satisfied on all those counts.

Veterinarians are now concerned that implementation is secure, and that the facilities, the trained personnel and the checks and balances are in place to make sure that the system works as Professor Kennedy intends it to. That is a major shift in the opinion of those to whom we should listen most—people in the veterinary profession.

I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser). He represents a significant number of quarantine kennels, which are used by my constituents and many others using the channel ports, and I fully understand his desire to represent those interests. There is a significant concern here. It is not so long ago that a television programme "exposed" the Dover and Folkestone quarantine kennels. That was especially unfortunately, as the hon. Gentleman will endorse, because the kennels had changed ownership by the time that the programme was transmitted. The new owners were attempting to clean up the act, invest in and improve the facilities, and bring those kennels up to standard.

Mr. Prosser: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the exposé programme on Channel 4 was filmed the day after the exchange had taken place? Since then, the new owner, whom I spoke to this morning, has invested more than £90,000 in cleaning up the kennel's act, making it respectable and achieving a caring arrangement. He is a animal lover and a pet owner. He says that he is in it purely for the love of the animals; I will not extend that argument too much, but he is dedicated to providing a careful and proper service.

Mr. Gale: I am very aware of all those things. I visited the kennels, and I hope and believe that I sought the hon. Gentleman's permission before I did so. He has put it clearly on the record that premises change hands, but there is another point.

The hon. Gentleman, having visited those kennels and the catteries, will be aware that there is an on-going programme of investment. I am concerned that, if we do not get a move on and the signals are not clear, and if provision is not made for the quarantine kennel owners, we shall effectively achieve planning blight—legislative blight, in this case.

What kennel or cattery owner will invest more in facilities that he or she believes may be redundant within two or three years? My fear is that, unless we move much more swiftly than has been suggested, standards will deteriorate and, as a consequence, animal welfare in quarantine kennels across the country will deteriorate. Owners simply will not be able to afford to invest, and what bank or lender would lend money to the proprietor of a business that is going to go out of business?

Although I do not seek to over-represent their cause, I believe that quarantine kennel and cattery owners have just cause to look to the House to secure their interests. They have been, effectively, acting on behalf of the Government, doing the business and the bidding of the regulatory process. People such as me have called on them to invest more, raise their standards and make sure that the animals in their care are well cared for. Having done that, we now have a responsibility to them.

As I suggested to the Quarantine Association a couple of years ago, it is possible to look to Europe, because we shall effectively be harmonising our regulations with those throughout the rest of the European Union, to allow freer movement of animals. If we are to do that, there is no reason why the EU should not look favourably, as it has on other agriculture issues, at what would be a modest contribution in European budgetary terms but what would be significant to the owners in terms of compensation for likely loss of business.

I want the process to be speeded up. I do not believe that it is necessary to take three years to get moving, and I am pleased that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is already considering staffing costs and ways of bringing the process forward. It should be possible to introduce a pilot scheme swiftly—not at the channel tunnel, but at either the port of Ramsgate or the port of Dover, as I proposed two years ago.

Four years ago, we proposed a pilot scheme on this basis: initially, but not for ever, quarantine kennel owners should collect animals from the port and take them to their kennels to hold overnight for blood tests and identification checks. There could be a problem at the ports. I do not want to make too much of another issue, but the port of Dover and other ports will be faced with the ludicrous imposition by Brussels, with the support of the Member of the European Parliament for East Kent, of the passenger registration system. That will cause interminable delay when it is introduced, and, not a green channel, but a channel for people with animals, would also cause severe delay.

I believe that the Minister could say now that those who can demonstrate, as Professor Kennedy requires, that their animals have been vaccinated, blood tested and microchipped should be able immediately to take advantage of such a system, provided that they are prepared to put their animals into quarantine kennels for a brief holding period while blood tests and identification checks are carried out. That would mean that we could take the heat out of the risk that was highlighted earlier and start immediately, rather than wait and risk further smuggling.

I go further: there is no reason whatever—my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) may want to touch on this—why, given the services of the Royal Army Veterinary Corps, service men serving overseas should not immediately be allowed to embark down this road.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I want to clarify a point. The hon. Gentleman suggests that animals should be blood tested on arrival in the United Kingdom.

[Dr. Tonge]

I thought that the idea was that they should be blood tested six months before, and that a microchip should be inserted. They would then have to go through a process similar to the use of a bar code in a supermarket.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Lady is right: that is Professor Kennedy's intention, and I am sure that that is what we shall arrive at. I am suggesting an interim measure to allow a pilot scheme to begin immediately, without the full ramifications of having to appoint and train staff and build and provide holding facilities at ports. If we have to wait for all that, there will inevitably be considerable delay.

I am suggesting to the Minister a way of getting this process up and running now without having to wait. If he can do that, it will enable him and his colleagues and veterinarians to study the process in practice. It will allow systems to be established for identification, vaccination and blood checks, and it will enable parasitology measures to take place, which are important as we are dealing with other problems as well as rabies. The sooner the Minister can get on with the job, the better, and I hope that he will be able to do so.

5.30 pm

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture on his exemplary introduction to the debate. From what he said, I am sure that the process will be dealt with cautiously and in great detail. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) apologised to my right hon. Friend, who was not a member of CND. If the hon. Gentleman is looking for targets, I am a minor one, because, like the Prime Minister, I was a member of CND. Unlike the Prime Minister, I still am a member—at least, I think so, because it seems to have given up collecting subs in the past few years.

I am glad of the opportunity to speak in favour of the recommendations in the Kennedy report—I have one or two minor reservations—and to congratulate his advisory group on the thoroughness of its work. It is remarkable how similar its central proposals are to those made by the Select Committee on Agriculture back in 1994, of which I was a member. There was a debate in the Chamber on 13 July 1995—some six months after the report. It is surprising that my speech and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston), the hon. Members for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), the Minister and the Chairman of the Select Committee, Sir Jerry Wiggin, if they had been made again today word for word, would have been directly germane to the discussion of the Kennedy report.

A couple of weeks ago, my good friend, Mrs. Mary Rees, the chairman of Lathom parish council in my constituency, told me that she was still nervous about the prospect of rabies. A decade or so ago, when it became clear that the channel tunnel was an inevitability, she expressed deep foreboding, in whatever forum she could find, about rabies entering the country. She had worked out that a fox can travel about 25 miles in a night, so, within 10 days, a rabid continental fox could be in Lathom—where, of course, it would want to go.

The Select Committee visited the channel tunnel before it was opened. We went inside it and saw that it was the one entry point where it was impossible for animals to come in unless they were deliberately smuggled in. It is ironic that there may be a pilot scheme through there, given that the company spent £20 million on defences against animals being brought into the country through the channel tunnel.

The fact that Mary Rees is still worried, and no doubt reflects the worries of many thousands of British people, shows the deep-seated and instinctive fear that rabies inspires.

Mr. Key: Has the hon. Gentleman pointed out to Mary Rees the evidence on page 224 of the report, which suggests that even she may not have to worry too much about this matter? It states:

"if 1000 dogs are imported each year one would expect that on average a dog incubating rabies might enter the country once every 1250 years."

Mr. Pickthall: Mary Rees is an elderly lady, but not quite that old. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention, and I shall point that out to her to ease her mind.

As I said, there is a deep-seated and instinctive fear about rabies in this country, which, to all intents and purposes, has been rabies free for a century. That fear was reflected in the evidence given to the Select Committee in 1994 by the then Minister for Agriculture, the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard). She was always meticulous in her evidence to the Committee. In answer to specific questions, she said:

"there would be, rightly, an enormous outcry if a relaxation of the system that we already have resulted in an outbreak of the disease".

Of course there would. She said:

"at this stage I am not persuaded that there should be further moves . . . I still believe that the overwhelming public view is that rabies is dangerous and frightening and that this"— quarantine—

"is the best, most effective way of preventing its outbreak in this country".

She rightly said:

"it is an appalling disease, both for animals and for human beings. I would certainly not want to move in any direction that increased the likelihood of the incidence of rabies in this country."

That is almost exactly the phrase that my right hon. Friend used.

I am quoting the right hon. Lady's perhaps over-cautious responses because they articulated the emotional response of citizens such as Mary Rees. They also more or less articulated my own feelings at the start of the Select Committee inquiry four years ago. Like most of the Committee members, I had a strong prejudice in favour of quarantine. It seemed to me that quarantine took advantage of our island status, it was a sensible bulwark against a horrible disease and it appeared to work. I believed that removing quarantine would seriously undermine public confidence. With the exception of Sir Jerry Wiggin and my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), the Committee shared that prejudice at the start of the inquiry.

By the time that the then Minister gave her evidence to the Committee at the end of its deliberations, we were unanimous in our belief that the alternatives to quarantine were infinitely preferable. Most of us had made a substantial U-turn on the basis of the evidence that we had heard. We were convinced beyond reasonable doubt, and we remain so.

We thought that the submission of our report to the Government made that crystal clear, but the then Minister's view prevented further action. It is important that Governments, for the most part, go with the grain of public opinion, especially on such big, emotive issues. However, there are occasions—this was, and still is, one of them—when Governments should take a lead in explaining why an emotional reaction of historic proportions must be tempered by hard evidence and new science.

The previous Government failed on that count, and I am more than pleased that my right hon. and hon. Friends have encouraged the public education process by setting up the reappraisal under Professor Kennedy. I also congratulate the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, members of the armed forces, Passports for Pets, the all-party committee and the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who has been meticulous member of that committee. Since 1994, they have taken part in an unwavering programme of public education on the alternatives to quarantine. I believe that that has made strong inroads into public prejudices on the issue. The public are not quite so terrified of possible alternatives to quarantines as they were four years ago.

The central reason why I changed my mind during the inquiry had nothing to do with sympathy for pet owners. Although I do sympathise with them, if the balance were between their natural attachment to their pets and the possibility of rabies, there would be no contest. My main concern, and that of my colleagues, was to recommend the best possible way of maintainin the United Kingdom's rabies-free status. The costs of quarantine, in both financial and emotional terms, were shown to be so huge as positively to encourage the smuggling of animals. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington and the hon. Member for North Thanet both put that point forcefully.

We became more than ever conscious of our vast and indented coastline, with its thousands of small harbours, and the huge increase in the use of small leisure craft and even business craft. Of course the alternatives recommended by the Select Committee, and refined and amplified by the Kennedy committee—vaccinations, blood tests, identification by microchip, health certificates and passports—involve costs, but nothing like the costs of quarantine to the individual concerned.

Whereas quarantine tempts otherwise honourable and honest people to smuggle—dishonest people will always smuggle: it is their business—the alternative gives those same people an incentive not only to comply with reasonable regulations, but to maximise the monitoring of their animals' health. The case for the alternatives to quarantine is not a sentimental response to the emotional ties of owners and pets, nor is it about helping the tourist trade. It is about positively improving our protection against rabies.

As I have said, the case for the Kennedy recommendations was effectively made four years ago, and I think that it was approved by most hon. Members on both sides of the House who followed the issue. My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) and my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), the Parliamentary Secretary, made their general support for the alternatives clear before the last general election. For four years, the case has been examined, in public and in the trade press, and the Kennedy report has now set it out very clearly.

That brings me to one problem that I have with the report's recommendations, which others have mentioned and on which I shall be interested to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister. In recommendation 15, the advisory group said that the new system should not be adopted for, perhaps, three years. I agree with what has been said so far: surely that is much too long a delay. Of course time is needed to get the system right, to train staff, to inform the public and to organise premises, but I should have thought that could be achieved in a time nearer to one year. If the Government really feel that the whole scheme cannot be up and running until 2001, would they consider introducing pilot schemes as soon as possible—as the hon. Member for North Thanet suggested—in two or three ports of entry? Perhaps Dover should not be one, but Liverpool might do. It is rather a long way away, but it needs the jobs. My right hon. Friend the Minister seemed quite sympathetic to that idea.

Perhaps there should also be a pilot scheme at Heathrow—which is already fairly well equipped for the purpose—so that we can see how the system works, and meet the training requirements in the report. There is no point in beginning to train people if there is nowhere for them to be trained and, if we have pilot schemes, it may be possible to provide the necessary facilities.

I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister could interpret the recommendations on European harmonisation in paragraphs 10.5.5 and 10.5.7. I understand our legal obligations under the treaty of Rome and so on, but I fear that—unless I have misread those recommendations—we might create a bit of a pickle. In its summary, the advisory group recommends "that the Minister introduce the new system specifically and explicitly as a transitional system".

That is fine. It also recommends

"that the Minister simultaneously seek to promote a harmonised EU system of controls against rabies which will reflect the concerns and meet the needs identified in our recommendations."

That is a two-track business. Thirdly, the advisory group recommends

"that, until rabies has been effectively eradicated from the EU and appropriate EU-wide measures put in place in respect of animals to be imported from third countries where rabies is endemic (including the candidate countries of eastern Europe), the Minister should, if necessary, seek a derogation from a harmonised EU system to allow checks to take place at British points of entry."

Unless I have misread the proposals, we could end up with a mish-mash of systems—for which the Government would be responsible—that in some ways contradicted each other. That could create more of a worry among kennel owners who still have some part of their business to run over the next few years.

Nevertheless, the report offers great promise. It confirms the strongly held belief of many that the existing system of quarantine is no longer the best way of dealing with the inward movement of animals from what are virtually risk-free countries. Its proposals would establish a much stronger and fairer system, while maintaining powerful safeguards—in fact, the same safeguards—against the entry of animals from risky countries. That is only a personal opinion, but I think that we should class the United States and Canada as risky countries until they can be conclusively proved not to be.

Incidentally, the implementation of the proposals would be an enormous relief for thousands of individuals, especially in the armed forces, whose jobs necessitate their living abroad with their families and moving back and forth. It would also help the tourist trade at the margins—although I must say that I contemplate the prospect of thousands of foreign tourists arriving with their dogs with no pleasure at all.

Those last two factors, however, are bonuses. The main point of the Kennedy recommendations is safety and common sense. Parliament, and the Government, have a duty to sell them to those in the United Kingdom, such as Mary Rees, who have a deep and abiding fear that quarantine has so far helped to allay. It is our duty to explain in detail that the new measures will constitute a better, not a weaker, system of control.

5.46 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): The hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) performed a service by reminding us so lucidly of the background to the Agriculture Committee's deliberations in 1994, and the reasons—which he gave fairly and coherently—why it reached its decisions and its vantage point.

The Minister described himself as sympathetic to the Kennedy report—I hasten to add that Professor Kennedy is no relation—and his stance has been broadly echoed in the House. This is one occasion—another may be next week's agriculture debate, which will arise from a Conservative motion—when the Conservative spokesman and I can make common cause. Given another issue that is being dealt with outside the House today, perhaps we are all into constructive opposition—on this issue, if not on others.

I agree with the fairly consensual points that have been made about changes to the quarantine system. However, although concern has been expressed about the timing, we should bear in mind the fact that the present system has been in place since 1901, and has been stupendously successful. Parliament is right to tread with caution, given the horrendous down side—rabies—which is the alternative to the status quo. But, as the hon. Member for West Lancashire said so persuasively, given the costs of quarantine—which are undoubtedly driving some people into illegal activity—it is surely the lesser of two evils to opt for a system that is likely to deliver than to stick with a system that, at least potentially, is delivering less well. That is the balance of probability that should commend itself to the House.

Dr. Tonge: I remind my hon. Friend that many pet owners act responsibly and vaccinate their pets—which would thus qualify for a pet passport or microchip—but still have to pay quarantine costs to kennels. I am particularly reminded of my constituents, the two dogs Whisky and Soda, who have already suffered six months' quarantine for this country after their master dealt with Hong Kong. They could easily have to go through the process again if their master, useful man that he is, is sent to Europe in another role. I make a plea to the Minister to remember Whisky and Soda.

Mr. Kennedy: Anyone who knows my personal habits knows that I am always willing to defer to whisky and soda, although not necessarily of the canine variety. My hon. Friend makes a telling point, which has been well trailed through the national and international press by her constituent, Mr. Chris Patten, although what she says may be a strong argument not to offer him a job at the EU Commission. However, I shall not stray too far down that road.

Joking aside, it was useful that someone with a high public profile was able to draw attention to the sense of frustration that so many people have felt as a result of the current arrangements. Indeed, that is partly what lay behind the Kennedy committee proposals.

It is obviously extremely important that documentation and vaccination requirements are met. Proper border controls are also important in preventing unprotected animals from entering the country, and that relates to monitoring generally.

Hon. Members have mentioned kennel owners, and gun control may be a more valid comparison than fisheries decommissioning policy in this case. When, under the new Government, the House passed primary legislation on guns, we dealt with the issue of compensation for those who would lose out in terms of business. I accept that the comparison is not ideal, but there is a legitimate argument that the Government should consider those people with businesses that carry out, albeit privately, a Government agency function and who, as a result of primary legislation, may be financially disadvantaged.

I take this opportunity to make a plea for those people who have to use guide dogs—there is a strong case for exempting them from the current rules on travel outwith this country. I expect that all hon. Members have heard from constituents who have found themselves in farcical situations when travelling abroad on holiday. They have discovered—in some cases, not even at the point of exit from this country but when they have been in transit—that they were not to be allowed to have their guide dogs with them on arrival. That is a bizarre state of affairs for people who are self-evidently dependent on a guide dog for access and mobility and for their capacity to enjoy visits to the continent or elsewhere abroad. I hope that the Government will be particularly sympathetic, even under the current arrangements, to the rights of disabled people, especially those who use guide dogs.

As has been clear from this debate, the House is generally supportive of the Government's stance on the Kennedy recommendations, and I hope that we can make further legislative progress on the matter sooner rather than later.

5.54 pm

Ms Jenny Jones (Wolverhampton, South-West): I am pleased that the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) mentioned the fact that people with guide dogs have faced great problems in travelling abroad because of the quarantine laws. That point has been raised in the considerable postbag—more than 100 letters—that I have received on this subject from my constituents. All those who have written have been in favour of the Kennedy recommendations, and some have gone further, wanting quarantine to be ended immediately, although I do not go along with that view.

There has been consensus in this important debate and I, too, welcome the Kennedy report and its recommendations. A review of quarantine is now long overdue, not least, as the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) argued, on animal welfare grounds. We can debate quarantine reform because veterinary science has developed to such an extent that there is a viable alternative to quarantine—vaccination, blood testing and microchipping.

We also have a far greater knowledge of animal behaviour and the effects of the long-term separation of animals from their owners. Indeed, it has been known for some time that dogs can develop behavioural problems as a result of being separated from their homes and owners. Now, however, we own far more cats than dogs; we seem to be turning into a nation of cat owners, of whom I am one. I have owned cats for 35 years—

Dr. Palmer: Hear, hear.

Ms Jones: My hon. Friend says, "Hear, hear."

I regard myself as a responsible owner, and the House may be interested to hear that I made electoral history last year as the first Member of Parliament to choose to be photographed not with the nearest and dearest of my family—my husband and son—but with one of my kittens. What greater commitment could anyone have to a pet?

There has been a great deal of research into the behaviour of cats, and it has been discovered that cats suffer far more than dogs in quarantine. Two of the saddest letters that I have received were from constituents explaining how their pets had died in quarantine, not from rabies or parasitic diseases from abroad, but, after about four months in a kennel and a cattery respectively, from diseases caught from the other animals.

There is nothing sadder than having to part from one's pet when it has to be put in quarantine. Pet owners do not want their pets to return to this country with rabies, but they do not want them to die from another disease that has been picked up in this country. Now that there is a real alternative to quarantine, the animal welfare argument should be given due weight in our consideration of the Kennedy report.

Until we manage to eradicate rabies worldwide, there will always be a risk that it could get into this country. I have long thought that our analysis of where the risk lies has been wrong. We have assumed that people will get rabies from pets brought in from abroad, but more and more Britons travel abroad to countries that have rabies—the House of Commons Library came up with the figure that a quarter of summer holidaymakers from Britain regularly travel to Turkey, the United States of America, Kenya and other countries that are known as rabies black spots—so rabies is more likely to be brought back here by someone who, perhaps through lack of caution, has been bitten by a rabid animal abroad.

Every time I go abroad on a ferry, I am struck by the emotive posters warning of the dangers of rabies from bringing pets into the country, but I wonder how much information is given to those travelling to countries where there is known to be a risk. We should consider an education campaign aimed at travellers, because we must reassess the source of the risk of rabies ever getting back into this country, which of course we all hope will not happen.

Moving from quarantine to vaccinating, blood testing and microchipping will certain mean upheaval, but, since 1994, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has accepted that animals imported for sale can come in on the vaccination rather than the quarantine route, so we clearly already have the beginnings of that way of controlling rabies.

Three years will be too long a delay. I agree with those who have suggested a pilot scheme based on vaccination in one of our ports where animals come in, in line with the European Union directive. That should be started within a year.

6.2 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): In all fairness, I should declare an interest at the outset. My dear, beloved mother-in-law, who lives in the United States, is deterred from visiting this country frequently by our existing excellent quarantine provisions. I must stress that that is not the reason why I intend to argue in favour of keeping the existing regime.

Nor, indeed, is my main reason for expressing severe reservations about the proposals the fact that we have an alarming degree of consensus in the House. I have an instinctive suspicion of consensus, especially when it is cosy. Many of us recall that, when there is almost complete agreement on something in the House, we often end up with a disaster. I need not give a catalogue, as hon. Members of all parties will be familiar with what I have in mind.

There is no harm in some dissent being expressed on an occasion such as this, if only for the sake of pointing out some aspects that have not yet been covered. I am sure that the Parliamentary Secretary will not take it amiss when I express my regret at the absence of the Minister of State. When I raised the matter of conditions other than rabies in a debate on the Animal Health (Amendment) Bill—an excellent little provision with the total support of the House, including me, because it was relevant to standards of quarantine provision—the Minister of State said:

"it is a myth that quarantine is all about rabies. The pressure mounted by lobby groups to abolish the quarantine laws ignores all the other issues raised in the New Scientist article to which the right hon. Gentleman"— that was a reference to me—

"referred. We should therefore not rush to judgment on that issue. It is not a question of not wanting to be the Government who let rabies into the country. This matter goes well beyond rabies, to issues such as climatic change and bugs discovered in quarantine cells."—[Official Report, 27 March 1998; Vol. 309, c. 851.]

That gave me the impression that the Minister of State had a balanced view. I would not dream of implying that the Minister of State's absence has any significance.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): I am glad to explain that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has an important engagement this evening and tomorrow for the official opening of the cattle traceability scheme, for which he has responsibility. All of us as

[Mr. Morley]

Ministers have spent a great deal of time talking to, and paying attention to, different people and organisations throughout the country, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that my hon. Friend has important duties to perform. His absence is not due to any particular view on the issue. As the right hon. Gentleman said, his view is perfectly balanced and in line with the Government's position on the Kennedy report.

Mr. Forth: I am delighted to hear that the Minister of State is balanced. That is a great reassurance to us all.

My primary reservation can be characterised, rather inelegantly, under the heading, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it". We have had some interesting exchanges along those lines, and of course I am not saying that the existing quarantine arrangements are perfect or foolproof. Frequent reference has been made to the likelihood that animals have been smuggled into the country to get around the regulations, and I do not doubt that that happens, but the existing regime is simple, straightforward and easily understood, and those important virtues should not be overlooked.

There is a parallel with the argument, which was started today, about the virtues of first past the post—an electoral system that is elegant, simple and easily understood—as against the nonsense of the proposals of the partial Jenkins commission, which are bizarre and incomprehensible. That may remind us of the proposals in the Kennedy report. The existing regime has the strength of simplicity.

My next point is particular to me, and I expect few people to accept it. To my mind, the proposals to do away with our present arrangements are yet another diminution of the concept of the territoriality of the British Isles and the United Kingdom, and yet another example of the way in which proposals are made to reduce the significance of our borders and our nation as it has been historically understood.

Dr. Palmer: Does the logic of the right hon. Gentleman's position not suggest that we should introduce quarantine for foreign humans?

Mr. Forth: I am always open to any such helpful suggestion. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I could get together and work on that one. I can think of many foreign humans who are extremely undesirable and whom I would not want here unless they had a microchip inserted, were vaccinated and were otherwise identified.

My point is unashamedly political. Each time we move in the direction of the Kennedy report, we reduce the possibility of continuing to identify ourselves as a separate nation with border controls that have always been, to my mind, an important part of nationhood and national identity. I regret that, and believe that it is an important consideration that should not be cast lightly aside.

My main objection arises from my doubts about the safety and integrity of the process that is suggested. I had some research done into the incidence of rabies in Europe, the European Union, the European Economic Area—the European continent as a whole—which came up with some fascinatingly different figures. For example, figures relating to the first quarter of 1998 suggest that, in Europe as a whole continent—charmingly put—1,711 cases were reported in domestic animals. Another set of figures suggests that, in Europe as a whole, there were 2,257 cases. I think that that was for a whole year for domestic animals. Referring to the most recent quarter, a publication rather charmlessly called "RABNET" states:

"During 'This Quarter', 1711 rabies cases were reported in Europe".

It then gives details for different countries.

The relevant point was made earlier that, whatever the position in the European Union as constituted—rabies is still endemic in certain parts of the EU—there is a considerable degree of endemic rabies in the countries that it is proposed to bring into an enlarged EU. That suggests that a risk element is involved, perhaps not so much in the existing EU as in an EU enlarged as proposed. I hope that the Government will weigh that up carefully when they consider the effectiveness, efficacy and safety of the proposed regime against the background of the incidence of rabies and the degree of increased land travel that is bound to take place across greater Europe, if I may thus characterise it.

Mr. Loughton: Would my right hon. Friend concede that, according to the figures for last year, there were apparently only 12 cases in the whole of greater Europe, as he calls it, of humans contracting rabies, of which none ended in death? Of those 12 cases, 10 came from the Russian Federation, one from Lithuania and one from within the EU—France.

Mr. Forth: That is reassuring, but I am not sure whether it is reassuring enough for us to introduce an element of greater risk, if indeed that were involved in a change of regime. I do not know whether the elderly lady constituent of the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) would be reassured by that. To reassure her and many like her is an important part of this whole debate.

The British Veterinary Association has been mentioned. I have here a news release issued by it in which the BVA vice-president, Mr. Ted Chandler, said:

"The present quarantine policy has served this country well over many years and while it is indeed true that the science is now available to justify a new approach in theory, the capacity and commitment to enforce a new system in practice is quite another matter. Neither the Government nor the profession should be under any illusion that new laws and a new system of rabies control can simply be created, brought in and made to work. If as a result of change rabies were to be introduced to this country, there would be the most serious consequences for all involved.

If and when the Government takes a decision to change, consult and subsequently legislate, there must be no short cuts on enforcement. There can be no compromise on professional vigilance and there must be no collapse of public confidence. The task for Government is daunting. The aim of the veterinary profession must be to support only those changed procedures which meet their scientific criteria and are capable of being enforced."

I quoted that news release at some little length because the views of the veterinary profession are important. If the Government are to make the changes that are proposed in the report, it is important to make absolutely sure that the vets are fully on board, not only because their views matter, perhaps more than any other single group of people, but because they and their professional colleagues in this country and, more important, abroad will be crucially involved in making the proposals work.

My greatest reservation arises for the following reason. Throughout the debate, it has been claimed that the present quarantine arrangements, because they are expensive and unpleasant, deter people from using them and encourage smuggling. The animal welfare point has been made by many who have contributed. I looked at the proposals in the report with growing disbelief and asked myself these questions. Is it likely that people who wish to take their pets abroad and bring them back will go through the process described in the report? Will microchips be implanted in those pets? Will people have their pets vaccinated? Will the pets have the required blood test before re-entry at a laboratory approved by the United Kingdom? Will such laboratories be handy and close enough for people easily to fulfil that requirement? Will they get the treatment 24 hours before re-entry for the conditions other than rabies that are mentioned—I am glad that they are mentioned—in the report? What about the person who has to change plans at the last minute and is faced with the choice either of finding somewhere for the treatment or of taking the risk of smuggling the pet back into the United Kingdom?

The requirements for certification involve finding a competent authority, filling out a single sheet of paper, having a unique identification number and a qualified veterinarian. The report rather quaintly states, although I understand why, that black ink must not be used. That is presumably so that the paper cannot be easily photocopied or forged. The more I thought about that exhaustive and exhausting list of requirements, the more I wondered whether it would be likely that even the most devoted, dedicated pet owner who did not wish to fall foul of the new regime could fulfil all those requirements in all reasonable circumstances. I think not.

My worry is that, if we make the proposed change, having persuaded ourselves of the disadvantages of the present regime, the new regime would be more bureaucratic, more complicated and more difficult in many ways for pet owners to adhere to. Therefore, in the end, it may not have anything like the desired effect. We may end up with a worse system than the one that we have. As is traditionally said in these cases, I hope that I am proved wrong.

I am worried that so many people are rushing to embrace this proposal so whole-heartedly without expressing sufficient concern about its complexities, its bureaucratic nature and the likelihood that it will deter people from ensuring, as we all wish, that animals are free of rabies and other unpleasant conditions and that those conditions are not brought into this country. For that reason and the others that I have given, I remain to be convinced.

6.18 pm

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who made some pertinent points in his valuable contribution. He is right to say that there is always a danger of rushing into changes. The context of my speech, however, will be in total opposition to what he has said. Nevertheless, it is vital that we hear such opinions because many of our constituents feel the same. As my right hon. Friend the Minister said earlier, 10 per cent. of the respondents to the consultation at this stage have expressed some opposition.

When I received my first correspondence saying that a constituent wanted to see me at my surgery about passports for pets, I was reminded of a story told by a Conservative Member. He said that at his first surgery, somebody wanted to extend the franchise to the canine variety. His constituent thought that he had rather an intelligent dog and that the franchise should be extended to it.

Dr. Palmer: Was its name Whisky?

Mr. Reed: I think that they were called Whisky and Soda.

I was more fortunate as my constituent explained the reasons for the passport for pets scheme. I was more than happy to listen and to take the arguments on board. During the past 12 months or so, I have become quite deeply involved in the issue. We need to reassure our citizens that whatever replaces the current scheme is satisfactory and, more importantly, maintains the United Kingdom as a rabies-free zone.

The case for ending quarantine has been made forcefully this evening and it is not necessary for me to repeat all the arguments. However, I support the need for change in the cost to the individual as £1,000 to £1,500 is rather expensive. For many people it is a substantial sum to find in one go. Many people love their animals and pets play a vital role in their lives, as my constituency case demonstrates.

The welfare issue is important and has been touched on in the debate. The figures suggest that, even if we included the United States in the scheme, some 29 per cent. of animals entering the country would still need to be kept in quarantine, so we cannot let up on ensuring that welfare standards are maintained. We should not ignore the issue simply because we are moving to a different system.

The world has moved on. I am not a scientist, but the evidence in the Kennedy report suggests that the risk is small—there were 12 cases in the wider European area. If only 12 humans out of a population of some 500 million contracted rabies, the risk is extremely small. If the proposed scheme involves only a small additional risk, it is probably one worth taking.

Smuggling continues to be widespread. We have heard anecdotal evidence of that this evening and I am sure that we all have constituency cases. Since I have discussed the issue on local radio and with the local media, I have been inundated with examples.

My only personal experience of the issue was in Germany a few years ago when there was a rabies scare in the area where I was staying, so I am aware of the fear that rabies causes in the local population.

I wish to mention a constituency case that urges me to make two specific points that I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will consider in the final implementation of the scheme. They concern the time scale with the delay of up to three years and the exclusion at this stage of the United States.

My constituent, Mrs. Lily Rigley, has an 82-year-old sister who moved to the United States some 30 years ago. All her family there have now passed away, so she is on her own and now wishes to return to the United Kingdom to live with her sister in Loughborough. She lives in

[Mr. Reed]

Florida, so she will definitely be travelling in the right direction. Loughborough is an extremely attractive place. However, her sister Margaret is blind and has a guide dog.

Mr. Paice: She will not know if it is any better, then.

Mr. Reed: Even if she were fully sighted, she would appreciate the delights of Loughborough. If Margaret were to return to the United Kingdom now, her guide dog would be placed in quarantine for six months, creating enormous upheaval in terms of her mobility and her life style. It is quite worrying for her in that, because of her age, her friends in the United States have diminished in number. She finds it extremely difficult to cope and she would desperately like to return to the United Kingdom.

Lily Rigley in my constituency and her sister Margaret in the United States have been excellent campaigners. They have contacted an enormous number of American senators and I appear to be on all their mailing lists. I have been inundated with e-mails. Information technology makes some things rather difficult as e-mails are all too easy to pass around.

The Kennedy report recommends that a further study is necessary. It has already carried out a risk assessment which concludes that there would be a slight additional risk if the scheme were extended to the European Union. However, it is such a very slight risk that I urge my hon. Friend to consider implementing the scheme as quickly as possible.

When she heard about the report on the news, Margaret Nash booked her airline ticket and arranged to return to the United Kingdom just before Christmas. One of the hardest things that I have had to do as a constituency Member was to phone Lily Rigley and ask her to tell her sister to cancel her ticket as we do not change the law that quickly in the United Kingdom. I am proud that, in the past 18 months, the Government have introduced many measures very speedily and I hope that they address this issue with the same urgency.

If we were to start some of the background work now and set up a pilot study, perhaps fast-tracking individuals such as those with guide dogs would be an ideal solution. Margaret Nash had already booked her ticket. I am sure that others feel equally anxious to come to the United Kingdom, and having heard about the issue on the world news, they will feel that the time has come to do so. Unfortunately, some may be prepared to take the risk of smuggling, perhaps assuming that, if the Government are considering changing the system, they may not prosecute them. I hope the signal goes out that that is not the case. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will repeat that, in the meantime, the quarantine regulations will continue to be enforced strictly. That is another difficulty that will arise if we delay the scheme for three years, as is mentioned in the Kennedy report.

The recruitment and training of the 43 staff could start fairly quickly. I cannot understand how it could take up to three years. If someone were employed to implement the strategy and set up the programme, I do not understand the time scale of three years.

I wanted to keep my remarks brief, highlighting my concerns on behalf of my constituent which have led to my involvement in the on-going debate. I particularly emphasise the points that I made about the timing of the scheme. It has been discussed since the Select Committee report in 1994. There has been plenty of debate in the House and the country, and I know from my postbag that many of my constituents are concerned about the issue. I am more than happy to suggest that we implement the recommendations in the Kennedy report as quickly as possible and give serious consideration to including the United States in the scheme.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I am afraid that I am about to disappoint my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) by adding to the rather cosy agreement that, with his exception, has existed on both sides of the House.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate on four counts. First, I speak as vice-chairman of the Conservative animal welfare group. Secondly, I represent the closest channel port to London; I am not touting for the business of a pilot scheme as we do not have a passenger ferry, although Shoreham airport could be used. Thirdly, I am a supporter of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and its campaign on quarantine and many other dog-related subjects, and I am a co-supporter of the Registration of Dogs Bill, which, alas, did not make it on to the statute book. Finally, and perhaps, uniquely, I speak also as a Member who has a constituent who was bitten last year by a rabid bat, which had apparently fare-dodged a cross-channel ferry to Newhaven. I may, therefore, be able to speak with a little more authority than many of my colleagues.

We have already heard that Chris Patten said that the existing law is a painful and expensive farce. I can infer from what some hon. Members have said that quarantine and rabies are still something of a taboo subject, one of the last taboos in this country. One conjures up images of people manning the barricades, jealously guarding our boundaries against a dreadful, filthy, foreign disease. That is a rather outmoded concept. Yet, when the channel tunnel was being discussed, some people whipped up hysteria by saying that rats and other creatures would flood across from the continent, and that we would have rabies within a matter of days. Of course, that has not happened.

The truth is that the quarantine system has the potential to do more harm than good. Most hon. Members have mentioned the greater risk from smuggling, which may be much more dangerous, and which is certainly not on the wane. We have heard less about the enormous discomfort and stress that is caused to cats and dogs that have to go into quarantine, as well as that caused to their owners.

I welcome the Kennedy report; such a report is long overdue. Many things have happened since the report of the Select Committee on Agriculture of November 1994. The campaign for passports for pets has matured greatly, and the experiments in Scandinavian countries have proved largely successful. I do not see why we cannot base a scheme on those experiments. The technology of microchipping has advanced enormously, too, into a simple and straightforward process. On the continent itself, enormous progress has been made towards combating for rabies, which was a big problem in the past, but which is certainly diminishing.

The report is detailed, balanced and welcome to all animal lovers, and we should note that there are around 6.9 million dog owners in the United Kingdom. The report also has implications for other measures to encourage more responsible ownership of pets, such as the dog registration scheme that many of us supported. Alas, a Bill to introduce the scheme failed, just as the earlier ten-minute Bills to amend the quarantine law, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), failed.

Mr. Morley: The Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) completed all its stages and is now law.

Mr. Loughton: We may be talking about different ten-minute rule Bills.

Mr. Morley: The Animal Health (Amendment) Act 1998.

Mr. Loughton: I defer to the Minister's greater wisdom. The measure introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West would have tackled quarantine specifically, and that did not progress.

Some 5,000 dogs and 3,000 cats are in quarantine each year. Those figures have been relatively static over the past 25 years, although the figure for dogs has dropped over the past year, which suggests that people anticipate a change in the law. If they do not get one sooner rather than later, there will be a good deal of angst. As the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) mentioned, there is the possibility that people may flout the law if to do so will soon not be an arrestable offence.

The trauma and stress inflicted on pets themselves should not be underestimated. Six months in quarantine is three and a half dog years, which is a large chunk of an animal's life. The cost can be around £1,200 for a cat and about £2,300 for a large dog. There are other animals: the cost for a chinchilla is £692; for a guinea pig or ferret £434; and for hamsters and rats—for those who value their pets so highly—£247. Out of 200,000 cats and dogs imported over the past 25 years, there have been four possible cases of rabies, although all of them were questionable. During the same period, 2,800 animals in quarantine have died, 1,200 of them during the past 10 years.

There is a question mark over the standard of quarantine kennels. Although there are many good ones, some anomalies were highlighted recently in a Channel 4 programme. Owners have no right to an independent inspection of their animals' living conditions. In 1995, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food received 35 complaints of animal cruelty in quarantine and kennels.

Across the world, 35,000 people die of rabies. It is a virulent, important and dangerous disease. The majority of deaths happen on the Indian sub-continent. I have spoken already, but will remind my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, of the risk we face—that only 12 people have had the disease in Europe, none of whom have died, over the past year. There were around 5,000 cases of animal rabies in greater Europe last year, but that was the lowest figure ever. It was just 20 per cent. of the comparable figure from 1989. The problem has certainly lessened.

The truth is that quarantine is not preventing anything. It causes harm to animals, and distress and cost to their owners. The risk of rabies in the UK is small and diminishing. The Kennedy report offers something far more effective in the form of vaccination. We should remember, too, that quarantine is unfair not only to members of the armed forces who often travel over borders to reside in Germany or other places, but to those in the diplomatic service whose life styles take them abroad. It also prevents many Britons from holidaying on the continent if they wish to take their pets with them. In the spirit of wishing to encourage greater European understanding—though not necessarily harmonisation of systems—I believe that that would be helpful.

Smuggling is alarming. Between 1988 and 1995, there were 769 recorded instances of animals being illegally imported to the UK. That is the tip of the iceberg as those are the ones that were caught. The RSPCA estimates that, each year, at least 1,000 animals are smuggled into the UK illegally, of which only about 10 per cent. are detected. There are also anti-quarantine activists who uses quasi-guerrilla tactics. One Chichester-based organisation regularly sends out detailed newsletters on how to transport animals through the channel tunnel without being caught. That is big business in some parts of the country.

There are big anomalies in our present system. Ours is the only country in the world to operate a compulsory six-month detention period, with the exception of the Hawaiian islands. Australia and New Zealand have recently modified their regulations for animals coming from rabies-free countries. Japan has no quarantine regulations, and it is rabies free. The experience of the Norwegian and Swedish systems shows that they can work. Those systems involve vaccination, antibody testing and passports. There is also, importantly, no cost to the taxpayer in those countries. Monitoring the current system alone costs the Exchequer about £1.25 million in respect of inspecting quarantine premises, testing animals and publicity about rabies.

I agree with the Kennedy proposals, which are common sense, because vaccination is a cure while quarantine is not. Vaccination ensures that animals do not contract rabies. The terms for revaccination and proper accreditation of laboratories are sensible.

I strongly favour giving animals proper passport identification documents, which is now easy with microchips. Some hon. Members mentioned the inconvenience of microchips, but they are the size of a grain of rice. It is a simple, virtually painless injection, over in a matter of seconds, and it costs only a few pounds. It is not costly or complicated; any vet worth his salt could administer it. The cost of the registration scheme, and its paperwork and everything that goes with, it has been estimated by the RSPCA at £300 to £400, which is a substantial discount on the average quarantine fees faced by owners. The scheme does them a financial favour.

One matter in the identification procedure to which I might take exception is the suggestion that uniquely numbered microchips cannot be chosen by the dogs' owners. That is a shame. Like personalised number plates, they could raise a good deal of revenue for good causes.

[Mr. Loughton]

The possibility of Fifi 1, Posh Dog 2 or—most exclusive of the lot—K9, makes me think that we are missing a trick and an extra form of revenue for dog welfare.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): I have come late to the debate, but I am listening with great interest to my hon. Friend. I sympathise with these ideas generally. Is there any danger that a microchip inserted in a pet that has gone through all the registration procedures could be removed and inserted in another that has not?

Mr. Loughton: That is a pertinent question that I raised recently with the RSPCA. It is integral to the project that the microchip inserted in the dog matches the paperwork. There is a double check. If the microchip scan shows a poodle, but an Irish wolfhound has been presented, something is amiss. There are many inbuilt safety measures.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: What if it is another poodle?

Mr. Loughton: As the process involves blood testing, there is scope to take DNA samples. The RSPCA has considered all manner of solutions. Through the PetLog scheme, 355,000 dogs have been microchipped. If people are worried because all these hounds will have to be microchipped, let me say that many already have been. Regardless of the quarantine laws, I would like all dogs to be microchipped because that would bring about greater responsibility in the ownership of dogs. PetLog, a scheme run by the RSPCA and the Kennel Club, means that we have an increasingly sophisticated database for dogs. It gets 600 new applications every day.

We are out of step with our European partners. France has had a permanent compulsory identification system since the beginning of the year. In the Netherlands, all commercially traded dogs must be permanently identified, mostly with microchips. Germany has a compulsory dog identification scheme, as do Denmark, Belgium, Poland, Switzerland and many others. We are behind the times.

The system has applications elsewhere, especially with dog registration. The Kennedy report having conceded that the principle that dog registration is achievable and desirable, I urge the Minister to reconsider the possibility of a registration scheme for all dogs in Britain, regardless of whether they go on holidays across the channel. The problem is that more than 50 per cent. of our 6.9 million dogs stray each year. Traffic accidents, biting people, attacks on livestock and the time of police and council officers in seeking to reunite dogs with their owners cost more than £40 million. There are also the cases of cruelty to dogs. In 1997, the RSPCA brought 1,092 dog cruelty cases to court. Some 100,000 stray dogs have to be destroyed. It is a big problem. Microchipping those dogs would make the job of reuniting them with their owners much easier and would place the onus of responsibility on owners, so that, if they do not take care of their pets, dogs will be identified and the full force of law brought to bear.

I have some concerns about things that are not in the report and about some things that are, but should be modified. The major one is the three-year delay. It should be 18 months at the most. The delay can only encourage more smuggling in the short term. Some ports of entry are virtually already equipped to handle such a system. The simple technology that I have described is easy to provide. I cannot believe that it is beyond the wit of man to find 43 enforcement officers and train them in a simple procedure that is not much more complicated than that used by the average checkout assistant at Sainsbury or Tesco in running a bar code scanner across the microchip. If the procedure is beyond the wit of civil servants, will the Minister consider putting it out to tender for an agency or private contractor to set up the scheme more quickly, or could we use the expertise available in the Royal Army Veterinary Corps? I defer to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on that. There are many ways to speed things up.

My second concern is the countries covered. The World Health Organisation has categorised 46 countries as rabies free. Many are outside the European Union, have land borders and would be excluded, including Switzerland, which has a high standard of dog care and registration. North America, with the exception of Hawaii, is another area that frequently comes up, and it has some of the highest veterinary standards in the world. Of the dogs and cats brought into quarantine last year, slightly more than 26 per cent. came from north America, easily the second highest figure after the 38 per cent. from the EU.

Hon. Members will have had many e-mails from the persistent Mrs. Gloria Glammeyer from the United States. Her latest e-mail complained about "blatant discrimination against the United States . . . I thought that Britain and America shared a close camaraderie as sister countries."

Presumably, she has a dog that she particularly wants to bring to Britain, such is the ferocity of her e-mails, although I have never met her and she has no connection with my constituency so far as I know.

The third point, which was partially tackled by the Minister, is non-qualifying countries. We must ensure that a proper system is in place so that unscrupulous owners from a country such as South Africa do not bring their pets to a less rigorous EU country, reclassify them as EU dogs or cats and import them into the UK. A few years ago, a South African dog imported to Spain, which was claimed to be rabies free, sparked off a new spread of rabies. If we introduce all those measures and people flout the law and smuggle pets despite the ease of the system, the fines or terms of imprisonment should be increased. We must increase the penalties to act as a deterrent. There would be no excuse for people who still flouted the law.

The fourth consideration involves the administering of drugs for ticks and worms to animals within 24 hours of importation. That is a new idea. It is not currently required under the Balai arrangements governing the commercial trading of cats and dogs, and I believe that it should be detached from the quarantine issue. I think that it is a separate matter, and I hope that considerations in that area will not delay the speedy implementation of the changes.

The fifth issue involves the ferries. I hope that the Government will issue some guidance to ferry companies—particularly those operating ferries on longer crossings, which will need specific accommodation and exercise areas for pets in transit.

The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) referred to the legitimate case of kennel owners. I believe that they should receive some form of compensation, probably centred within the European Union. Some 46 per cent. of quarantined dogs and cats come from within the EU and, if the present proposals are agreed, kennel owners will lose virtually half of their business. If North America were also included in the new arrangements, only 29 per cent. of quarantine business would remain with the 80 or so kennels operating in this country. That must mean bankruptcy for the vast majority of them, particularly the smaller kennels.

This is an area where it is appropriate to use that horrible word "modernise". We need to modernise and update our quarantine system. It is self-defeating for our system to be so different from those operating in the rest of the world. We have the technology to operate the alternative system and we have the good will of pet owners in this country. We now need to move much more quickly. The report proposes not a relaxation of our vigilance against rabies but a more viable replacement programme. As such, I hope that the Government will use every endeavour to speed up the implementation of the Kennedy report and the vast majority of its recommendations.

6.51 pm

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): As is usual at this time in a debate, many of the points that I wished to make have been made already—particularly with regard to animal welfare, smuggling and guide dogs. As I listened to the speech by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton), I was forced to cross out large chunks of my speech because I agreed with him almost totally. I disagreed with him in one area, but I shall turn to that in a moment.

Five years ago, we would have had a totally different debate on this subject. Several of the comments made in this debate, particularly those by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), would have been more relevant at that time. Five years ago, I suspect that we would not have proceeded down the route that Kennedy has suggested. However, technology has changed all that.

I recently visited my mother-in-law in Sweden. As I knew that the United Kingdom quarantine system was under review, I asked the Swedes about their quarantine experience. Sweden shares land boundaries and we do not—except in the case of Northern Ireland, and the quarantine system in the Republic of Ireland is in line with our own—but I was interested to know how it had coped with the changes that had been introduced. Five or 10 years ago, there was a great debate in Sweden about whether the system should change. The almost universal view now is that the system is working well and that we should follow the Swedish example. I hope that the Minister will accept that the Swedish system works, and that he will proceed down the same route.

I agree with the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham on the question of which countries should be involved in the scheme. I am confused as to why the restriction on islands that are rabies free remains. I believe that the Minister should include in any list of countries to which the scheme applies a number of countries—not just in north America—that have been declared rabies free. It is also important that that list be reviewed regularly to include or exclude certain countries. As the figures cited earlier in the debate show, circumstances change—it is not so long since rabies was advancing through France towards the channel. We must build a regular review mechanism into the system so that countries that are rabies free may be added and those that have problems may be excluded.

I disagree with the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham about compensation for kennel owners. It is important that that issue should not delay the progression of the scheme. The kennel owners have a valid concern, up to a point: they will lose business and the Government must ensure that they have a viable future. However, kennel owners should not be allowed to hold the Government to ransom or to hold up the scheme by expressing fears that were valid five years ago but now no longer apply for reasons that were set out earlier in the debate.

According to the figures, more pets will travel under the new scheme. Therefore, more business may be generated for kennel owners. Like any business when circumstances change, the kennel owners should adapt to altered circumstances. It is right that the Government should help them, but I do not believe that progress should be halted because the kennel owners fear change.

The timing is also important. I welcome the earlier statements about pilot schemes, but I think that at least one scheme should include an airport. The Eurostar and our ports have been mentioned as likely settings for pilot schemes. However, as a child, I was shown around the quarantine kennels at Heathrow and I believe that animals arriving at airports could create a problem. If there are to be pilot schemes, I believe that an airport should be included so that we may head off all possible problems.

Many of my constituents have contacted me to say that they believe that three years is too long, and I echo the comments made earlier in the debate in that regard. It is important that we implement the scheme before the centenary of the introduction of the quarantine regime in 1901.

6.56 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I was brought up to treat dogs with respect and never to forget that, whether working dogs or perfumed poodles, they are animals, not children. I was brought up to respect the laws on rabies and to be very careful of dogs in less fortunate countries. I was brought up to accept all that without thinking. It was easy—because our family did not own a dog.

I did not like dogs. My ankles were nipped by pernicious pekinese and my neighbours had little dogs that yapped for hours and put me off. Glasses of gin and tonic—I do not like whisky and soda, or I would use that line—were sent flying by the tails of labradors and retrievers. I was indoctrinated, prejudiced and thoroughly anti-dog, and it was all very convenient. So what changed?

I begin by welcoming Professor Kennedy's advisory group's report and the Government's response to it. I welcome particularly the Opposition's response to the report because it makes it much easier for me to deliver this speech. I declare not so much an interest in the debate as a motive. I am now a reformed character. I am the proud owner of a springer spaniel called Tigger, whom I would like to take on holiday to France every year. Hundreds of my constituents would also like to take their dogs on holiday to France and elsewhere every year—after all, Salisbury is only an hour from the channel ports.

[Mr. Robert Key]

Furthermore, hundreds of service men and women in my constituency—who serve mostly in the Army—and their families are compulsorily posted to Germany and Cyprus. I am really standing here because about four years ago a young intelligence officer and his wife came to my surgery on a Friday evening to tell me about the rough time they were having. They had acquired a dog while posted to Germany. Shortly thereafter, they were posted back to the United Kingdom for what was supposed to be two years; in fact, it was only six months before they were posted back to Germany again. They could not afford the expense, but they were blowed if they were going to do without their dog.

Far more recently—only a few months ago—I went to Cyprus to visit the British forces and I met many people who had dog problems. It is ridiculous that a rabies-free island like Cyprus should not be excluded from the regulations, especially when the Royal Army Veterinary Corps is on hand at both ends to help and there are secure premises at each end. I urge Ministers to consider a trial involving our troops in Cyprus, because they provide a jolly good example of how things should be done. They care hugely about the issue and they have massive experience. They have an excellent and ingenious dog exchange scheme; dogs can stay in Cyprus and families can adopt a new dog when they are posted there, but there is nothing like being able to take one's own dog to a new posting.

Another motivation comes from a husband-and-wife team in my constituency who have sunk their savings into a well-equipped and well-staffed quarantine kennel. They would face extremely hard times if Government reforms were introduced without there being any financial recompense. The husband, Michael Wykeham, is chairman of the Quarantine Association and I am grateful to him, his wife and their staff for bringing me so carefully and convincingly up to speed on the issue.

I recall one of my visits to those excellent kennels. It was a kennel owner's nightmare: it was February, the temperature was below freezing, all the pipes and everything else were frozen and the local Member of Parliament had turned up to inspect. It could not have been more difficult for the kennel owner, but it was a happy, clean place and the level of care made a great impression on me. At this point, I should like to thank the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who met Michael Wykeham and myself to discuss the issues some time ago. He received us courteously and constructively.

There can be no doubt that rabies is a terrible disease, but science has moved on and the current regulations have been left behind. I do not suppose for a moment that those who strongly argue in favour of there being no change refuse to go on holiday to parts of the world where there might be a rabid animal in the street. Do they refuse to allow their children to go abroad? Do they visit only a handful of certified countries that are guaranteed to be free of rabies? I bet that they do not. The biggest risk that rabies will enter this country arises from the smuggling of pets.

I was a tad concerned by the RSPCA campaign about "relaxing the rules", because I do not see the changes as relaxing the rules; I see them as tightening the effectiveness of the system and reducing the risks of smuggling. Some years ago, when I started on this treadmill, it was hard to persuade the RSPCA of our case. My approach was to stay beside the RSPCA stand at the Conservative party conference and say in a loud voice to anyone who came near, "The RSPCA is promoting cruelty to animals, because they will not agree to change." I was eventually taken to one side, as one is, but that was the start. Now, the RSPCA is wholly on side for all the right reasons.

It was a little harder to persuade the vets, because vets are cautious people. When I first started campaigning on the issue and speaking in the House about it, I got into trouble with the local vets in Salisbury. However, even they have now come around to our point of view—albeit with entirely legitimate concerns.

It has been hard to persuade the public and it will continue to be so. After all, for the past 50 years the taxpayer has been funding extremely expensive and convincing advertising campaigns. I was entirely brainwashed by those wonderful campaigns, which cost a great deal of money out of MAFF's budget. We all have to think about how to re-educate the public.

I always thought it an anachronism that traded cats and dogs were excluded from the regulations. What is good enough for traded cats and dogs should be good enough for the rest of us. If we are talking about raising the standards up to those applying to traded cats and dogs, that appears to meet the case. In fact, I suspect that we shall go further.

What about the kennel owners? There are two issues involving kennel owners, not one. The first is cruelty and bad kennels. There is absolutely no excuse for that, and none of the respectable kennel owners in this country will put up for a second with neighbours who bring their trade into disrepute. Most kennel owners are good kennel owners; they would not be kennel owners if they did not care for animals. The second, separate issue is that of quarantine. It is a great pity to blur those two issues, and the only point in the past couple of years on which I have had any slight disagreement with the campaign has been with people who have muddled them.

At this point, I should like to pay tribute to the campaign of Passports for Pets, which I have supported for some years. I pay particular tribute to Mary Fretwell, who is the prime mover behind the campaign and an indefatigable worker. She knows all about how the regulations affect our professional representatives overseas in the diplomatic service.

I shall address briefly the question of recompense to kennel owners. I deliberately do not use the word "compensation", preferring to use the term "ex gratia payment". As the former Select Committee on Agriculture made clear, there should be some recompense. It seems to me that, the more the state interferes in the private affairs of its citizens and accelerates regulation of our lives, the more the state should accept responsibility if it effectively confiscates private assets that were bought at the request of the state, licensed by the state, regulated by the state and inspected by the state.

We have seen this sort of thing before. We saw it when bovine spongiform encephalopathy led to the entire head deboning industry being closed down overnight by fax. The premises were licensed and inspected by the state, but they received not a penny from the state. The same was true of the buildings and assets of gun makers and gun clubs, which subject has already been mentioned. That legislation marks the only occasion in my 15 years in the House on which I have voted against my own Government on a three-line Whip. Another case concerned the campaign, in which I was a prime mover, for an ex gratia payment settlement for haemophiliacs who had been infected with HIV through the national health service.

The conventional Whitehall arguments are pretty familiar: the Government have never compensated citizens for loss of trade resulting from Government policy. That is not an unreasonable proposition. If the Government introduce a new or increased tax, or impose a regulation for reasons of public health or public interest, I can understand that argument. The European convention on human rights states that the state should not deprive a person of his possessions

"except in the public interest".

In the case of changing quarantine regulations, it seems to me that it would not be the Government's intention to bankrupt kennel owners, but it would be a secondary consequence of a change in public policy. In those circumstances, the Government might say that they were not depriving private citizens of their possessions, but simply prohibiting their use, so the rules governing confiscation did not apply. However, those are weasel words and the Government should show some generosity of spirit. I hope that they will.

As to the three-year implementation period, I can say only that delay will encourage smuggling—it is as simple as that. There is a possibility that the system will be phased in. Earlier, I mentioned that Eurostar and some of the ferry services might be willing to help—indeed, being the first to be ready to transport pets might even introduce a new element of competition between those services. We shall see. In any case, the three-year implementation period is unrealistic.

I would also take issue with the suggestion that all animals should be treated no more than 24 hours before entering Britain with drugs to kill ticks and worms that might spread disease. It is not that I do not approve of preventing the spread of ticks, worms and disease, but that requirement appears to have been bolted on to the rabies debate. I am not quite sure where it comes from, but it seems likely to have originated from those who are determined that there should be no change—so we must try to demolish their arguments. That is a new idea; it should be considered on its merits and I agree that it is right for a different legislative framework. The 24-hour requirement for vaccination against ticks and worms is not enforced under the Balai arrangements for trading cats and dogs; nor is it enforced for horses entering and leaving the country.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman, who is making a good case, is underestimating the need to control ticks and parasites. A condition of Balai is that the animals never leave their place of origin, so they are already tightly controlled in relation to parasites.

Mr. Key: I recall the Balai regulations. I remain to be convinced that it is right to include such a measure in this system; it might slow down the operation and people might lose confidence in it. Pet owners are the first people to care for the health of their pets. It is the exception for pet owners not to recognise when their pets have an infestation or are thoroughly off colour because of worms. We must consider that measure afresh.

I welcome the proposals and I congratulate the Government and Opposition Front Benchers on their constructive stance. Four years ago, I did not think that it would be only four years before we had a proper debate on this matter; I thought it would be more like 10 years. We are making progress, but let us not wait another three years before something happens.

7.10 pm

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): The system is an idea whose time has come, as the debate has shown. As my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) said, the proposals would have been much more controversial five years ago and, if we were to wait another five years, they would seem antiquated. I warmly support the proposals. Rather than reiterate the many good points that have been made, I shall focus on a few aspects of the matter.

First, the areas covered by the system should relate not to political associations such as the European Union and the European Economic Area but to a geographical area. There are places within the EU and the EEA—principally Switzerland but also Andorra, San Marino and a few other mini-states—that are not covered by those political associations, not because they are great centres of rabies, which they are not, but because, for political reasons, they decided not to join. If we include Liechtenstein in the system but not Switzerland, enforcement will be almost impossible because the border between the two countries is completely porous. I therefore urge that the area covered should be western Europe—the EU, the EEA, Switzerland and other small states.

I concur with earlier speakers that there is a strong prima facie case that the proposals could include the United States. I suggest that, during the introductory period, the Minister might commit himself more closely to consider the US position, so that it might be possible to add the United States to the scheme in a few years.

On the introductory period, the full version of the report says that Kennedy rejected a phased period because he felt that there might be a legal problem. He envisaged a form of phasing that would allow all British citizens to use the system but make foreigners wait. He pointed out that, first, such a proposal would cover two thirds of the traffic and, secondly, it would be against European Union rules. That is correct and that version of phasing is a non-starter.

I suggest that we begin by including in the scheme what one might consider, in human terms, to be hardship cases, such as people who, for a good reason, usually related to work, are taken abroad for longer than a few weeks. I am referring not to holidaymakers but to Army personnel, business men and diplomats who are posted abroad or who are already abroad and perhaps reaching the end of their period of work.

We should have a pilot project that applies to people who are leaving the country, or who have already been out of the country for one month or longer. That could be introduced possibly even before we have sufficient legislation to justify charging on the basis that those people would have to come through one or two specified ports and airports. That would give us a chance to test out the system and train people. It would be difficult to train people on paper to operate such a system.

If we began with what I estimate to be a minority of the total numbers involved, that would help to smooth implementation of the scheme—we are aware that in Sweden there were teething problems—and deal with hardship cases. Much as I enjoyed the speech by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), he would accept that going on holiday is not as heart-wrenching as being posted abroad. Holidaymakers might reasonably agree to wait two or three years until the system had been tested and was working smoothly.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the complications in any attempt at a pilot scheme, however defined, would be the availability of approved laboratory and veterinarian facilities for certification? That will determine how the scheme operates, whether it is a pilot scheme or the final dispensation. Does the hon. Gentleman not view that as a problem?

Dr. Palmer: No, because, as the right hon. Gentleman is suggesting, the Kennedy report identifies the certification procedure and selection of the correct vaccine and laboratories as problems that must be solved, and a pilot scheme would reinforce our ability to solve them. To say that, on a certain date, 250,000 people will enter a system and all the laboratories will be set up and the arrangements will be working, is to ask a lot of our powers of organisation. If we begin with a few tens of thousands of people, we have the chance to try out the scheme on a more manageable basis and ensure that the conditions mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman are fulfilled and that implementation is foolproof.

My remaining points reinforce those of earlier speakers. The significance of the 24-hour period in tick vaccination is not clear. If it is deemed essential to introduce that vaccination at the same time as the scheme, there may be physical problems in ensuring that a vet is available on the day that the person is travelling, so perhaps that period could be extended.

I have campaigned on kennel compensation for many years, partly because I have lived abroad and felt the consequences of the present system. Those of us who will benefit from the proposals should accept that there will be a huge reduction in costs for us. I would not begrudge it if, for a transitional period of two or three years, there was an additional charge of £10 or £20 on the fee for the microchip to raise money for a decommissioning fund for affected kennels. I am sure that most people would agree, given the enormous savings that they would make.

My conclusion is the same as that of all the other speakers, with one exception. The scheme is overdue and I praise the Government for taking it up and hope that we can press forward with it as soon as possible.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I am delighted that we have had the opportunity to discuss quarantine measures, although I am not especially delighted to speak after my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) because he has ruined my speech. Nevertheless, as I have sat in the Chamber since the start of the debate, I feel that I must make one or two points.

The idea that the nation is gripped by the subject of subsidiarity would be bizarre, but the nation is very interested in quarantine. If hon. Members think that it is not, I suspect that they are out of touch, because this is a nation of animal lovers. My goodness, we had the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South—

Ms Jenny Jones: Wolverhampton, South-West.

Mr. Amess: Thank you. We had the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South–West (Ms Jones) telling us that for her printed election address she was photographed with her cat, not her family. I also was happy to be photographed with my dog, but that is where the hon. Lady and I part company; I included my family in the photograph, because they thought that they were at least as good-looking as the dog.

On a serious note, animals are many people's life. Many people genuinely prefer animals to human beings. Some of us can understand why they feel like that. When I go home, my family is not always thrilled to see me, but my dog is. Frankly, that is because it knows that, when I come in, it will be taken for a walk.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said that he had a springer spaniel. The latter is 10 years old, so the Minister of Agriculture and the Parliamentary Secretary should note that he, for one, cannot wait three years until the measure becomes law. I have a black labrador which was bought for one of my children by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe). It certainly reflects her formidable personality, and it seems to dominate our house.

Animals are terribly important to many people. In November 1997, I introduced a ten-minute Bill, the Reform of Quarantine Regulations Bill; I take the credit for thereby inspiring the Government to come up with this proposal, and inspiring Professor Kennedy. I introduced the Bill because, having read the speeches of Lord Waddington and Chris Patten, I had been moved by their circumstances. Some might churlishly inquire, "One had been Home Secretary and the other was Secretary of State for the Environment, so why did they do nothing about it at the time?" I shall be kind and say that I suspect that not all members of the Government agreed with the moves that they wanted to make.

I am sure that, when the Minister introduced the debate, he did not wish to imply that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, when in government, were not seriously considering introducing a similar measure; if that was the implication, I believe that it was wrong.

When I introduced the Reform of Quarantine Regulations Bill, I spent a great deal of time talking to the representatives of all manner of organisations. Like all other hon. Members, I have praised Passports for Pets, the RSPCA, the Kennel club and the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons. I spent much time with all those organisations, learning at first hand about our quarantine laws.

I heard the Minister say that he could not possibly take risks with the nation's health. There can be no suggestion of such risks being taken; we are at one with him on that.

The existing measures have worked successfully for a long time. However, after reflecting on the law, we have come to realise that there should be some moderation. Presumably, if one wanted to prevent all road accidents, one would ban cars and coaches. To prevent alcoholism, one would stop everyone drinking. Some measures have achieved their ends, but I doubt that the quarantine laws are among them.

When I was shown around a large quarantine centre I was struck by the fact that, in each compound, owners were kissing and cuddling their animals. It occurred to me that—never mind rabies—if the animals had an infection, the owners would catch the disease and pass it on to people outside. I saw at first hand how ridiculous the arrangements are. Moreover, in one compound there was a dog aged about 16. It was very grey and it did not have any of its required tablets and medicines with it, so it would not last much longer. I believe, therefore, that the existing measures are cruel.

I am greatly encouraged by the debate—especially because I now know that, if I am lucky enough to be drawn in the ballot for a private Member's Bill and seek to re-introduce my 1997 Bill, the Government will support me. Under no circumstances can we afford to wait three years. I do not accept that it will take that long to draft and pass sensible regulations to enable us to treat our animals humanely. I very much look forward to the Government's support if I am successful in next month's ballot.

7.26 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): We have had an excellent debate—which is probably not surprising, given the House's ability to discuss issues in real depth when we debate them on the Adjournment. The debate has been useful, and we should all be grateful to the Government for arranging it, although I think that some of us understand the difficulties that the Government are having in filling time while their legislation is in another place.

Mr. Nick Brown: I could fill it on my own.

Mr. Paice: The Minister says that he could fill it on his own. Perhaps he would start with a statement about agriculture. [Laughter.] Promises!

I thank the Minister for the way in which he introduced the debate, and express my pleasure at seeing him in the Chamber. I was not expecting him to be present because I thought that he would be at the place where I was supposed to be tonight, but I am pleased to see him. I also record my thanks and appreciation for the fact that the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) gave me his apologies for not being able to be present for the winding-up speeches.

As my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) said, in principle, we support change, but some aspects of the proposals, make us profoundly uneasy—especially their bureaucracy and complexity and, as a consequence, their ability to ensure at least as high a level of protection against rabies as at present.

I do not mean it as a criticism, but this afternoon we have seen how easy it is to get carried away with emotion and to ignore the fundamental factor—the protection of human health and of our animals and wildlife. I realise that, in theory—and as is shown by the New Zealand assessment and the experience in Sweden—the proposed method may be even more effective than quarantine, but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said, it also matters that the system is possible to implement. Quarantine is very simple, however rough and ready—and perhaps inhumane—it may sometimes seem. My right hon. Friend quoted Mr. Ted Chandler, a vet, who expressed similar views.

I consulted my noble friend and constituent, Lord Soulsby of Swaffham Prior, former President of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons and the first vet to become President of the Royal Society of Medicine. He has spoken on this subject in the other place many times. He has endorsed my view that change is necessary, and he believes that the proposals of the Kennedy committee represent the way to go, although he has one or two queries, some of which I intend to convey to the House.

The proposed criteria specifically refer to the animal being resident in the EU or the European Economic Area for six months. The Minister dealt with that in so far as a UK citizen takes his animal abroad. However, the matter is slightly less clear with regard to an animal owned by somebody from France, Germany or wherever. How are we to know whether, during that six months, that animal has been to some other country where rabies exists? I hope that the Minister will be able to address that.

The Minister touched on recommendation No.34 and the possible import of exotic diseases. The committee said that it was beyond its resources to examine the issue properly. I hope that the Minister will state categorically that such a study will be carried out before the proposals are introduced; otherwise, we might find a better way of preventing rabies only to let in some other obnoxious disease.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) referred to commercial transactions. I share his view that the present position is inconsistent. I was a parliamentary private secretary in the Ministry of Agriculture when the Balai agreement was drawn up for commercial transactions. I felt then that the pass had effectively been sold and that we would have to move forward on similar grounds for dogs and cats.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk referred to concerns about the efficiency of the system and the availability and universality of the technology involved. Professor Kennedy recommends a central data base, although he says that it is not essential. Surely that is an essential tool, with terminals at every port. How else can fraud be prevented? We cannot be certain that the controls will not be evaded. It may be almost impossible to transfer a chip from one animal to another, but it is not impossible to alter documentation. We must ensure that every eventuality is covered. However much we might like to think otherwise, someone will always want to evade the controls. Like my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) and many others, I have seen the PetLog system and that seems to be a good example of what could be provided.

I come now to the systems that other countries will be required to use for their nationals entering Britain. Who will issue the health certificates in other countries? How can we ensure that that will be done with the professionalism and rigour that we would expect from our own vets? That brings us to the issue of what veterinary qualifications we recognise in some of the countries whose citizens may be coming here with a dog, hoping that they have the necessary certification.

The Minister said that, if someone comes in with inadequate documentation, the animal will have to go into quarantine, at least until the matter is sorted out. However, there is a difference between inadequate documentation because a form has not been filled in properly or is incomplete, and what appears to be a perfectly valid set of documents, but which have been produced and signed by somebody who is not displaying the rigour necessary if the system is to work.

There is an International Standard Organisation standard for implants which, presumably, would be used by the Government, but, as has been said, other systems are in use throughout Europe. I hope that the Minister will tell the House how interchangeable that technology is and how transferable any information from it would be between other countries if we wish to move in that direction. I understand that there is no standard serological test and no designated laboratory in Europe to do it. The Government must move quickly to set the right standards for those tests and to bring uniformity to the arrangements.

The Minister properly referred to the issue of costs, and he answered one or two interventions, for which we are grateful. I hope that he or the Parliamentary Secretary will confirm that dog owners who do not seek to take their dog abroad will not face any costs as a result of the proposal.

Mr. Nick Brown indicated assent.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the Minister for his confirmation that the cost will fall on those dog and cat owners who take their animals abroad. I assume that that means that the annual costs of running the system will be put into some sort of charge. Will he elaborate on the initial cost of up to £4.4 million according to the report? Will that be annualised into the charge or funded in some other way? Several hon. Members have said that it would be wrong for the taxpayer to be involved and the Chancellor clearly agrees.

I think that all hon. Members who have spoken have referred to the three-year timetable. That has clearly surprised many of the representatives of outside organisations that are involved in the issue, many of whom will be reading the debate. I hope that the Minister will confirm that the matter will be looked at again. That would be welcome. It does seem a long time, but the matter must be got right. At the end of the day, we must ensure that, because that is the most important thing.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said that he is always concerned about consensus because if anything is a matter of consensus, it must be wrong. He knows, because we have talked about it many times, that I have a lot of sympathy with that view. The real problem is that such consensus often results in a hurried piece of legislation. That is one reason why I am usually so cynical.

Mr. Morley: That is not this case.

Mr. Paice: Yes, that is why I am prepared to disregard my concern about consensus. This matter is clearly receiving a lot of time and deliberation. We must not rush its introduction, but we must not delay it more than is essential.

I intended to propose a pilot scheme, but the Minister pre-empted me and I am delighted that he did. Nearly every hon. Member has supported the idea of such a scheme. There have been many suggestions and a number of bids from constituencies to have such a pilot—surprise, surprise. I hope that the Minister will now give serious consideration to that prospect.

I come now to the legality of the proposals vis-a-vis Europe. The Minister said that he had been in close contact with the Commission, and we appreciate that. It is what we would expect of him. However, the Minister and his predecessor said, and continue to say, that, with regard to food safety, they are allowed not to check every consignment of food from Europe that comes into this country, but only to make random checks. If so, and that is the line that has been followed for the past 18 months, I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm that he will be able to carry out checks on every cat and dog coming into Britain, and that he will not be prevented from doing so by the same legislation that prevents him from inspecting every food consignment.

The Minister nods, and I hope that I can take that as confirmation.

Recommendation No. 27 says that the new system would be transitional while a Europe-wide scheme was developed. I share the views of many hon. Members who believe that the British people will accept the proposed new system, if we can persuade them that it will offer better protection than the present system. However, they will not accept any dilution of that scheme for the sake of European harmonisation, so I hope the Minister can assure us that he will not agree to any modification of our new scheme with the objective of attaining a Europe-wide scheme that is less effective.

Another issue, which was raised by my noble Friend Lord Soulsby of Swaffham Prior, relates to the veterinary certificates that are currently required to take a dog abroad from this country, in many cases at a cost of £50. We have not been told whether that system is to be maintained or abandoned. Concern is expressed in recommendation No. 26 that, even under the present system, no effort is made to trace the considerable number of import licences that are issued but not used. That requires investigation.

A further question, which may raise one or two eyebrows, concerns animals that fail the test for entry into Britain. The Minister said that such animals would have to go into quarantine while the matter was sorted out, or be re-exported. Some people may not be able to afford the costs involved. I hope that the destruction of those animals will be an option if that is what the owners want. That may not seem a satisfactory solution to many people, and I hope that the option would be exercised only rarely, but we have not heard whether it would be available.

Several hon. Members spoke about the issue of north America, including my hon. Friends the Members for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) and for Salisbury. It is unclear whether the definition of north America includes Mexico. The report states that very few animals enter from north America. The assumption is that, if quarantine were ended, the number would remain low.

As a Member of Parliament with a high number of United States service men living in my constituency, I am not sure that that would be the case. If it were easy for service men to bring their animals in, the numbers would rise considerably. Representations have been made to me along those lines.

I hope that the Government will undertake, as they have been urged by several hon. Members, to carry out an assessment of the situation concerning north America, particularly as the New Zealand assessment for the United States gave a lower level of probability of failure to control rabies through a vaccination programme than through six months quarantine. That was reinforced by the Kennedy report, which states that, if animals from any country are satisfactorily identified, vaccinated and blood tested, the risk is reduced, compared to quarantine. We envisage allowing animals from the EU and EEA to come into the country. Neither of those areas is rabies free, so the position with regard to north America is anomalous.

We have had an excellent debate and, as has been observed, a consensus seems to be developing. In this case, that is highly desirable and the Opposition are willing to participate. As we all know, however, there is a huge difference between theory and practice. The proposed system is far more complicated than the present one. There are many questions to be answered before we can give it our whole-hearted support. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary will respond to the many concerns that I and others have expressed. If he cannot, I hope that the Government will find the answers and ensure that the problems are resolved before the scheme is introduced. As long as that scheme is effective, the sooner it comes on stream, the better.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): We have had a constructive debate on the report. I add my congratulations to Professor Kennedy and his team for the thorough way in which they have undertaken their task, following the brief that they were given by the former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham).

I shall try to deal with various points that were raised by the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) in his opening speech for the Opposition and by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) in his closing speech. With regard to enlargement of the European Union, the issue of new member states would have to be addressed by the European Commission, which has its own procedures for controlling rabies. I assume that that would include eradication programmes, which have been extremely successful in northern Europe.

The microchip that is proposed by Professor Kennedy should conform to ISO standard 11784. Much work has been done on microchip technology. One hears stories about microchips moving around animals' bodies. That is somewhat exaggerated—it sounds as though the microchip goes round the bloodstream. There was some migration of the early microchips, but that has been rectified by microchip design, particularly of the surface of the microchip. Even in the case of the early microchips, any movement was within a fairly limited area where the microchip had been inserted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) gave a considered response to the Kennedy report. Representing a major point of entry and having quarantine kennels in his area, he has a substantial interest in the matter. If the Dover harbour board builds new facilities for the animals that will come in, it can recover the costs through harbour charges, as it does at present for any new facility that it provides—for example, for roll on/roll off or passenger ferries.

My hon. Friend, and other hon. Members, asked about the prospect of compensation for quarantine kennel owners. People who run quarantine kennels fear that, if the proposed changes are introduced, they will be severely disadvantaged. I understand that. There are about 80 quarantine premises in Great Britain. Quarantine will, however, survive in some form, even under the recommendations of the Kennedy report. Quarantine kennel owners will not have their land or buildings confiscated. They will still be able to use their facilities. Providing quarantine boarding will still be an option, as will other commercial activities such as normal boarding facilities, which are increasingly being used.

The Kennedy report found that the risk of allowing animals into Britain from some countries without quarantine is simply too great at present. In countries such as India, street rabies is endemic. The advisory group made it clear that animals must go into quarantine if the proper paper work is not available or if there is genuine doubt about compliance with the rules. That was emphasised by my right hon. Friend the Minister. It is also likely that such animals will have to be quarantined for a period.

Dr. Palmer: I seek clarification. I presume that, as now, it will be possible to take the animal away and apply at a later date, and that it would not be a tightening of the present regulations.

Mr. Morley: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend means take the animal out of the country.

Dr. Palmer indicated assent.

Mr. Morley: That might be an option, because that option exists now in the case of people who bring animals into the country, unaware that they should go into quarantine. Those animals have to be removed from the country. I suspect that the same regulations would apply in those cases. There may be the option of keeping the animals in the country but putting them into quarantine. I think that people would have that choice in those circumstances.

Quarantine kennel owners have asked for compensation if the rules are changed. That request was supported by the Agriculture Select Committee in 1994. However, as some hon. Members have acknowledged, it is a long-established principle that Governments do not compensate commercial operators for loss of business when health controls are introduced or removed. It would be wrong to offer any prospect of departing from that principle. Furthermore, if new legislation impacts on a business, automatic right to compensation does not necessarily follow. For example, the head deboning industry closed down overnight as a result of BSE regulations, and gun shops were affected by the firearms legislation. There are many other such examples.

[Mr. Morley]

I acknowledge that quarantine might command wider support if people thought that their pets were as well looked after on quarantine premises as they would be at home. Concerns have been expressed about some quarantine kennels and, although it would be wrong to generalise, there have been many reports of poor treatment. The lack of statutory welfare standards for quarantine premises has been a gaping hole in our controls, but thanks to the excellent work of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), who introduced a ten-minute Bill, we now have on the statute book the power to introduce such standards. We intend to make full use of that power and will hold a full public consultation in due course.

The hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) has been consistent in his campaign for change. He is right to say that the quarantine issue is not necessarily one of cost, but the fact that people do not want to be separated from their pets. I understand that. He is also right to say that proper safeguards need to be implemented and that, even once the changes have been introduced, quarantine will continue and welfare standards must still be properly applied.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned time scale. That was echoed by several other hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall). We agree that the recommended three years is a long time. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, there is a lot of work to do before the changes can be implemented, including introducing primary legislation, which is a delay in itself.

Mr. Key: There has always been a dispute about whether primary legislation is needed. I have been advised that we could simply amend the regulations. I understand that, politically, it might be better to opt for primary legislation but, technically, the changes could be made by amending secondary legislation, so let us not rule that out.

Mr. Morley: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall look at the matter closely because it is always easier and better to introduce changes through secondary rather than primary legislation. We can thus avoid the problem of time slots. However, we are advised that, as charges are involved, and because of the element of compulsion in those charges, primary legislation would be required.

Dr. Palmer: Several hon. Members have mentioned the possibility of a pilot scheme. Would it not be sensible to have no charges under the pilot scheme to allow for the fact that procedures would move more slowly and people would have to put up with various difficulties?

Mr. Morley: I shall come to the idea of pilot schemes in a moment. The problem of introducing pilot schemes without charges is that it is always more difficult to introduce charges later.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire has a long involvement in this issue. He was a member of the Select Committee on Agriculture that made the case for change in the quarantine laws in 1994. Although, at that time, many people were not persuaded by the case for change, the detail that the Select Committee went into changed many people's minds. It certainly influenced me. Although I had always thought that there was a case for change, the Select Committee's detailed arguments made it clear that it was time to look at the matter properly, as Professor Kennedy has, and to assess all the risks. As my hon. Friend said, people must be reassured. I join him in congratulating groups like the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and Passports for Pets, which have taken a constructive approach to the issue and made sensible and detailed arguments.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), who apologised for being unable to be here for the winding-up speeches, made a balanced and constructive speech. He raised the famous case of Whisky and Soda. Although prominent and famous people who have raised the issue in the press have helped to advance the debate, it would be wrong to assume that the proposed changes have been driven by people who happen to be wealthy and powerful. People have been arguing for change for many years. The proposed changes are not a response to those who are fortunate enough to be able to articulate their inconvenience at being unable to bring their dogs back from Hong Kong. The issue is about the concerns of service families, diplomats and people who work and live abroad—those who simply do not want to be parted from their pets.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West and my hon. Friends the Members for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) and for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) spoke of guide dogs. Professor Kennedy considered that matter, but did not make guide dogs a special exception because they are as vulnerable to rabies as any other dog. However, we have discussed pilot schemes and ways to implement the change. We are in a consultation period, so we can consider all the issues carefully. There is certainly an argument for considering guide dogs in any pilot scheme, so long as they comply with the recommendations put forward by Professor Kennedy.

I was interested in the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West about the impact of separating people from their animals. Studies show that separation can be detrimental to both animal and owner. I understand how important the issue is to my hon. Friend, given that she was photographed with her cat for her election address. I know of a prospective parliamentary candidate who was photographed with a donkey for his election address. He was not successful in his campaign, so those matters must be considered carefully. I have two cats, one of which was rescued. One is called Boris—I shall not say why he was named after Boris Yeltsin, but he is fairly laid back. The only stress that he would suffer from separation would be separation from his lunch.

Just as we were having a constructive, consensual discussion, along came the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) who put a spanner in the works. I hope that his mother-in-law will not have to look for a new excuse for not visiting him if the quarantine laws are changed, given some of his attitudes. It appears that the Euro-sceptic poison in the Tory party bloodstream runs very deep. The proposal for quarantine reform is not some kind of Euro-federalist plot. It is a little bit more constructive than that.

I emphasise to the hon. Gentleman the serious point that he made: we are not prepared to take risks with this country's rabies-free status. We are all agreed on that, one of the important points which Professor Kennedy had to consider. As a number of hon. Members said, public confidence must be maintained when any change to the law is made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough was absolutely right about cost. I make it clear that the cost of changes will be based on full cost recovery for those who use the service, which is only right and proper, and there would be a considerable saving on the current cost of quarantine. He also mentioned north America where, as Professor Kennedy recognised, rabies is endemic. I should make it clear that we do not include Mexico in north America in geographical terms.

Mr. Paice: Someone did.

Mr. Morley: I do not know who, but that person is not from the Labour party. We understand geography quite well enough not to include Mexico in north America. We recognise, as did Professor Kennedy, that standards of veterinary and animal care in north America are high, so there is a case to consider. Again, that can be done as part of the consultation.

Mr. Reed: This is a second bite of the cherry, but I reiterate that, because of the system in the United States, the particular guide dog is already chipped, has a health certificate and would meet the requirements in the Kennedy report. Does the Minister agree, therefore, that north America, and those states that are already covered, have a strong case for being in the first wave?

Mr. Morley: There is a case, and Professor Kennedy acknowledged that in his report. Further consideration will be given to that as part of the process.

Mr. Paice: The Labour party may know that Mexico is not part of north America, but the Americans clearly do not, given that the North American Free Trade Agreement includes Mexico.

The Minister has answered questions about running costs, but I mentioned set-up costs, which will be £4.4 million. Can he shed any light on where the funding will come from?

Mr. Morley: That is one of the issues that we shall have to consider as part of the response to Professor Kennedy. It is possible, for example, that the set-up costs could be recovered over time, as part of the overall charging regime. We can consider that issue, and I do not think that it is a particular problem.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) put forward a good argument about the advantages of the changes. It is worth emphasising that the regulations will not be weakened; in many ways, they, and the measures that protect our country from rabies, could be strengthened. I also accept his arguments on the progress that has been made on eradicating fox rabies. A scheme in northern Europe, involving dropping bait from helicopters, has been successful and should be extended to eastern Europe, where fox rabies is concentrated at present.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham mentioned dog registration, which is a matter for the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, not the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, to consider. He made a persuasive case for dog registration, and those arguments will be considered in due course.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) was right to refer to the atmosphere of the debate, because we would not have had such a calm and rational discussion about changing the quarantine regulations a few years ago. There have been changes in technology and, as he mentioned, we have the experience of Sweden, which has changed its quarantine control regulations.

The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) made a good case, and I understand his desire to take Tigger on holiday in its advancing years. I should point out to him, however, that there will be a charge for taking animals on holiday, and people will have to weigh that up. This is not simply a matter of taking the dog across the channel for the day on a shopping trip; there will be a charge, and strict regulations to ensure that our rabies-free status is not undermined.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Salisbury about a trial in Cyprus. In 1994, when I spoke from the Opposition Benches, I suggested to the then Government that a trial in Cyprus would not be a bad idea because, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, it is rabies free and there would be minimal risk. We have the Kennedy recommendations, and we could perhaps consider the option of a pilot scheme on an even larger scale. We must consider the issues, and some interesting ideas have been put forward.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) made some interesting and thoughtful suggestions on trial areas, based on the amount of time that people stay out of the country. We want to consult widely on the Kennedy report, and those issues can be considered and evaluated so that we can decide what is the best way to implement the recommendations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe also mentioned Switzerland and mini-states. Switzerland is not a member of the European Union or of the European Economic Area, but, nevertheless, its role can be considered within the evaluation. Some of the mini-states that he mentioned are part of the EEA, along with countries such as Norway and Iceland. They would be embraced within the Kennedy recommendations.

I remember the ten-minute Bill of the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), although it would need a fair bit of redrafting in response to the Kennedy report. Introducing that measure was a useful contribution to the debate, although I do not want to underestimate the great deal of work and preparation that has to be done, even in respect of dealing with the report's recommendations. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture has made it clear that we are sympathetic to the recommendations, and we shall approach them in that light.

The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire expressed concern about regulation, which I understand. Regulation can be a problem and can be bureaucratic, but he would agree that, because the measures represent a major change, especially in this country's psyche on rabies and rabies control, they must be effective and rational. They must also be as easy to understand as possible, and we must explain them to educate the public about what the changes will mean and what pet owners will have to do to comply. The measures have to be in place to protect the interests of this country.

Mr. Paice: I was expressing doubt, not about the regulations, but about being able to manage and enforce them properly. At least we have a simple system at present; the proposals are far more complex, and getting it right will be that much more difficult, which is the point that the Minister has made.

Mr. Morley: There is no disagreement between us on that point. These are complicated matters, but we must not compromise our rabies-free status. We have to address the issue of delivering the changes as coherently as possible.

I can confirm to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire that the cost of any changes in quarantine regulations will fall only on those who take animals out of, or bring them into, the country, not on pet owners who do not want to be involved in the scheme. He also mentioned the EU, with which we have to work closely because of single market regulations and the Balai directive, which is already in place.

We shall consult closely with the European Union. I emphasise that our top priority is to ensure our rabies-free status. The measures that we put in place must be tailored for our country and our circumstances. We understand that, and we think that that issue has been addressed by the Kennedy report.

Other issues have been raised, and questions have been asked about the details of how this process will work. They will be addressed during this consultation period and when the Government give their formal response to the Kennedy report. People will make representations and give their views on how it will work in practice.

As there is wide consensus in the country, we are now able to reform our quarantine laws without undermining the original intention of protecting our rabies-free status. We can protect people's health and welfare through regulations that will allow freedom of movement for animals.

That is a challenge, but Professor Kennedy has provided a framework. With good will and a rational approach by the various interest groups—welfare groups, veterinary organisations and the public—the time is right to think about a change. I believe that this change will be for the better and not for the worse, and will enhance quarantine control and protect against associated health risks.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Power Lines (Electromagnetic Fields)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

8.11 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this debate. I am sure that the House will join me in congratulating the Minister for Public Health, who has today been appointed a Privy Councillor.

I shall explore the dangers to health caused by exposure to electromagnetic fields near power lines. In preparing for the debate, I was immensely grateful to be able to consult the work of Professor Denis Henshaw at the university of Bristol, which is entitled "Mechanisms of increased exposure to environmental pollutant aerosols near high voltage powerlines"; the work of Professor Mike O'Carroll, emeritus professor at the university of Sunderland and chairman of Rural England Versus Overhead Line Transmission, otherwise known as REVOLT; and the report of the working group of the United States National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences entitled "Assessment of Health Effects from Exposure to Power-Line Frequency Electric and Magnetic Fields".

All that work proves that there is a strong possibility that electromagnetic fields contribute to cancer in those living near overhead power lines. In those circumstances, I am calling on the Minister to comment conclusively on the health aspects. If I were her, I would not want on my conscience any negative effects of a newly proposed giant, high-voltage power line between Lackenby and Shipton via Picton through the Vale of York. I hope that an element of doubt will be raised this evening sufficient to delay the construction of that line until the health aspects have been fully explored.

House of Commons research paper 94/119 of 24 November 1994, entitled "Overhead Power Lines and Health", takes up the suggestion that exposure to electromagnetic fields near overhead power lines may increase the risk of contracting cancer. It examines scientific evidence for such a link. It summarises the relevant exposure restrictions recommended by the National Radiological Protection Board, based on established health effects arising from exposure to electromagnetic fields and radiation.

Electricity and magnetism are different aspects of the same physical phenomenon. They are natural processes that are seen in thunderstorms. The earth has a steady, static electric field arising from electrically charged atoms and molecules in the atmosphere. The strength of this electrical field near the ground is about 120 volts per metre. That is a measure of the force that would be exerted on an electrically charged particle placed in the region of space permeated by the field. Electrical currents below the earth's crust give rise to a magnetic field. The direction of that field is determined by the force that it exerts on a compass needle.

Teslas give magnetic flux density—the common measure of strength of magnetic fields. The House of Commons research paper gives the power frequency magnetic flux densities at various distances from various household appliances. At 3 cm from a hair dryer, the magnetic flux density in microteslas falls within the range of six to 2,000 microteslas. At 30 cm from a hair dryer, it falls between 0.01 or less and 7 microteslas. At 3 cm from a gentleman's electric shaver, it falls between 15 and 15,000 microteslas. At 1 cm from an electric overblanket, it falls between 2 and 3 microteslas.

On 10 June 1997, the Minister replied to a written question on potential health risks posed by mobile phone usage and the use of electric blankets. She said:

"The Department obtains advice from the National Radiological Protection Board . . . on the risks to health of exposure to electromagnetic fields.

The NRPB's advice is based on . . . scientific studies . . . carried out by the World Health Organisation, by the NRPB Advisory Group" and others. She said that NRPB's advice is that "there is no convincing scientific evidence that exposure to microwave radiation associated with mobile phone and electric blanket usage is harmful to . . . health."—[Official Report, 10 June 1997; Vol. 295, c. 422.]

I ask the House to contrast that decision on so-called inconclusive scientific evidence with the decision taken by the same Government—albeit a different Department, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—to ban the sale of beef on the bone. Why and how did the same Government jump to ban beef on the bone with much less available evidence than we have of the dangers from electromagnetic fields? The Government are quick to act at one level and ban beef on the bone on the basis of inconclusive scientific evidence, whereas they are reluctant to act on the threat to health, particularly children's health, from exposure to electromagnetic fields near overhead power transmission lines.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing this important Adjournment debate. I also congratulate the Minister on her appointment.

Is the hon. Lady aware that there is a cluster of families in my constituency whose children have had childhood leukaemia, two of whom tragically died? Is she also aware that Professor Henshaw is coming this weekend to look at the impact of power cables that are above the ground and close to the railway lines behind their homes, and to consider the possible role that electromagnetic fields from those power cables may have played in causing the children's illness?

Miss McIntosh: I am indeed. I am grateful to the hon. Lady for raising that issue. The House and the Minister will have cause to be grateful to Professor Henshaw for his studies. I hope that some good news follows from his visit to the hon. Lady's constituency.

The Government and the National Grid will argue that the proposed line through the Vale of York and elsewhere in North Yorkshire does not pass through centres of population. That is not strictly correct. Certain stages near the start of the line go through residential centres. Even in the Vale of York, the lines pass within a mile of a village or the outskirts of a town.

I believe that the Government need to develop a systematic approach to hazards whose effects are not precisely known and will become clear only over time. Although the scientific evidence may not be conclusive, it is sufficient to raise questions and concern and, in my view, to justify a delay in the construction of any further power lines until the full effects are known. The term "prudent avoidance" is often used by the United States Government in relation to possible health hazards. Although the Government will not legislate, they will advise people to avoid the dangers.

Two possible links with cancer arise from such hazards: energy effects—electromagnetic, for instance—and information effects, interfering with the body's chemical and hormonal systems. In June 1998, the United States published a report produced by the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, which I have with me this evening. It is important, in that it reinforces the view that power lines are a possible cause of cancer. If the Minister reads no other part of the report, I strongly urge her to read page 396, and, in particular, the conclusion that carcinogens may be caused in humans by power lines. The report states:

"electric and magnetic fields such as from powerlines are a possible human carcinogen".

That statement is accompanied by a 500-page report, which is widely available on the internet. Distinguished scientists from Sweden, France and Italy participated.

The report raises the question of planning in relation to houses near power lines, and it is bound to have an impact internationally. Notably, and regrettably, no United Kingdom expert participated in the study that produced it. Is the Minister aware of that study, and of its wide health implications?

Research based at the university of Bristol under Denis Henshaw, professor of physics at the university, is concentrating on trying to find a causal mechanism to explain the acknowledged increase in the incidence of leukaemia under high-voltage power lines. Professor Henshaw is now aware of five separate mechanisms through which the electric field from power lines interacts with airborne pollutants in a way that leads to increased exposure near power lines. Childhood leukaemia is known to be associated with airborne traffic pollution, and the Bristol university hypothesis is based on increased exposure, under power lines, to an agent that is already firmly linked to childhood leukaemia.

The research has progressed as far as demonstrating increased exposure to an agent—traffic pollution—that is known to be linked to childhood leukaemia; but the general concern at Bristol university about the health effects of living under power lines goes well beyond the childhood leukaemia risk. I wonder whether the Minister is aware of the work conducted by Professor Henshaw and his team.

Another question is how far housing developments should be from a 400,000-volt power line. Given the existence of continuous and increasing exposure to environmental pollutants, 20 m is far too close. Epidemiology demonstrates that the preferred distance is 100 m. However, an unpublished report by the United States National Council on Radiological Protection in 1990 made a recommendation stating that being 150 m from overhead power lines was potentially dangerous. Does the Minister agree with that analysis?

Although the power lines that are to be built through the Vale of York from Lackenby to Shipton via Picton will not go through a large centre of population, they will nevertheless pass by such centres, and over many hamlets and large farm dwellings. Does the Minister, as a Public Health Minister, really want on her conscience the remotest possibility of the formation of clusters of cancer, such as leukaemia, which could be related to the new giant transmission line that the Government have allowed?

I invite the Minister to consider the weight of the evidence, to operate the policy of "prudent avoidance" that exists in Sweden and part of the United States, and to delay the construction of any further power lines until more is known about their health effects and potential risks. Finally, may I ask whether she will agree to a moratorium on the building of any more power lines at this time?

8.25 pm

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) in congratulating the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on securing a debate on an issue that is extremely important to her constituents, and in regard to public health more generally.

Let me give some of the background. The decision to grant consent for the building of the North Yorkshire lines was made in March this year, following public inquiries in 1992 and 1995. The then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concluded:

"in the absence of any material change in the evidence of any harmful effect from electric and magnetic fields emitted by power supply equipment, possible health effects provide insufficient grounds to refuse consent to the development."

The issue applies not only to the Vale of York, but to any part of the country where people are concerned about power lines.

We are exposed to electromagnetic fields every day in many different ways, at home and at work. Kitchen appliances, computer screens in offices, security systems in shops and airports and the networks of power transmission lines and radio and television stations all emit those fields. Industry, transport and defence networks, and hospitals depend on electrical equipment emitting EMF in one form or another. It must be recognised that EMF can never be completely avoided. Electromagnetic fields also occur naturally. The earth produces natural fields: magnetic fields at the earth's surface are produced by electric currents flowing deep within the earth's core. Electric and magnetic fields are also produced in the atmosphere. The strength of those fields changes with weather conditions; that excludes the massive effects of lightning strikes. Electrostatic fields are not uncommon, and can be encountered from charged objects in the home and at work.

During the 20th century, environmental exposure to man-made EMF has increased steadily owing to the demand for the provision and consumption of electricity, advances in technology and changes in social behaviour. In the 1960s and 1970s, the main concerns involving power lines were to do with their aesthetic impact, their interference with radio or television reception and problems with noise and perception.

In 1979, concern about the alleged link between cancer and public exposure to magnetic fields arose because of an American study of the incidence of childhood cancer in Denver. That study, and the public and media interest that it created, stimulated much of the scientific research that followed. The hon. Lady has outlined the range of conclusions that that research has produced.

Since then, many human health studies have been published around the world. Some of them have found an increased incidence of illness in people living close to power lines, but other studies have not. However, it should be noted that the risk, where it has been quantified, is usually small.

A great deal of attention, usually by the media, may be given to a study that suggests a health risk, despite the large number of other studies that do not suggest such a risk. In considering important public health issues, it is important that the balance of risk is made clear.

Currents produced in the body from electromagnetic fields near power lines are weaker than natural currents in the body, such as those produced by the brain and heart, so some scientists argue that it is impossible for EMF to have any important effects. Other scientists argue that, just as a trained ear can pick up a familiar voice or cry in a crowd, so a cell in one's body may respond to induced current as a signal that is lower in intensity yet detectable even through the background noise of the body's natural currents.

Laboratory studies, often using high-intensity electromagnetic fields—higher than those to which we are normally exposed—have shown that some biological effects can be caused by exposure to EMF. However, biological effects do not necessarily translate into health effects—an important distinction. In most cases, it is not clear how EMF produces those demonstrated biological effects; in particular, no mechanism has been established for possible carcinogenic effects.

Some biological effects are well known. Strong electric fields, such as those beneath large transmission lines, can cause hair on the exposed head or arms to vibrate slightly. That is felt by some people as a tingling sensation. EMF from transmission lines can also, in some circumstances, cause nuisance shocks from voltages created by EMF on objects or metal structures, such as fences.

Miss McIntosh: I have some difficulties with the Minister's arguments, for reasons that I hope that she will understand. I believe that any death caused by living too close to a power line carrying high-voltage electricity is one death too many. Does her Department have a formula, such as the one used by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to establish how many deaths there have to be before a roundabout is built? Why is it more acceptable for a pylon to pass within 20 m or 100 m of a dwelling that houses 10 people than for a pylon to pass close to a housing development?

Ms Jowell: Risk assessment is an extremely important way in which to make judgments about difficult and contentious public health issues. It is also an important and vivid way in which to convey information about risk to the public. However, it is a developing science and, although we can use calculated risk assessment to demonstrate the harm that some actions may cause, we cannot yet use it with scientific certainty as the sole guide in making decisions that may also, for example, involve planning considerations.

Last year, the hon. Lady took part in a debate about the siting of electric pylons in her constituency; the issues that she raised were primarily environmental rather than health related. Of course, our overriding concern is to protect the public's health and to prevent death, but the means of conveying risk levels is difficult. I do not believe that the methodology is sufficiently developed to be used as the sole basis for making such decisions, which is why we rely so heavily on the expert advice of scientists who are qualified in this field.

Before I set out some of the more detailed scientific background that informs Government policy, I shall say something about the guidelines on exposure restriction. At relatively high EMF intensities, there are short-term immediate health effects—including subtle effects on the nervous system—against which people need to be protected. For some types of EMF, such as microwaves, the main effect is the heating up of tissues in the body.

Those well-established effects have been thoroughly studied and documented for many years, and guidelines have been published on the exposure limits that may prevent such effects. Although the restrictions need to be considered only in industrial premises using high-intensity EMF, it is also important that people are given proper guidance about protection in their homes.

In the United Kingdom, guidance on the levels of exposure restriction is obtained from the National Radiological Protection Board, an independent body that was set up under statute to provide radiological advice. Industry and planners currently follow those guidelines to protect workers and members of the public. Discussions are under way to harmonise guidelines throughout Europe based on the recommendations of the International Commission on Non-Ionizing Radiation Protection, an organisation comprising individuals from many countries with expertise in the effects of EMF.

Both those bodies, along with the World Health Organisation, have looked long and hard into the scientific data on which they will base their guidelines. All have agreed that the available data on potential long-term effects, such as cancer, are insufficient to provide a basis for setting exposure conditions.

In 1992, the overall position was summed up in a review of the published literature by the NRPB's advisory group on non-ionising radiation. The advisory group concluded that there was no firm evidence of a carcinogenic hazard from exposure that could be associated with residence near major sources of electricity supply, the use of electrical appliances or work in the electrical, electronic or telecommunications industries. The independent advisory Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment endorsed the advisory group's report.

The advisory group's position was mirrored in the US by the National Academy of Sciences, which undertook a similar review in 1997. A more recent epidemiological study of childhood cancer by the US National Cancer Institute produced results that, using the authors' own words, can be summarised as "reassuring rather than alarming".

Very recently, the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences working group voted, by majority, that EMF should be treated as a "possible human carcinogen", a definition that appears to be based on a recognised category laid down by the International Agency for Research on Cancer. The proposal is at public consultation stage, and a final report is due to go to Congress before the end of 1998.

Despite the reassurances of some of the reviews and statements, there clearly remains widespread concern. Moreover, the positive association from a few studies suggests that there is good reason to continue to investigate the issue both experimentally and epidemiologically. Indeed, all the bodies—and we ourselves—agree that more work needs to be done to shed light on the issue and create the greater basis of certainty that we all want.

Miss McIntosh: There was inconclusive evidence for the ban on beef on the bone, and many would say that the weight of evidence was in favour of continuing to sell it. I do not see the logic of banning beef on the bone, but allowing what is clearly a health risk to continue. There could well be evidence of that risk in the Minister's constituency.

Ms Jowell: That is an important point. Risk assessment—knowing what the odds are—takes us part of the way, but does not provide us with the definitive basis for action. Beef on the bone was banned because of the judgment that there could be a risk of a further opportunity for BSE, in the form of new variant CJD, to be transmitted into the human food chain, not only through eating beef, but through eating stocks, broths, soups and other preparations made from bones that might have been contaminated.

We considered carefully the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee's advice on that and on other aspects of BSE, and our efforts to understand more about new variant CJD—a devastating disease about which we know so little—and, from a public health point of view, we considered it essential to close every possible window of opportunity for further contamination or further infection of humans with the properties that translate into new variant CJD.

I reiterate the clear view that there is a need for further research to allay public concern. The positive association from a few studies suggests the need for further investigation. A number of human health studies have been carried out, especially in Europe and North America, and more are under way. Most of the emphasis has been on cancer. A few of the studies suggest that exposure to low levels of EMF may cause some effect, but those findings have tended to be weak and inconsistent, and other studies suggest no increased risk of the disease. Until now, most scientists and clinicians have agreed that the health effects of low-level EMF are likely to be very small, if they exist at all.

Experiments with healthy volunteers clearly show that short-term exposure at the levels experienced in the environment or in the home do not cause any clinical or pathological effects. Some studies report effects, but they tend to be inconsistent between studies. Many animal and cellular studies have failed to show any significant effects of exposure. Reported effects tend to be small and experiments must be performed with great care for any effect to be detected.

A great deal of effort is being directed towards investigating the effects of magnetic fields on cancer. It seems that magnetic fields alone cannot cause cancer, although some laboratory studies suggest that they speed up the development of existing cancers.

In 1996, the international EMF project was initiated by the World Health Organisation. The project will assess health and environmental effects of exposure to time-varying electromagnetic fields. The project is being carried out in collaboration with national and international agencies, organisations and research institutions. The Department of Health is contributing to the funding of this large undertaking, as is the Health and Safety Executive.

The NRPB, which is highly regarded throughout the world for its expertise in the field, is an official collaborating institution with the WHO EMF project. Many international organisations are involved and a series of international seminars is being held where leading scientists present status reports on dosimetry, in vitro, in vivo and human studies. The project will publish environmental health criteria monographs of the scientific literature towards the end of the five-year programme.

The Department of Health also supports the United Kingdom childhood cancer study, a key study due to report next year. The study was set up in 1992 and is the largest of its type. It is investigating cases of childhood cancer for which the causes are still unknown. EMF is one of a number of possible causes included in the study. The Department also supports another type of epidemiological study of childhood cancer and some biological laboratory work. Results will be published in the scientific press when the studies are complete.

Researchers at Oxford university have been investigating the effects of EMF on free radicals in the body. Others, such as Professor Henshaw at Bristol university, have proposed the idea that electric fields attract very small particles such as bacteria, thereby increasing the likelihood of disease in their vicinity.

I hope that that makes it clear that we are faced with scientific data that produce a range of conclusions. The way in which we act on those conclusions is to subject the analysis to scrutiny by the experts on the NRPB. The hon. Lady raised several important points about the continuing uncertainty. The development of risk assessment, the application of best available evidence and the continuing search for greater certainty will guide what we do. We will ensure that the conclusions are published and that the process by which our decisions are reached is transparent. Ultimately, our overriding concern will be the protection of public health and safety.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Redundant Land

1. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): If he will make a statement on the disposal of redundant MOD land (a) generally and (b) with specific regard to HMS Osprey on Portland. [55877]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): My Department keeps the size of the defence estate under continual review. Any property that is declared surplus to operational requirements is sold, as soon as possible, on the open market, with the benefit of planning permission.

My Department is considering alternative uses to which the HMS Osprey site may be put. Our title to part of the land at HMS Osprey allows prescriptive rights of purchase to the Crown Estate, to which it originally belonged. A disposal strategy for those parts of the site that are not subject to these prescriptive rights is in progress. No final decisions have yet been taken.

Mr. Bruce: I thank the Minister for his visit to Portland and his attention to the problem. As he knows, I wrote to him as soon as he took office to ask whether it was necessary to close the air station and whether the site could be put to an alternative use. I was told that there was no alternative use. At least three companies are willing to buy the site and create jobs, but they have been told that they cannot even talk about making a bid until March next year. I would be happy if the Minister came forward with an alternative MOD use, but it is not good enough that, at this late stage, the Ministry is halting all its negotiations with the Crown Estate, among others.

Mr. Spellar: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that he has raised the issue with me, as has the local council. I thank him for his kind comments on my visit to Weymouth and Portland, where I had an excellent meeting with the local council, chaired by Councillor Kay Wilcox. I fully understand the concerns that have been expressed, but the hon. Gentleman must understand that we have to explore every other possible defence use for the site. Given the concern expressed by the community, which has rendered enormous service to the Ministry of Defence and the armed forces for many years—indeed, centuries—I have asked the Department to try to speed up the process to ensure that the site is returned to productive use, in one way or another, as soon as possible.

Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): May I refer the Minister to the site of Trecwn in my constituency, which was declared redundant by the previous Government, and sold earlier this year? Have any discussions taken place between the Ministry of Defence and any company or individual about the possible storage of nuclear waste, including decommissioned nuclear submarines, at the site?

Mr. Spellar: We are aware that the company that bought the site has submitted to the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology some proposals for the management of radioactive waste. However, the Committee is not due to report for 12 months, when we will publish a White Paper proposing a national strategy. After that, local council planning permission would have to be obtained. My hon. Friend will know that Pembrokeshire county council has revealed that it is implacably opposed to any proposals to store nuclear waste of any type at Trecwn. The matter is no longer in our hands, as the previous owner, but is in the hands of the various radiological regulation agencies and the local council. Both the local council and the local Member of Parliament have made their views clear.

Eurofighter

2. Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): What is the estimated interval between the entry into operational squadron service with the Royal Air Force of the Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft and its equipping with beyond visual range air-to-air missiles. [55878]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): Eurofighter will enter service armed with the advanced medium-range air-to-air missile—AMRAAM—AIM-120B as its beyond visual range air-to-air missile. A competition is being run for the development and production of a next-generation beyond visual range air-to-air missile, but that will not enter service until a few years after Eurofighter.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will the Secretary of State ensure that there is no hiatus between the entry into service of Eurofighter and its equipping with a genuine beyond visual range air-to-air missile, such as that provided by Raytheon, the American competitor, or by Meteor, the European solution? If an interval is caused by Treasury parsimony or a German defence review, can it be filled by an extended range version of AMRAAM, so that the Royal Air Force squadrons do not suffer a lack of capability?

Mr. Robertson: Obviously, we would not want any gap in capability, but it has long been recognised that there will be a gap between the first delivery of Eurofighter in 2002 and the BVRAAM currently being examined. The hon. Gentleman mentioned one bid, but there are two, and each is being assessed in the normal way. The implications of using one system rather than the other will be examined carefully. We intend to maximise the value of Eurofighter when it comes into service, and its weaponry is therefore of acute importance.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Is the Secretary of State aware that there is some sense of a stitch-up over BVRAAM, and that it is suggested that political expediency, rather than strategic merit, is governing his Department's thinking? Will he assure competing bidders that their competing merits will be the sole criterion in determining the BVRAAM programme?

Mr. Robertson: Yes, I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. There is no question of a stitch-up. Two bids have been made, and they will be assessed in the normal way. The only criterion that matters is the equipping of the Eurofighter with the best possible weaponry.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): Notwithstanding the Secretary of State's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), he will acknowledge that the final bids are between a British BVRAAM and an American BVRAAM. Does the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, if the Ministry of Defence decided in favour of the American product, it would be possible for the United States of America to block the sale of the Eurofighter—the Typhoon—to third countries under certain circumstances, and that that would be damaging to British industrial and security interests?

Mr. Robertson: I wish to make it clear that one bid is European, from Matra BAe, and the other is American. We are assessing both bids using the usual criteria. We hope to announce the outcome of the competition in 1999. All the factors mentioned by the hon. Gentleman and the previous questioners will be taken into account.

British Beef

4. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): If he will make a statement on his Department's policy in respect of the supply of British beef for the United Kingdom's armed forces. [55880]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): I am pleased to advise the House that our food supply contractor, Booker Foodservice, is buying from British sources 100 per cent. of beef for consumption by our forces based in the United Kingdom. That follows agreement by the European Commission to proposals from me and my colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to allow access to intervention stocks of high-quality British beef at competitive prices. We are unable to use British beef for our forces overseas at the moment because of the continuing ban on the export of British beef.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my right hon. Friend for that news, which was even better than I had expected. It will be welcomed by all farmers, especially those in the two branches of the National Farmers Union in my constituency. On their behalf, and in view of my right hon. Friend's emphasis on the quality of British products, may I push the boat out by asking whether he can achieve the same for British lamb for the British armed forces?

Mr. Robertson: I wish that we could do so. British lamb is the best in the world. I used to help to rear it, and I want British troops to eat it. I hope that the industry will compete to get it on troop canteen plates. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary of State for Defence, who has spent a lot of time and energy on this matter. An attempt was made to procure a substantial forward buy of British lamb, but that was not successful as the industry was not capable of coming forward with it. Urgent discussions continue with the farming industry and the Meat and Livestock Commission. We shall ensure that we use every effort to put the maximum amount of British lamb on British forces' plates.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Of course that is good news and we welcome it, but why has it taken so long? It was first negotiated with the commission back in February and an agreement was announced in the House in June. Six months on, fresh beef is still not to be used; the meat is out of the intervention stocks. What about getting on with British lamb? The Meat and Livestock Commission, the National Farmers Union and the contractor are willing to vary contracts and do their best with lamb. What is holding up the sale of British lamb, because at present none is used by British forces?

Mr. Robertson: I know that the public get a bit tired of being reminded that a Conservative Government were in power 18 months ago, but that Government put in place the procedures that we are having to use. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has used his energy and ingenuity to make substantial strides, despite the straitjacket that he inherited. At the start of October, the intervention stocks were released and now 100 per cent. of British troops are being supplied with British beef.

The discussions on British lamb continue, but we are up against the fact that the bulk of British lamb in this country is provided fresh or chilled while the Ministry's requirement is for frozen lamb. We are discussing with the contractor and the industry the best way to get the maximum amount of British lamb on to British forces' plates.

My hon. Friend's efforts in other areas have been particularly successful: 100 per cent. of the pork and 50 per cent. of the bacon used by British forces is British. We are trying to ensure that, within the constraints of value for money for the British taxpayer, we do the best for British farming we can.

Cadet Units

5. Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): What proposals he has to encourage cadet units. [55881]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): The Government recognise the value of cadet forces to both civilian and military communities. As a further demonstration of our commitment to encouraging cadet units, we intend to make a modest increase in their funding.

Mr. Waterson: Does the Minister share my pride that, this Sunday, many of the Remembrance Sunday services that I and hon. Members will attend will have present not only regular and Territorial Army units but local cadet units? Has he estimated the cost of providing alternative accommodation for cadet units that use TA centres that are to be closed?

Mr. Henderson: I very much share the hon. Gentleman's pride in the way in which our cadet forces attend our various commemoration services, including the commemoration of Armistice day this Sunday. I took great pleasure in attending the Trafalgar day celebrations a couple of weeks ago with them. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will announce, a statement will be made to the House on the Territorial Army. It will include mention of the provision made for cadets. The costings on that are not yet finalised, but we gave a commitment in the debate on the strategic defence review that any cadet unit that was displaced would be reallocated to a location at least as good as the one that it left.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Although I welcome the increase in resources for the cadets, may I raise the case of the redundant minesweepers Kellington, Pagham and Iveston, the last of which is in my constituency in Tilbury dock, and is looked after by the training ship Boxer? I understand that the Ministry of Defence wishes not to renew the leases on the vessels to the cadets but to sell them to the cadets. I urge my hon. Friend to use his good offices to ensure that any sale price is a token one, bearing in mind the invaluable benefit that countless youngsters have received from the opportunity of spending time on the vessels, which would otherwise have to be towed away because they are totally redundant. They are looked after proudly by the naval cadets. I hope that my hon. Friend will use his good offices to ensure that they remain in the stewardship of the cadets.

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. I assure him that the Government greatly value the contribution of those vessels in encouraging cadet units around the country, including his constituency. I am reviewing whether it is possible to continue the existing arrangements or whether we should try to sell them to the cadet forces. I am taking into account all factors, including health and safety, and practicability.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): Will the Minister look at links with the Territorial Army in areas where the TA unit is the only Army presence in a county, as in the case of the Somerset and Cornwall Light Infantry? Will he also look at the increasingly irrelevant and outdated distinction between local cadet forces and the independent schools' combined cadet forces? Do we want such a distinction in the present day armed forces?

Mr. Henderson: I assure the hon. Gentleman that any relocation that takes place because of changes announced in the Territorial Army review will be on the basis that existing cadet units will be placed in accommodation that is at least as good as their present accommodation. That is just as true in the hon. Gentleman's constituency as it is throughout the country.

I want to encourage all cadet units in the three services to maximise their input and to seek to recruit as many young people as they can. That will benefit not only the communities where those young people live but our recruiting plans for the three armed services.

Territorial Army

7. Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): What plans he has for the Territorial Army in the Aldershot constituency. [55884]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): A statement on the future of the Territorial Army will be made once Ministers have had a chance to consider the matters that have already been discussed by officials, including those matters that concern the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Mr. Howarth: We have been assured for the past two weeks that the Government will make a statement. This is a matter of great concern not only in my constituency but throughout the country. Is the Minister aware that his lack of decision making on this matter is deeply unsettling to Territorial Army units? I hope that the Minister can give me an answer before I go on an exercise with the 10th (Volunteer) Battalion the Parachute Regiment in two weeks' time.

Mr. Henderson: The hon. Gentleman might like the Government to rush into a decision, but territorials throughout the country, especially in his constituency, would not want us to do so. Extensive consultations have taken place with units throughout the country, including in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The general guidelines, which were well debated in the House two weeks ago during the strategic defence review debate, were made clear to TA units and other interested parties locally, and the prime motives of the review were emphasised. How the objectives will be implemented locally has been the subject of consultation, and we shall make a statement to the House once the matter has been assessed.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): Although I accept the Government's good faith, does the Minister not realise that uncertainty over the proposals is damaging to morale and that some units are experiencing a haemorrhage of both officers and men? Why do the Government not open the books, publish the detailed proposals, declare a six-month moratorium and allow us to have a properly informed debate about the future of the TA?

Mr. Henderson: I know that the hon. and learned Gentleman raises that question with the best of motives, but the consultation process has been widely received throughout the country and suggestions have been made on how the changes can be implemented. That is the proper way to proceed. A statement will be made once we have assessed what the consultation has thrown up.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon): The Minister complacently accuses us of trying to rush him into a decision. No decision can have hung around for longer than this one. He seems to be totally unaware of the delay's dreadful effects on motivation in the Territorial Army. Communities are desperately worried about the closure of TA halls. Moreover, the secrecy with which everything is being done has made matters much worse. Will he ensure that definitive announcements are made as soon as possible and that we do not have to wait until a convenient moment when they can be buried in the Government's news management agenda?

Mr. Henderson: Of course the announcements will be made as soon as possible, but, unlike the previous Government, we believe in consulting people about our proposals before making a decision that we announce to the House.

Asbestos (Compensation)

8. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): If he will make a statement on compensation arrangements for service personnel and former service personnel who suffer from asbestos–related conditions contracted before the amendment of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947. [55885]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): Compensation arrangements for service personnel and former service personnel who suffer illness as a consequence of exposure to asbestos are the same as for those killed, those injured or those who develop a disease from any other cause related to their service. The non-retrospective repeal of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, on 15 May 1987, by the Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 gave service personnel the right to claim common law compensation from the Ministry of Defence. Compensation arrangements for former service personnel for illness caused before the repeal of the 1947 Act is paid in the form of a war pension and other allowances by the War Pensions Agency of the Department of Social Security. The Government's arrangements for compensating former service personnel are broadly comparable with those for former civilian MOD employees.

Mr. Dismore: Is my hon. Friend aware of the sense of injustice felt by many who are now being diagnosed as suffering from asbestos-related conditions such as mesothelioma, which is invariably fatal and invariably painful, and results in the rapid onset of symptoms leading to death? Does my hon. Friend agree that that sense of injustice is highlighted by the 1987 Act? People who were exposed to asbestos before 1987, but are experiencing symptoms now, may feel somewhat hard done by in comparison with people who have suffered other injuries since 1987.

As my hon. Friend knows, I have campaigned on this issue for some time, along with my hon. Friends the Members for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) and for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Rapson). Will my hon. Friend try to devise a method of compensating, in particular, those who are suffering from the most disabling asbestos-related conditions?

Mr. Spellar: I recognise the difficulties and distress suffered by those who have contracted this awful disease, but my hon. Friend must accept that there are complicated interlocking relationships between the war pension, the war widow's pension and compensation arrangements—and, indeed, between asbestos-related and other diseases. The Ministry of Defence is considering those matters, but there are no easy answers.

I understand that my hon. Friend discussed the issue with the last Minister for the Armed Forces, and that my hon. Friend the current Minister will meet him soon to try to unravel some of the problems.

Recruitment (Ethnic Minorities)

10. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): What are the latest figures for recruitment to the armed forces from Britain's ethnic minorities. [55887]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): Between 1 April 1998 and 31 August 1998, the latest date for which figures are available, 147 armed forces recruits came from the ethnic minorities, representing 1.7 per cent. of the total intake. The latest figures for MOD civilians show that, between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998, 117 recruits identified themselves as being of ethnic minority background, representing 1.4 per cent. of the total intake.

Dr. Iddon: My constituency has an unemployment rate of 7.5 per cent., higher than the Bolton, the north-west or the national average. We also have a large Asian community, but I have yet to meet a member of that community who has joined the armed forces. Has my hon. Friend conducted any detailed and serious research to find out why members of the Asian community are not joining the armed forces? Is the reason cultural, a fear of discrimination, or what?

Mr. Henderson: My hon. Friend is right to raise the importance of armed forces recruitment in areas where there is high unemployment among black and Asian people. Both black and Asian people have the opportunity of a first-choice career in the armed forces. A number of studies have been carried out to establish why both black and Asian people are reluctant to join the forces, and those studies are continuing. We have tried to make changes where possible, and to convey to members of the black and Asian communities that they can have a good career and a good education. We have also given them a guarantee that all possible action will be taken to outlaw discrimination and racism.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Is the Minister aware that the only substantial adult organisation that attracts a large number of people from ethnic minorities into uniform is the Territorial Army? In many territorial units, recruitment from ethnic minorities amounts to 15 or 20 per cent. Indeed, there is an officer from an ethnic minority in the 5th Battalion of my local regiment, the Princess of Wales Royal Regiment. May I suggest to the Minister that, if he wishes the Army as a whole to be closer to the community, hitting its part-time community element in the way that the Government plan will ruin his best intentions?

Mr. Henderson: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The Territorial Army makes a valuable contribution in attracting both black and Asian people into the armed forces at all ranks. It is a factor that I have taken into account in the review and an important factor in the footprint. I think that, when the decision is announced to the House in due course, the hon. Gentleman will find that it has been a main determining factor.

Demining

11. Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): What steps his Department is taking to encourage humanitarian demining. [55888]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): Following my announcement a year ago, good progress has been made in increasing the assistance that the Ministry of Defence provides to humanitarian demining, notably through the establishment of a mine information and training centre at Minley and through the gifting of surplus military equipment to the Halo trust. To maintain the momentum, my Department recently organised a seminar to consider what more the armed forces might contribute.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. What help is he giving to support United Nations initiatives in this sector? Does he think that there is any scope for developing new demining technologies through the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the UN's role in demining. Demining those parts of the world that have become contaminated by these weapons is a serious issue, into which the UN is putting all its efforts. To help it, a senior officer has been loaned by the MOD to the UN to provide specialist demining expertise to its humanitarian mine action programmes. We hope that that will have a major effect on what the UN can do.

My hon. Friend is also right to point to the way in which technology might be able to deal with some of the problems. DERA has already produced an effective and cheap system to destroy mines without having to use high explosives. The device is called FireAnt and it is hoped to produce it commercially in the near future. I believe that that will make a serious contribution to alleviating one of the most serious legacies of wars.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the unarmed military observers in Kosovo oversee humanitarian demining operations? If so, are contingency plans in place for their withdrawal in the event of attack? Will the implementation of such plans require a resolution of the UN?

Mr. Robertson: The verification mission that will go to Kosovo will have no role whatever in supervising or getting involved in humanitarian demining. It will, of course, face a hazard that was put in place by the Belgrade authorities in certain locations in Kosovo: they have put mines there. The verification mission will obviously take judicious care.

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): Does the Secretary of State agree that the time has come when the ingenuity that has gone into making land mines can apply to their demining? Does he envisage a further special role for the expertise of the Royal Engineers?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman of course has substantial military experience, which brings authority to his remarks on these matters. I have taken the strong view that military expertise in this sector is unequalled and that, if it can be shared in the humanitarian sector, it will do a lot of good in dealing with a problem that mankind increasingly faces. The Royal Engineers have expertise in this sector, which we have already used, but I am ensuring through the mine information and training centre at Minley that we bring together all the components in the British Army to ensure that they contribute. I have found no greater enthusiasm than among the military for dealing with this, the legacy of wars.

Territorial Army

12. Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire): If the final reduced Territorial Army establishment will include civilian support staff and non–regular permanent staff. [55889]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): Following the current restructuring exercise, the Territorial Army establishment will be reduced to approximately 40,000. Civilian support staff and non-regular permanent staff will not be included in that figure and their establishments will be considered separately.

Mr. Page: I thank the Minister for that answer. It is, of course, very sad that the TA is to suffer such a savage attack. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer is back in the borrowing business and as it seems apparent that, if rumours are to be believed, TA units covering the 7th (Volunteer) Battalion the Royal Anglian Regiment in Hertfordshire—at Hertford, Dunstable and Hemel Hempstead—are to be closed, affecting civilian staff as well, will the Minister approach the Chancellor and ask for a little of that borrowing to maintain a TA presence of some sort in Hertfordshire? A county of that size should have a TA presence.

Mr. Henderson: As I have already said to hon. Members today, we shall be looking at the footprint of the Territorial Army throughout the country, and will consider the hon. Gentleman's points in relation to his area. I cannot say any more than that; he will have to wait until the statement is made. However, I assure him that consideration will be given to the question of civilians and non-regular permanent staff, as I acknowledge that they do important subsidiary and support jobs for the Territorial Army.

Millennium Compliance

14. Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): If he will make a statement on the progress on the millennium readiness of computer systems relating to the defence and security of the United Kingdom and its allies. [55891]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): The Ministry of Defence has a comprehensive programme for addressing the impact on defence capability posed by the potential failure of computer systems over the millennium period and beyond. That includes both rectifying MOD systems and developing contingency plans where necessary.

Substantial progress has been made on fixing MOD systems. About 35 per cent. of those systems that require rectification have already been corrected and we expect 80 per cent. to be fixed by autumn 1999. In addition, we are working closely with our allies to raise international awareness of the issue.

Mr. Atkinson: In the light of that comprehensive reply, will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that Britain and its NATO and Western European Union allies will not be rendered defenceless by the millennium bug, as was originally feared a couple of years ago? Can he guarantee that the millennium bug will cause no problems for defence-related information technologies? If he cannot give that guarantee, will he ensure that contingency plans are put into place, and that they are thoroughly tested in time for the millennium?

Mr. Robertson: Few Departments are more aware than the MOD of the dangers and problems that might arise with the millennium. Indeed, few countries in Europe have, so far, done as much as Britain to deal with the problems. My Department is spending £200 million addressing the problems for technology that could arise over the year 2000.

I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurances for which he asked, as we are taking the matter extremely seriously. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement has a specific and long-running interest in the issue and I have made sure that the problem of the year 2000 is on the agenda for every Defence Council meeting.

Gulf War Syndrome

15. Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): What assessment he has made of recent evidence relating to Gulf war syndrome. [55892]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): We continue to keep new information about Gulf veterans' illnesses under review. It is encouraging that recently published scientific research is making progress on this subject and I look forward to seeing the first results from the epidemiological studies of UK Gulf veterans at around the turn of the year.

Dr. Gibson: Is not the evidence a long time coming? We have been raising the issue in the House for more than a year. Does not the evidence point towards one common biochemical activation of molecules, which is induced by different chemicals either singly or together? Might that not have different clinical outcomes in individuals? Has not the time come to pay up and to prevent other people from being subjected to those dangerous chemicals?

Mr. Henderson: I thank my hon. Friend for that question, which deals with an important issue. We owe a heavy debt to those who served in the Gulf on our behalf. There are a number of interesting developments in research and I anticipate that three pieces of British research will be published in the coming months. There are also interesting pieces of research in the United States, in particular from the Centre for Disease Control and Prevention, in Atlanta, which continues to cover new ground. It believes that it is close to defining what sort of illnesses are being suffered by those who served in the Gulf. I look forward to being able to assess the various pieces of research when they are available to me, around the turn of the year. It is essential that, where there is illness, we try to identify the causes and how to remove them, as well as dealing with other important questions.

Defence Establishments (Shoeburyness)

16. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): If he will make a statement on the future of the defence establishments at Shoeburyness. [55893]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): The Horseshoe barracks, old ranges and Gunners park at Shoeburyness have been declared surplus to Ministry of Defence requirements and are being prepared for disposal. A draft planning brief has been agreed with the borough council and has been issued for public consultation. The MOD still has a requirement for the new ranges at Shoeburyness, and the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency is seeking to enter into partnership with industry to operate those facilities. It is hoped that such a partnership will create new employment opportunities at Shoeburyness through increased exploitation of the site for non-defence purposes.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As DERA's rather surprising decision—supported by the Government—to change its policy on the new ranges will lead to an unemployment increase in an area that already has a high unemployment rate, will the Minister assure the House that the Department will work closely with Southend borough council to ensure that the land that becomes available will be used for attracting useful job opportunities to the area?

Mr. Spellar: I can certainly give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. The borough council is keen to obtain local views on the matter and will review the draft planning brief in the light of any comments received. We are working in co-operation with the council, and will be working closely with it precisely because we want the site to be returned to useful economic use and to offer employment possibilities.

Royal Hospital, Haslar

18. Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): If he will make a statement on the future of the Royal hospital, Haslar. [55895]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Doug Henderson): The future of the Royal hospital, Haslar is still under review. We shall make an announcement when final decisions have been made.

Mr. Viggers: Is the Minister aware that it is not only my constituents who are aghast at the threat hanging over Haslar? Many hon. Members from both sides of the House, members and former members of the Defence Committee and service personnel are horrified that the Government cannot confirm that Haslar's role will be continued. Does he realise that we must have a centre of excellence in the defence medical services, and that even Government publications have said that uncertainty would be the worst of all options? Will he confirm Haslar's role soon?

Mr. Henderson: I hope to be able to confirm Haslar's role soon. However, as the hon. Gentleman is aware from our previous correspondence, a major gap in medical provision in the armed forces was identified during the previous Government's period in office. We have been trying to put that gap right, so that we can guarantee that we have the back-up support necessary when our forces go into battle. We have to have the right number of consultants, nurses and ancillary staff based in centres of excellence—to which staff are attracted, and at which they receive the right training and provide essential services. I have an implementation team examining the matter, on which I hope to be able to make an announcement soon.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley): Is it not important that we get the issue absolutely right? The defence medical services suffered an enormous blow under the previous Government. Although there are great difficulties at Haslar, and there will be much discomfort until the issue is settled, is it not crucial that, this time, we get it right?

Mr. Henderson: I agree with my hon. Friend, who clearly makes her point that the problem has existed for a long time. I am not saying that the previous Government did not attempt to address the issue. However, they were unsuccessful in making long-lasting proposals to meet the well-identified shortcomings. It is crucial that, this time, we get it right, which is why I have asked an implementation team to examine the options.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): As other hon. Members have said, the problem with the Royal hospital, Haslar exemplifies the difficulties generally with the defence medical services, and specifically with Territorial and reserve medical forces. What will the Government do about preserving the strength of the Territorial defence medical services?

Mr. Henderson: Again, the hon. and learned Gentleman raises an important issue. Shortcomings in our medical provision were identified under the previous Government, one of the main areas being the Territorial Army. By any estimate, the TA is thousands short in the necessary provision. One of the central features and guiding principles of our review of the TA is that we should try to put that right. The hon. and learned Gentleman makes a key point, and he will find that, when a statement is made to the House, it will have been well taken into account in our proposals.

United Nations (Peace Support Operations)

19. Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): What steps the Government are taking to improve the United Kingdom's ability to contribute to the United Nations peace support operations in the future. [55897]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): I announced, as part of the strategic defence review, our intention to sign an agreement with the UN that will boost our military support for its operations in future. The new memorandum of understanding, which will be signed by March next year, will revise and update our existing declaration under the UN standby forces arrangements. It will include those capabilities that we have strengthened as a result of the SDR and that are most relevant to UN needs: more and better-equipped rapid reaction forces, additional strategic lift and improved logistics support.

Mr. Jones: In thanking my right hon. Friend for his comprehensive reply, may I acknowledge the distinguished contribution that he and his Department make in support of the UN in that important sphere? In his efforts to have even better military support, has it crossed his mind that he would have a better force at his disposal if he had some 40 to 50 of the Airbus future large aircraft at his command? May I urge him to consider that and tell him that, if he did, my constituents would help build that aircraft?

Mr. Robertson: As ever, I admire my hon. Friend's ingenious way of promoting the interests of his constituents, which he always does with enthusiasm, dedication and complete justification. As it strengthens the future additional strategic lift capability of the Royal Air Force, the future large aircraft project is very much in our sights for long-term supply. It will become increasingly important in terms of our commitment to the UN, because it is clear that, yet again, Saddam Hussein is intent on engineering another confrontation with the UN. Force was an option in February this year and brought a climb-down by Saddam. Force must again be an option on this occasion because, regrettably, it seems to be the only thing that Saddam understands. He still represents a threat, not only to his neighbours and to the region but to international stability. The international community must stand united and firm in making sure that he complies with yesterday's unanimous view of the UN Security Council.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in recognising the role played by the Territorial Army and other reserve forces in peacekeeping operations in, for example, Bosnia, and in congratulating them on that role? Will he confirm that, with the cuts envisaged in the SDR, this country will be able to meet its commitments in respect of the TA and other reserves in future operations?

Mr. Robertson: I believe that we shall be able to meet those commitments much more efficiently. I visited our troops, including the TA reserves, in theatre in Bosnia last week. I was enormously impressed by their bravery, skill and dedication in rebuilding that country. The whole purpose of the restructuring and updating of the TA is to make sure that the TA can play an even bigger and better part in the sort of operation that it has carried out so well in Bosnia.

Archer Communications Project

20. Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): If he will make a statement on the future of the Archer project. [55898]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): I am pleased to announce that we have now signed a contract worth £185 million with the Bowman prime contractor, Archer Communications Systems Ltd., for the next stage of the Bowman programme. This will cover further risk reduction work, the completion of system definition, initial system integration and initial conversion planning. Subject to satisfactory progress by Archer, it is intended to place a production contract in late 1999. This marks a major commitment by the Ministry of Defence to Archer and to the delivery of the Bowman system.

Mr. Gapes: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will he consider the remarks that I made in the debate on the strategic defence review last week about the award of the local area sub-system contract to Thomson rather than to British Aerospace? That has caused some unhappiness in my constituency, where we have excellent facilities and where people are willing to play a full part in the future of the Archer programme as it develops. I hope that the Government will support the future development of the facility in Ilford.

Mr. Spellar: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his assiduous lobbying on behalf of the plant in Ilford and his constituents. British Aerospace and Racal are not only the prime contractors, but were involved in the local area sub-system competition. Therefore, it is fair to say that they would have made a proper evaluation on technical grounds and in terms of value for money. The excellent manufacturing facility in my hon. Friend's constituency is well recognised not only by us, but by the manufacturers.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

The President of the Council was asked—

Recess Dates

32. Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): What plans she has to ensure that recesses in the autumn and spring coincide with school half-term holidays. [55913]

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The Government proposed to the Modernisation Committee that we should attempt to arrange business to allow constituency weeks to coincide with school half-term in February and October.

Mr. Gapes: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Did she see the large number of children, including my own, who were in the House for part of last week because the House came back on 19 October and half-term was the week after? I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House would be grateful for better long-term arrangements that might allow us to spend time with our children instead of parading them around the Tea Room and other places in the building.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making it clear in the latter part of his remarks that he did not consider that a good idea, as I was not quite sure at the beginning. We are taking all issues into account and certainly will bear in mind concerns such as those he expressed. However, he will recognise that, although the Government have made a proposal to the Modernisation Committee, as yet, the Committee has neither agreed nor reported the matter to the House.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I sympathise with the right hon. Lady's general point of view, but is not the most important thing about the parliamentary programme that it should give right hon. and hon. Members a proper opportunity to hold the Executive to account and to scrutinise the business placed before the House? Although we would welcome a more structured parliamentary year, we would not agree to anything that inhibited the rights of hon. Members on either of those fronts.

Mrs. Beckett: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman that it is the purpose of the House to hold the Government to account and scrutinise parliamentary business properly. It is an error that some of the suggestions that have been made for improving the way in which we handle business in the House are sometimes described in other terms. The underlying motive of those who seek, in some cases to preserve and in other cases to change and modernise our procedures, is to preserve scrutiny. Some might argue that, much as they enjoy spending time with their children, attempting to do so and at the same time to hold the Government to account may not be easy.

National Parliament Office, Brussels

33. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): What plans there are to implement the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons to establish a National Parliament Office in Brussels. [55916]

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Lady rightly draws attention to the recommendation of the Modernisation Committee. I understand that some work is being done by the House authorities on the implications and the practical problems associated with it, which no doubt will be reported to the House in due course.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for that answer. Given the greater powers afforded the European Parliament by the Amsterdam treaty and the desire of the House—and, I believe, the Government—for greater co-operation, mutual understanding and partnership between the House and the European Parliament, does the right hon. Lady agree that such an office should be set up as a matter of urgency to train our very able officers in the House to prepare for when the Amsterdam treaty comes into force?

Mrs. Beckett: It is important that we should do everything that we can to improve the liaison between the European Parliament and this Parliament. In particular, we should use whatever channels we can to get advance information for hon. Members so that we can be well aware of what is being proposed, the full implications for the House and how we should respond. The proposed National Parliament Office would be one means to achieve that, but it is not the only proposal.

Summer Recess

34. Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): What plans she has for reviewing the length of the summer recess; and if she will make a statement. [55917]

Mrs. Beckett: The length of the summer recess is one of the issues that the Modernisation Committee can consider in its inquiry into the parliamentary calendar. As the House knows, the length of the summer recess is affected by several external factors and I do not envisage any change in the immediate future.

Mr. Mullin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is not healthy in a democracy for the Government to enjoy a holiday from scrutiny that amounts to the best part of three months every summer? A possible solution, which may also meet the concerns of those who want us not to sit during half terms, would be for us to sit for a couple of weeks in early September and then not sit during half terms.

Mrs. Beckett: I am aware of my hon. Friend's views. I understand his anxiety to ensure that the House properly holds the Executive to account. However, as anyone who has ever considered changing such arrangements has discovered, there are eminently sound and practical reasons for the shape of the parliamentary term as it has emerged. Changes frequently cause substantial inconvenience not only to Members of Parliament and their ability to hold the Executive to account, but to other organisations, such as political parties that hold party conferences.

Prime Minister's Questions

35. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): What recent representations she has received on the arrangements for Prime Minister's questions. [55918]

Mrs. Beckett: I have received occasional letters about the content of Prime Minister's questions, but no recent proposals to alter the arrangements.

Mr. Amess: Now that we have 18 months' experience of the new-style Prime Minister's Question Time, will the right hon. Lady consider reverting to the original arrangements? Is she aware that many hon. Members feel that the weekly visitation means that the Executive are no longer being properly scrutinised? There is also some frustration that, although the Opposition keep asking questions, they receive no answers.

Mrs. Beckett: I am afraid that those who believe that a return to the previous system would be better are allowing their prejudices to triumph over an examination of the facts. Since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister got rid of the preamble, there is far more—probably almost twice as much—substance in the answers than there was before. My right hon. Friend has missed only one Prime Minister's Question Time since May 1997—when the Belfast agreement was being negotiated. He has also made more statements to the House than his predecessor over a comparable period. Those who are insinuating that the Prime Minister comes to the House less often or is less accountable have not studied the facts.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Perhaps my right hon. Friend will consider the number of questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition. His six in succession tend to be repetitive and miss the point. If we want a sharp, clear exchange of views, perhaps short, sharp questions, limited in number, are the solution.

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly would not venture to give advice to the Leader of the Opposition on how he should conduct himself. I know from experience that that post requires considerable skill.

Standing Committee for the English Regions

37. Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): What plans she has to set up a Standing Committee for the English regions. [55920]

Mrs. Beckett: The Standing Orders already provide for a Standing Committee on Regional Affairs, although it has not met for many years. I am considering whether the Committee might serve a useful purpose in future and how it might be convened.

Mr. Mitchell: I am delighted to hear that. With the establishment of regional development agencies and the possibility of regional devolution, we are clearly moving in a regional direction. It would be useful if each English region—particularly Yorkshire and Humberside, which is the best of them and has a population equal to that of Scotland and problems that are, in many respects, more severe than those of Scotland—should have its own Committee to study its problems.

Mrs. Beckett: I am well aware of the strong regional loyalties in the House. As I say, I am considering whether changes can be made to improve the scrutiny of business. As we all agree, that is what we are here for.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): If such a Standing Committee were established, would its locus be to find out how regional governments can possibly be paid for without demanding extra from the taxpayer, as has been claimed? Does the right hon. Lady agree that people do not want regional governments in England? Would that not cost the taxpayer money? Is it not another example of jobs for the boys?

Mrs. Beckett: As no one has the smallest intention of forcing regional government on anybody, the hon. Gentleman's remarks are interesting but not precisely relevant.

Modernisation

38. Gillian Merron (Lincoln): If she will make a statement about progress in modernising the work of the House. [55921]

Mrs. Beckett: Better information for Members of Parliament is being provided through improving the content of the Order Paper, normally giving advance notice of business two weeks ahead, and publishing, from the start of next Session, the new-style explanatory notes for Bills. On Wednesday, the Social Security Committee reported on pre-legislative scrutiny of the first Bill published in draft, on pension sharing on divorce. The House has approved a report on conduct in the Chamber, to dispense with some of our outdated practices. The parliamentary calendar is being considered by the Modernisation Committee. The report on improving European Union scrutiny procedures will be debated soon.

Gillian Merron: I thank my right hon. Friend for her answer. Given the Government's commitment to family-friendly policies, will she give the House some idea of development in that area, other than the very welcome reference to half-term holidays?

Mrs. Beckett: The balance that the House is striving to achieve between better and more productive scrutiny of Parliament's business while wishing, of course, to do as we encourage others to do and to promote family-friendly policies, is one with which the Modernisation Committee is, struggling almost even as we speak.

International Financial System

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): With permission, I should like to report to the House at the earliest available opportunity the terms of a new agreement reached on Friday by Finance Ministers and central bank governors of the Group of Seven countries to reform and strengthen the international financial system. A full copy of that and a statement by the Heads of Government, setting out the agenda for further action, is available in the Vote Office.

Tomorrow, I shall present to the House the pre-Budget report, with its detail on the domestic economy. However, the financial crisis that swept Asia last year and reverberated around the world has revealed long-standing weaknesses in the international financial system, which G7 Ministers agree must be addressed as a matter of urgency.

Our predecessors had to meet the challenge of ensuring economic stability in an era of national economies. Our generation must meet the challenges of ensuring stability in the era of a global economy, in which each economy can directly affect the prospects of every other. The new way forward is sensible global financial regulation, credible crisis prevention, orderly mechanisms for crisis resolution and a sure foundation in minimum standards and best practices that all countries adopt to participate in the international financial system.

That is directly relevant to the United Kingdom economy. It is everybody's business, not only because we are dependent on trade in goods and services with other countries—the Asian crisis, for example, cut in one single year UK exports to Indonesia, Malaysia, South Korea, Thailand and the Philippines by more than 50 per cent.—but because, in countries such as ours, as we have seen, a weak financial system or inappropriate economic policies in one country put at risk another country's financial system and threaten people's savings or investments, and eventually, their companies or jobs. That is why it is in everyone's interest to support a new mechanism for crisis prevention and resolution, a new transparency in the global financial order and a new process of financial regulation.

The G7 Ministers' statement reaffirms that the balance of risks in the world economy has shifted from concerns about inflation to concerns about growth. In the last month, interest rate policy has been adjusted in Japan, the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, Spain, Portugal, Ireland, Denmark, Italy and again in the United States. The G7 statement issued on Friday reaffirms our commitment to create or sustain the conditions for strong domestic-demand-led growth and financial stability in each of our economies. The authorities will continue to be vigilant in the light of the shift in the balance of risks on a global basis.

In our statement, each continent has agreed to make a contribution to creating the conditions for stability and growth—Japan with banking reform, Europe with structural reforms to tackle unemployment, and America by promoting growth with low inflation. In the case of Latin America, we welcome the policy commitments that the Brazilian Government have made, and we will work with the international community to support them. All of us must act to avoid a retreat into protectionism.

As well as measures to deal with short-term instabilities, we need action to reform the financial architecture. For 50 years, our policies for regulation, supervision, transparency and stability have been devised and developed for a world of relatively sheltered national economies with limited capital markets. Now that markets transcend national boundaries, we must create for global markets systems for supervision, transparency, regulation and stability that are as sophisticated as the markets with which they have to cope.

G7 Governments have therefore concluded that the international architecture devised in the 1940s for the economies of the 1940s is no longer adequate for the challenges of the 1990s, and that we need new rules for the global financial system. In the statement, each G7 country has now agreed to adopt and apply codes of conduct founded on minimum standards and best practice. These are new disciplines and undertakings that each country is prepared to accept as a condition of its participation in the international system.

In monetary and financial policy, we are agreed on the need for greater openness, and that each country should specify its objectives for monetary policy. We are agreed that each country should identify responsibility for achieving those objectives, and for reporting and explaining monetary and financial policy decisions. We are agreed that these standards should be set down in an internationally agreed code of conduct that all countries are prepared to accept.

We have committed ourselves to complying with the code of conduct of good practice on fiscal transparency that has been drawn up by the International Monetary Fund. Similar standards of transparency are required in the private sector. By spring next year, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development will complete work on a code of principles on sound corporate governance and structure. By early 1999, we will also have in place a plan for internationally agreed accounting standards.

Those codes of conduct in monetary policy, fiscal policy and corporate governance will mean radical changes in the way in which financial markets function. They will help to produce an environment in which financial markets can operate better. They should reduce the risk of future failures and mean that, when failures do occur, the financial system is robust enough to withstand them. By improving public understanding of why and how decisions are made—and by making sure that the right long-term policies are in place—the codes will help to build public understanding and support for the policies that are necessary to deliver economic growth and prosperity.

Proper implementation of the codes of conduct should be a condition of IMF and World bank support. Immediate action to promote transparency in these areas should be key components in any reform programme which the IMF and World bank agree in coming months. The IMF and the World bank must themselves be more open and accountable, with a presumption in favour of releasing information and external audit of their performance.

We have agreed that there should be new undertakings on social policy, too. The G7 statement underlines the importance of policies that protect the most vulnerable—the real victims of financial crises, whose pain is very real indeed. That is why the G7 Governments have agreed that there should be general principles for good practice in social policy. These should serve as a guide to best practice by individual countries, and there must be, as a matter of immediacy, a new World bank emergency facility to provide additional funding on special terms to the most vulnerable groups in society.

On global financial regulation, the G7 Governments have now agreed to support the establishment of a process for strengthened financial sector surveillance, using national and international regulatory and supervisory expertise. That will be used in the IMF's regular surveillance of individual member countries.

We will bring together the key international institutions and those national regulatory authorities that are involved in financial sector stability to co-operate and co-ordinate their activities in the management and development of policies to foster stability and reduce systemic risk. They will be able to exchange information more systematically on risk in the international financial system.

Dr. Tietmeyer, the president of the Bundesbank, has agreed to consult the relevant international bodies on the reforms. I want an international memorandum of understanding to establish a proper division of responsibility between regulators and international authorities.

In the G7 statement, we also commit ourselves to strengthening the regulatory focus on risk management systems and prudential standards in financial sector institutions, and, in particular, to examining the implications of the operations of leveraged international financial organisations, including hedge funds.

A fundamental problem has been a lack of transparency and poor standards of disclosure by some financial market participants. The Basle committee on banking standards will look at that important issue when it considers an international standard of best practice for transparency and disclosure. An agreed international standard of best practice would act as a benchmark both for financial institutions and for their regulators.

The United Kingdom is clear that financial institutions that deal with hedge funds must take into account all proper prudential standards and requirements of disclosure—proper due diligence procedures are essential. We also believe that, as part of the review of capital adequacy rules, the Basle committee needs to examine the appropriate treatment of banks' exposures to hedge funds to ensure proper recognition of the risks.

As Howard Davies, the chairman of the Financial Services Authority, has emphasised, managements of financial institutions have a responsibility to ensure that circumstances never arise in which personal relationships with potential counterparts could get in the way of appropriate due diligence. He said that there must be complete transparency in senior management's personal investments in counterpart firms to avoid any suspicion of conflicts of interest. I fully endorse those remarks.

In their statement, the G7 Heads of Government said that they would examine not only the operation of highly leveraged operations of offshore institutions but how they can encourage offshore centres to comply with internationally agreed standards. That is of particular importance for the United Kingdom, because Long-Term Capital Management was registered in the Cayman Islands.

The Government are committed to improving standards of regulation and regulatory co-operation in our overseas territories and to implementing the European, G7 and other OECD initiatives to tackle unfair tax competition. We will not allow high-risk hedge fund speculation by a few to translate into wider risks for the many, and destabilise the financial system on which we all depend for prosperity.

Through international examination of transparency in hedge funds, proper due diligence procedures, potential conflicts of interest and dissemination of standards to offshore centres, Governments can play their part in minimising the implications of future sudden and systemic disturbances.

G7 Ministers are agreed on the need for a new procedure for crisis prevention and tackling contagion. The central element is an enhanced IMF reserve facility, which would provide a contingent short-term line of credit for countries pursuing strong IMF-approved policies. That facility could be drawn on in times of need, and would entail appropriate interest rates along with shorter maturities. It could be complemented, in individual cases, by bilateral contingent financing, and it would be accompanied by appropriate private sector involvement.

The G7 countries have also agreed on the need for a better long-term mechanism for international authorities to work with the private sector and national authorities in handling debt rescheduling at times of potential crisis. We are asking the private sector to adopt collective action clauses to facilitate more orderly work-out arrangements, and we will consider the use of such clauses in our own sovereign and quasi-sovereign bond issues.

We are asking the World bank, in co-operation with the IMF, to work to put in place effective insolvency and debtor-creditor regimes and, we are asking the IMF to consider lending into arrears, under carefully designed conditions and on a case-by-case basis. We want the private sector to build on its experience with some emerging market countries in developing new, market-based contingent financing mechanisms. We will now support the more active use of loan guarantees to encourage greater private-sector involvement in emerging market financing.

Following the welcome United States Congress decision, we call for the IMF quota increase and the new arrangements to borrow to be implemented as soon as possible. Together, they will provide additional IMF resources of $90 billion to ensure the stability of the international financial system.

Globalisation has happened. We must now make it work in hard times as well as good. As we have shown, we need not new institutions, but new rules and disciplines. I want to thank other G7 Ministers and central bank governors, and Heads of Government who have backed this work all along, for working through this new agreement.

Taken together, the reforms that we have agreed—global financial regulation, new codes of conduct for transparency and mechanisms for crisis prevention and crisis resolution, backed up by the resources that those need—represent the first steps and now set the agenda for what will become the most radical restructuring of the international financial architecture since its creation in the 1940s, making us better equipped to tackle the challenges of the 1990s and the century ahead. I commend this detailed statement to the House.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): That statement was less about the global financial architecture than about distracting attention from Britain's looming downturn and the Chancellor's four basic blunders, which created it. Not once did he admit that there is a problem, and not once did he admit his responsibility for it. The House will have thought it surprising that, although the Chancellor announced this morning to the Confederation of British Industry a date for proposed British membership of the euro and the establishment of a parliamentary body to prepare for it, he has not found time to announce it to the House.

In view of the concern that the Chancellor expressed in the agreement about the performance of domestic financial regulators, will he give an absolutely clear undertaking that the financial services Bill that would create Britain's financial regulator will be in the Queen's Speech, or confirm that the legislation is in such a mess that he is not in a position to include it?

How does the Chancellor square the greater openness and disclosure about which we have heard much—including the repeated use of the word "transparency", in the belief that constant repetition makes it true—with the impenetrable thicket of changed definitions and fiddled statistics with which he has surrounded our public finances? The central point that the Chancellor failed to address was that the IMF was set up to encourage national Governments to pursue sensible economic policies. His predecessors in the previous Labour Government know that only too well.

Today's economic downturn in different parts of the world is primarily due to different domestic policy blunders in each country. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House how British businesses are supposed to cope with £40 billion of extra taxation and regulation? Is he merely going to say that they all have to sharpen up their act, while he lectures the world about their deficiencies?

Gavyn Davies of Goldman Sachs has said:

"the UK is teetering on the brink of recession".

Will the Chancellor tell the House what he is doing to avoid such a recession? Has he not read the surveys that put Britain at the bottom of the European growth league for next year? Is he aware that the poll of forecasts published by The Economist shows British growth of less than 1 per cent. next year, while even Australia, which is heavily dependent on Asia for its trade and prosperity, is set to grow by 2.2 per cent?

When will the Chancellor stop lecturing others, and tell us what he intends to do here in Britain to prevent our sliding into a recession that will have been made in Downing street?

Mr. Brown: I knew that the Conservative party wants to opt out of Europe; it now seems to want to opt out of the whole world. When we have an agreement that has been signed by Governments of right and left throughout the world; when the central banks in America, Europe and Japan recognise the need for action; when growth in world trade is set to fall by two thirds this year, from 11 per cent. last year to the 4 per cent. forecast for this year; and when 25 per cent. of the world is in recession, it ill befits the Conservative party to fail to examine the need for fundamental reforms in the international financial system.

We supported the previous Government when they considered heavily indebted poor countries and international debt and when they went to Lyons to sign an agreement tackling unemployment. I believe that, on reflection, Conservative Members will think that all-party support for an agreement signed by everyone from Alan Greenspan and President Chirac to the Prime Minister of Japan and the new President of Germany would be a more sensible approach.

Let me deal with the right hon. Gentleman's individual points, such as they were. He says that constant repetition of "transparency" will bring no answers in itself. That is precisely why all countries have now agreed to follow a code of transparency. It would have been far better if the previous Conservative Government had taken the action that might have avoided some of the crises in the first place.

Yes, it is true that the International Monetary Fund was set up primarily to deal with balance of payments crises affecting individual national Governments, because of the risk that they would spill over into other national economies; but the world has changed since 1945, and we are dealing with global financial markets that need supervision and transparency not only nationally but globally. It is hardly surprising that central bank governors and international regulators are prepared, despite the shadow Chancellor's advice, to meet and consider big reforms in the international financial system.

When the shadow Chancellor sees the result of the work being done by the Basle committee, the International Monetary Fund and the World bank to reach agreement on a new mechanism for financial regulation that can spot problems before they arise in individual economies; deal with some of the current gaps in the regulatory system; and spot some of the difficulties that arise from the international operation of hedge funds, he will think twice about pouring cold water on a very sensible idea.

The crisis resolution system—the special facility of the IMF—was an idea originally proposed by America as a temporary facility to deal with crises arising from current events, and the House agreed the funding of the IMF behind it last July, so it ill befits the Conservative party to oppose a measure that is of good use to the international system.

When Japan has to nationalise many of its banks; when the public sector is buying shares in private companies in Hong Kong; and when the United States has had to mount a rescue operation for a hedge fund that was exposed to $1.3 trillion, it ill befits the Conservative party not to take seriously the problems of our international system. I hope that, on reflection, it will think again.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his role in getting the G7 to provide the £90 billion has been widely applauded? Will he say something about the problems of contagion of perfectly respectable economies from some of those in crisis, and in particular about some of the hedge funds? We are dealing with very large sums, and at times of variability in the markets concerned, it is difficult to control them. What plans does he have, or might he think of having, to monitor such funds?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, and I agree with him that the issues are complex and detailed. The Conservative party should face up to that when it examines the issues.

The crisis prevention facility—the supplemental reserve facility, which has been set up by the IMF—is designed so that countries pursuing sound economic policies are not brought down by international events beyond their control. The emergency facility and the resources behind it should be accompanied by bilateral help from individual countries willing to contribute and a serious contribution from the private sector, which should now play its part—on this as on other issues—in helping to resolve some of the crises that arise from the operation of the financial markets.

On hedge funds, I assure my right hon. Friend that the measures that I have outlined this afternoon—including a code of standards, the examination of dependent territories and rules of capital adequacy—are being pursued urgently. The Financial Services Authority is taking a great interest in the issue, as is the Basle committee, which brings together all the banks, and I am confident that, although it is difficult to deal with the problems caused by the operation of hedge funds, those who invest in them will be prepared to follow codes of conduct requiring higher standards of transparency and disclosure.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I welcome the Chancellor's statement and his recent work on trying to tackle global market turbulence. Does he agree that we in the United Kingdom have a responsibility to address our domestic problems as part of the solution, including getting down our overvalued pound and exchange rates? He mentioned the monetary and fiscal codes included in the G7 agreement, but will he consider the connection between the two? In his Budget statement, will he undertake to avoid any fiscal easing, to make it possible for the Bank of England to bring down interest rates in accordance with the approach that he advocated on his summer tour of world capitals?

We all wish to see greater stability in the exchange rate. I welcome the Government's proposal for a parliamentary committee to prepare for the single currency, and, whatever difficulties the official Opposition have with the issue, we will be happy to co-operate. However, does the Chancellor accept that serious private sector preparation for the single currency will not happen unless there is evidence of serious public sector commitment to joining it? The two must go together.

The Chancellor pointed out the fall in exports to Asian markets, but does he accept that we trade more with the Netherlands than with the whole of Asia, Russia and South America combined? In those circumstances, he cannot blame our current problems on difficulties in those regions, and he must pursue an action plan at home to bring down our uncompetitive exchange rate and high interest rates.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for being more generous than the shadow Chancellor in recognising that international issues must be addressed. The Conservative party seems to want to fail to recognise that. I will address the exchange rate issues again tomorrow, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that the exchange rate is now 10 per cent. below its peak. It was DM3.10 at one point, and is now below DM2.80. The dollar exchange rate has barely changed in the past three years.

It was announced some time ago that the Government were preparing a draft national changeover plan for the single currency. The Conservative party is, of course, free to use one of its Opposition days to debate its new policy on the European Union, and I would enjoy that very much.

Individual national economies have been severely affected by what has happened around the world for two reasons. First, although trade with Asia is smaller than trade with other continents, trade as a whole, which was growing by 11 per cent., is now growing by 4 per cent. Secondly, $3 trillion has been wiped off stock exchanges around the world, which is the equivalent of 10 per cent. of world GDP. That is unlikely not to have an effect on confidence in individual countries and people's ability to make decisions about investment.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will come to understand that the combination of the downturn in world trade—arising initially from what happened in Asia, but affecting Russia and eastern Europe and Latin America, and now affecting some decisions being made in the United States—and what is happening on the stock exchanges, has had a powerful effect on the world economy and on confidence. I want us to steer a course of stability, but we must ensure that the world economy is also in a position to steer such a course. That is why we need major international financial reforms. I hope that, when the Conservative party grows up, it will welcome them.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Does the Chancellor agree that the British Government, and our friends in the G7 countries, are acting so that nation states can come to terms with their own economies and seek to deal with the financial contagion of speculation that has spread across the world? Long-Term Capital Management was able to raise $100 billion on $4 billion of capital. At one point, it was $3 trillion in debt. Japanese banks were not regulated properly, according to the Basle agreement. Derivatives trading has stripped the world's economies of good money made by manufacturers. Does my right hon. Friend agree that what he has said today puts the emphasis back on the real economy, on manufacturing, on services, on sales and on exports by getting a grip on the financial economy?

Mr. Brown: I agree that, if a Japanese bank fails or a Korean industrial company is unable to continue its investment, there will be an effect on jobs in the United Kingdom. If a Japanese manufacturer, or even an American or Latin American one, cannot maintain investment, that too affects our ability to invest and to create jobs.

People are coming to recognise that events in individual economies, and the fragility of the banking systems in some developing economies, can have a powerful effect on the world economy. To deal with that is not just in the interests of one country; it is in the interests of all. That is why global financial regulation is a central issue. It was not an issue when capital flows were so small in the 1940s, but it is bound to be an issue in the 1990s, and that is why the international financial institutions must be reformed.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): I have been in the House for 20 years, and I have never heard a statement from a Chancellor that contained so much waffle and so little detail. Is not the right hon. Gentleman's statement basically a diversionary tactic that will give him an alibi tomorrow when he will announce to the House that our growth rate next year will be way under 1 per cent. while growth rates in France and Germany are way over 2 per cent? Is not that due to the failure of his economic policy of spending too high, taxing too high and imposing too much regulation, which has forced the Bank of England to keep interest rates sky high, and has created a growing depression? The right hon. Gentleman talked of transparency, but there is none in the European Central bank, which he is keen to join. Will he advocate that the bank's minutes be published? How much will his package cost the British taxpayer?

Mr. Brown: I do not know what has happened to the Conservative party. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] Answer? The hon. Gentleman made a statement of prejudice against the world, and he failed to recognise that what happens in Britain is affected by what happens round the world. If he were criticising a statement that I had made without the agreement of our G7 partners and of central bank governors, that would be all very well.

However, I have worked on the statement with the Chairman of the Federal Reserve bank in the United States, Alan Greenspan, the governors of all the central banks in Europe, and the Finance Ministers of those countries. That includes Ministers of right-wing views and left-wing views, all of whom agree that international financial reform is necessary. The only people who do not agree with that, it seems, are in the Conservative party.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement, and I pay tribute to the expert, confidence-inspiring way in which he set about it—[Laughter.] Oh yes, people all over the world will wish to thank the British Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he has done.

May I ask about a tax on speculative flows? Is that idea completely ruled out, or might it perhaps be on the agenda at some future point?

Mr. Brown: The key problem of a tax on speculation is how it would be applied, given the numerous financial centres that exist. We think that disclosure is the better answer to some of the problems that have arisen from the effects of speculative activity around the world, when it has become excessive. People must disclose the activities in which they are engaged, there must be proper international bodies that can deal with managing disclosure issues, and there must be proper standards that people have to follow.

I believe that even the Conservative party will see that that is the proper way forward. It wants to keep laughing, but we are talking about an international crisis that has left scores of millions of people in poverty. I wish that it would recognise what is happening around the world.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Does the Chancellor accept that he has a problem in the growing gap between income and expenditure, and that, at the heart of his statement, despite all the appeals for private sector support, is an announcement that the Government will commit more money to the International Monetary Fund? Will that commitment increase his problem by increasing public expenditure, or will it not count as public expenditure? If it does not, would it not be more honest if it did?

Mr. Brown: In the traditions that have been followed by Governments of both parties, the contributions to the IMF count as coming from foreign exchange reserves. Our IMF quota has been voted by the House. America was the last country that had to make a decision on whether to go ahead with it. There has been a great welcome around the world for the American decision that makes it possible to create the new reserve facility. Under the previous Government, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, who seems to have become very unpopular on the Conservative Benches, supported these measures. I think that, on reflection, the Conservative party will again support them, but it is a pity that it cannot do so today.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): Does the Chancellor accept that, in any other forum in Britain, what he said would have been welcomed unanimously as sheer common sense? His two major points—the vulnerability of developing nations and the problem of debt, and the need for transparency in the IMF and the World bank—are surely self-evident. If people cannot be persuaded of the social and moral grounds that underscore his arguments, cannot we point out that economic interdependence means, for example, that, because of the meltdown in Asia, 1 million fewer Asian tourists are using the services of the British tourism industry than previously? On transparency, can he assure us that, with Oxfam and other non-governmental organisations, he believes that there should be separate representation at both the IMF and the World bank?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, who has long taken a great interest in development. I agree with what he says about transparency and the effect of what is happening all around the world on European economies. The agreement sets up a new emergency World bank facility that can give additional help to the poorest groups, particularly in Asia. The World bank is investing an extra $17 billion to help deal with social problems in Asia: 2.5 million children in Indonesia are being helped; a special employment programme is being developed in Thailand; in Korea, special adjustment finance is being provided. All those things are necessary to avoid not only unemployment but, in some cases, starvation. I hope that the whole House supports the measures.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): One of the key recommendations in the statement is the reduction of European Union unemployment, which is now at the horrifying level of about 10 per cent., and more than 20 per cent. in some countries. Will the Chancellor say exactly how that is to be done? In light of the firm assurance by all G7 members that they are totally opposed to protectionism, will he say that the Government will wholly oppose the common agricultural policy, which is the greatest protection racket ever devised by man?

Mr. Brown: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government propose to reform the common agricultural policy. Conservative Members should welcome the fact that there is growth in Europe, and that the projections are for higher growth next year than in America, for example. [Interruption.] Conservative Members do not like it when Europe is growing, and they do not like it when Europe is not growing. Europe is set to grow next year. The employment action measures that we propose to adopt in Britain to deal with the structural problems of youth and long-term unemployment are increasingly being adopted in Europe. That will help to bring down unemployment.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): In an economic crisis, the weakest go to the wall first. In this case, the weakest are some of the world's poorest nations, which are looking for the removal of their international debt. Will the debt rescheduling measures that my right hon. Friend mentioned—new rules for the IMF and the World bank—begin to tackle that problem?

Mr. Brown: At the recent meetings of the IMF and the World bank in October, the United Kingdom proposed a number of measures that would help to get more countries into the debt reduction process. We are confident that, if action is taken both by them and by the world authorities, all countries can be part of the debt reduction process by the millennium.

We suggested a measure whereby post-conflict countries, particularly in Africa, which face the double burden of debt and an economy destroyed as a result of war, could get special help to ensure that they are part of the debt reduction process as well. I assure my hon. Friend that what the Churches and voluntary organisations throughout the UK and Europe are pressing for—action before the millennium on debt relief that genuinely helps people in difficulty, particularly in Africa—is part of the programme that the UK is pushing.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Before we set another unnecessary hare running, did the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to agree with the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), as he seemed to, that financial services are not a real service industry, even if they require regulation?

Mr. Brown: No, I did not say that, and I do not think that it was the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): My right hon. Friend should not pay a great deal of attention to the nervous laughter from the Conservative Benches when he was making his statement, because that party was responsible for seeing Johnson Matthey go down the pan to the tune of several hundred million pounds; they sat on their hands while the Bank of Credit and Commerce International lost £14 billion; and they did nothing when Barings lost £800 million. They are the Nicky Leesons of the political world. Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that, although words like "codes of conduct" and "intervention" are well-meaning, if we are to tame the casino economy there must be some binding measures as well?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out the Conservatives' record. If they do not believe in international financial regulation, it is doubtful whether they believe in national financial regulation. All G7 countries have agreed to follow the codes of conduct and the intervention that we propose, and there is now a timetable for action. At the beginning of next year, agreements on a number of those issues will be put into practice, and any further work will be completed by the next G7 summit. That is a record not only of moving the issue forward as a result of the financial crisis, but of trying to resolve quickly issues which, on reflection, Conservative Members should have resolved long ago, when they were in government.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): The Chancellor mentioned the need to reduce unemployment across Europe. Does he agree that those measures should be business led, and that it is not the role of Governments within the European Union to attempt to create jobs? That should be left to the business community.

Mr. Brown: I agree that businesses create jobs and prosperity, and that is exactly what I would say in every discussion I have. However, the hon. Lady must recognise that welfare to work would not have happened without government. The private sector often needs the Government's lead in helping with training and job opportunities for people who have been left out. We now have 140,000 young people in the welfare-to-work programmes under the new deal. I hope that the hon. Lady's remarks mean that she, at least, will welcome that on behalf of the Conservative party.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, because it offers a firm platform for collective action by the new Governments of the left in Europe to promote growth and employment. However, can he assure the House that, in future, IMF packages will secure jobs and employment in the target countries, not simply bail out banks for risks that they should never have taken? Will he also assure us that Britain's offshore tax havens will have a firm regime of disclosure and transparency, of the kind that he wishes to see in the rest of the world?

Mr. Brown: I can say that we are looking at exactly that, in relation to the offshore independent territories.

As for the IMF, it is true that last year's initial programmes relating to countries such as Indonesia have been found not to be appropriate. That is why there must be more openness and more external audit in regard to what the IMF does, and I believe that some of the decisions that we have made will facilitate the process.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): In the early part of his statement, the Chancellor mentioned a number of actions that countries and groups of countries were expected to take in order to comply with the international agreement. Will there be a country-by-country timetable for such action? What sanctions will be imposed on countries that do not comply with that international requirement? Without a timetable and without sanctions, it will be a worthless and toothless agreement.

Mr. Brown: Countries will report what they have done by the time of the next G7 summit. As for sanctions, we propose that, when the IMF produces its national reports on individual countries, it should report on what has happened to, for example, reforms of the financial system. So there will be a timetable for reports, and sanctions in the form of publicity about what has gone wrong.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Chancellor keep a wary eye on our national clearing banks and other financial institutions, so that what has happened with hedge funds in the past does not happen again? When the financial institutions caught a cold in connection with third-world debts, the property boom and one or two other speculative enterprises in the 1970s and 1980s, they promptly recouped the money from customers in the United Kingdom, both industrial and private. Perhaps the Chancellor will keep an eye on them, because we would not like a repeat of something that caused so much damage to the personal and industrial economic health of the country.

Mr. Brown: I agree that it is important for our banks to service the needs of businesses in the best way possible, and the Government will keep that under continuous review. As for hedge funds, we intend to implement the initiatives that I have suggested this afternoon. I will report to the House later.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Does the Chancellor realise that the CBI and the Engineering Employers Federation will not be amused by his refusal to answer questions about the way in which his actions are exacerbating the effects of the decline in the world economy? Will he now answer the question posed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude)? Will he tell us exactly why the Australian economy, which is more dependent on the Asian economy than ours, is growing at a rate of 2.2 per cent., while the United Kingdom economy—which, by his own admission, is less dependent on the Asian economy—is growing at a rate of only 0.8 per cent.?

Mr. Brown: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the British economy has been growing at an average of more than 2 per cent. over the past year. I shall give the figures tomorrow.

The hon. Gentleman should look at the figures relating to employment, which show that more people are employed in Britain than ever before. As for unemployment, which is another measure of bad performance, we have 400,000 fewer people unemployed.

I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the Australian Government are as interested as the British Government in reforming the international financial system. It seems that the only organisation that is uninterested in reform is the Conservative party.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, especially the statement of the principles of social policy that have been agreed through the G7.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm—especially in the light of his last few words—that the country's employment record has been rather better lately than the record of the last Government, from whom we inherited the largest proportion of workless households in the European Union? Will he also confirm that it is understood by all members of the G7, on both right and left, that decent social standards are a precondition for economic progress, and that social justice is not an alternative to economic prosperity?

Mr. Brown: We have held discussions about the code of social policy, not simply with the G7 and the IMF but with the Commonwealth countries. They, too, are interested in how we can establish internationally agreed principles of social policy that can guide their peoples' behaviour. I like to think that we can make some progress on that, in terms not just of international debt, but of laying down social standards that all countries are prepared to adopt.

In view of what is happening in Indonesia—which I visited only a few months ago—and in Korea, Malaysia and many other Asian countries, the sooner we can secure agreement on what can be done to help in these difficult social times, the better. I assure my hon. Friend that, although I can, of course, make my party political points about the Conservatives' record on unemployment, it is more important to us to make progress throughout the world in dealing with some of the major social problems.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): The Chancellor said that the IMF quota increase was agreed in July by the House. In fact, it was put upstairs in a Standing Committee, where there was an almost farcical exchange, with very little understanding by the Government of what had been agreed. Billions of pounds of British taxpayers' money is at risk here. Will the Chancellor acknowledge that, in future, all IMF quota increases should be taken on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Brown: I am happy to debate the issues of international financial institutions sensibly, and I hope that the whole Conservative party will join that debate when we have it. On the IMF quota increase, it is correct that, in Committee before the summer recess, we approved the UK share of the quota increase. It is also true that we approved in Committee last year the steps that the UK needs to take to participate in what are the new arrangements for borrowing.

I agree that these are important issues, but I think the hon. Gentleman would want Britain to continue to be the fourth biggest shareholder in the IMF, and to play our full part in the international institutions, and would want Britain's influence to count throughout the world. That depends on our playing a full part in the international financial institutions, and not on some cheap party political point saying that we should not pay our share of the quota.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, when he discussed these matters with his G7 colleagues, one of the matters that might have been discussed was how to promote such policies internationally? Will he confirm that the Conservative party has decided to get rid of the torch symbol and instead adopt the ostrich in its approach to these matters?

Mr. Brown: I know that, because the Conservative party failed in government, it wants to think that every Government will fail internationally, and is cynical about what can be achieved; but my hon. Friend is right. Progress on dealing with some of these international problems over the past few months has been important. We must go further, and make more progress on these issues. That cannot be done unless the G7, central bank governors and Finance Ministers work together and we can galvanise the IMF and World bank into action. I would have hoped that there would be all-party support for that throughout the House.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): May I add my support for the international economic initiatives, but specifically ask about exchange rate stability? Would the right hon. Gentleman confirm the written answer that was given to me by the Economic Secretary to the Treasury a few days ago—that, since the Government came to office, the pound sterling had appreciated by over 10 per cent. in real terms, when we take into account different rates of inflation and the movements of all currencies, including the dollar; in other words, the pound sterling is over 10 per cent. less competitive?

Mr. Brown: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the figures. When we came to power, the pound against the deutschmark was, if I remember rightly, 2.79; it is now less than 2.79. For a time, it was up further. It has now come down 10 per cent. In relation to the dollar, the pound and the dollar have not changed a great deal over the past two or three years. I have understood the concerns of exporters in these matters, but I keep saying to the House, and I will repeat it: the bigger concern of every part of industry would be if we were ever to return again to the boom-bust conditions that were left to us by the Conservative party in the early 1990s.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Would not the Chancellor's statement this afternoon have been greeted with greater credibility if he had stopped blaming everyone else except the Government for this country's economic woes? Why did he say in public during the summer that the growth target that he announced in the last Budget had been revised downwards from 1.7 to 1 per cent? Why did he tell this morning's "Today" programme rather than Parliament that our borrowing was being increased to a staggering £22 billion? When will he take some proper measures to help manufacturing industry, and to save some of the jobs that are being lost in his constituency and elsewhere?

Mr. Brown: I do not know what question the hon. Member has been given to ask, but let me say that America is revising down its growth forecast, Japan has revised down its growth forecast, and Europe and Latin America are revising down their growth forecast. Every country is having to revise down its growth forecast as a result of what is happening throughout the world. The Conservative party wants to opt out of the world. We are part of a global economy, and the sooner it recognises that, the better.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Will the right hon. Gentleman now answer the question he dodged earlier? If he believes in transparency on monetary policy, why has he not criticised the refusal of the European central bank to publish the minutes of its meetings? He has lectured Conservative Members on foreign policy, but has he not noticed that Germany has not a new President, as he said earlier, but a new Chancellor? That is something that Britain needs, too.

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman wants to be accurate, he will acknowledge that I have criticised the European central bank and asked it to have transparency in its operations. The hon. Gentleman should be correct rather than wrong in his assertions.

Personal Statement (Mr. Ron Davies)

4.26 pm

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for allowing me this opportunity to make a personal statement.

Last Monday evening, I made a severe error of judgment in failing to protect my personal safety. I became the victim of what was for me a frightening and shocking crime. I reported the matter to the police, and the process of law will now take its course. For that reason, I shall make no further comment on that aspect of the matter. However, I offer my heartfelt apologies to the House for any embarrassment that I might have caused.

On Tuesday morning, I explained to the Prime Minister what had occurred, I apologised for it, I offered him my resignation, and he accepted it. I want to place on record my thanks to the Prime Minister for his personal support and solicitude over the past few days, which have been of very great comfort to me.

The events of the last week have been unremittingly agonising. I could not have got through them without the love and support of the two people most dear to me—my wife Chris and my daughter Angharad. Without the constant support of a few other very close friends I cannot imagine how I could have got through this nightmare, and I offer them my heartfelt and most profound thanks. I also want to thank many other close friends for their endless patience in the face of a constant barrage of media pressure. I am grateful for the messages of support from former ministerial colleagues, Members of both Houses—from both sides—and the public at large.

The shock, for me, of the events of last Monday, and the sadness of my resignation, have been added to by media intrusion into my private life, reporting as fact a stream of rubbish. Rumour and lies have been asserted as truth. The whole of my adult life has been pored over for something that could be twisted to suit the present prejudice.

Ultimately, this arbitrary abuse of power is an attack not just on me, but on all our rights. The right to privacy belongs to all citizens. The victims of crime, even if they are in public life, cannot be excluded from that. We all have rights; we also all have responsibilities, of course, and that applies to the media. The media have the right to freedom, but they must carry the responsibilities to exercise that right judiciously.

In my childhood, I learned a very hard lesson at a very early age—one cannot allow powerful people to bully the weak or to abuse their own power. How willing will the next victim of a crime be to report it; how eager will people be to stand for public office in the knowledge that one mistake might result in the whole of their lives being picked over and twisted out of all recognition? How can it improve democracy if our lives in this House, our influences and our relationships, were all laid out for public titillation? We are what we are. We are all different—the product of both our genes and our experiences. Members of Parliament are no different from the society that we represent.

Since I became the Labour party spokesman for Wales in 1992, the creation of a new democracy for Wales has been for me a personal commitment and a political responsibility. I know that the process that I started will go on, creating a more tolerant, more open and more mature way of conducting politics. My experience in the past week could not have provided me with a more vivid demonstration of the need for such a tolerant and understanding society. The support that I have received from colleagues, from ordinary citizens and, indeed, from the Welsh media reassures me that that is a vision that is widely shared.

Not for the first time in my life, I have been badly beaten and hurt. I believe that my defences are strong enough to see me through this very trying time. From adversity, of course, can come strength. That will be so in my current circumstances. I worked hard to change the face of politics and government in Wales. I am now more determined than ever to see those changes through.

I am very grateful to you, Madam Speaker, and for the attention of the House.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Journalists (BBC)

4.30 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You and other hon. Members are very much aware of the reliance that we place on a free journalistic corps—on the fact that journalists must be absolutely free to report on what hon. Members and others do. Can you suggest what we might do to protect journalists in the BBC against an absolutely unjustified trammelling of their freedom which seems, on the face of it—if we can believe the reports—to result from some high-level cronyism between elements in the Government and elements in the senior level of the BBC? The matter surely must concern you, Madam Speaker, as much as it does other hon. Members. Will you say what can be done about it?

Madam Speaker: I concern myself with many matters in the House, and try to give useful and beneficial guidance to hon. Members. However, on those matters, I think that we must all act in accordance with our own consciences.

Security and Intelligence Agencies

[Relevant documents: The Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual Report (Cm. 4073) for 1997–98 and the Government's reponse (Cm. 4089).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

Madam Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State, I should say that I had intended to place a time limit on Back Benchers' speeches in this debate, as there is great demand to speak in it. However, we are starting in good time, and I leave the House to discipline itself for once.

4.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): Thank you, Madam Speaker; I shall take your words to heart.

Today's debate is a piece of parliamentary history. This is not the first report of the Intelligence and Security Committee, but it is the first time that Parliament has had an opportunity to debate one. It is not so long ago that Governments would not officially recognise the very existence of the Secret Intelligence Service—or MI6, as it was popularly known—and in those years it would have been inconceivable that Parliament should debate its functions. Even the location of the agency's headquarters was protected information. It is perhaps a measure of the new openness that, when I last visited those headquarters, I noticed that the nearest bistro has been named "Miss Moneypenny's"—which is an interesting case of fiction invading real life.

It is a consequence of the work of the Intelligence and Security Committee that we are able to have this debate at all. The first report of the new Committee fully justifies the new mechanisms of scrutiny. It sets out the work programme of the agencies with clarity, and also raises openly, but responsibly, discussion of areas of legitimate public concern, particularly relating to the personnel management of the agencies and the files on individuals held by them.

The Committee's work necessarily is not in the open. It would sharply inhibit the candour with which its questions were answered if it met in open session. Some hon. Members may imagine that, because the Committee meets and takes evidence in private, it provides an easy life for its witnesses. I should disabuse the House of that idea. As one of those who has given evidence to the Committee, I can assure the House that the fact that the meeting takes place in private does not in any way diminish the acuteness of the questioning, which is just as testing as any in front of the press.

I thank all members of the Committee for the hard work that they have put into the report. Their effort is all the more appreciated as, by definition, it cannot lead to the public recognition that might attend membership of a Select Committee. The success of the Committee owes much to the experienced hand of its Chairman, the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King). The House is fortunate to have in the Chair of the Committee a Member who has had extensive experience, in Northern Ireland and at the Ministry of Defence, of the work of the agencies. As the report of the Committee stresses, the frankness with which the agencies are able to respond to its scrutiny is crucially dependent on the relationship of trust between the agencies and the members and the Chairman of the Committee.

The Government welcome the report. Our published response to the report has already demonstrated that we find ourselves in agreement with the bulk of the Committee's recommendations, although there are some which are for the House itself, not for Ministers, to progress. I would begin with the very lucid observations in the foreword to the report. I would agree with the Committee that the three agencies are operating in an environment that has changed dramatically over the past decade.

For the first 40 years after the war, the role and justification of the three agencies was self-evident. Europe, and indeed much of the world, was divided into two armed camps, with a very real risk of hostilities between them. Today, three of our former potential enemies in the Warsaw pact are becoming firm allies in NATO. Almost a dozen of the countries of the former communist bloc are democracies on the threshold of membership of the European Union.

We are fortunate to be living through a period of such exciting and historic transformation in our continent, yet there remain security threats to our country, some of which have become more serious over the same decade in which the cold war has receded. The cold war provided a world order of a kind, and not everything that has happened since its disappearance has been either predictable or welcome.

The conflicts in the former Yugoslavia continue to bring home to us the dangers to regional peace from the revival of a narrow ethnic nationalism. The recent strategic defence review confirmed that British forces must be ready for deployment on a variety of missions to keep the peace and to ensure humanitarian relief. Accurate and reliable intelligence will remain as important to those missions as it ever was to the defence of the central front of NATO. Moreover, the increased communication and speed of transfer of equipment and technology which comes with globalisation brings with it challenges as well as opportunities.

Increased mobility creates new opportunities for the drugs trade, which is now second only to the oil trade in value. The revolution in the transfer of knowledge creates new problems of preventing access to the technology required for weapons of mass destruction; and terrorists today can conduct their campaigns on a global horizon, not just on a national stage.

We have sought to give new priority to combating the global concerns of drugs, terrorism and proliferation, and I want to put on record my appreciation of the vigorous and imaginative way in which the three agencies have responded to these fresh priorities. It is of course essential to the continuing success of the agencies' work in these spheres that I cannot disclose to the House their specific successes, of which I know from my own experience. The nature of what they do means that they cannot boast of their achievements if they are to remain effective, but let me assure the House that they have scored real achievements.

The work of the agencies is of major importance in fighting the menace of the drugs trade. The intelligence that they provide to the law enforcement agencies helps us to go further up the supply chain, targeting the barons rather than the underlings. In the past three years, the agencies have contributed to more than £200 million worth of drugs being seized and dozens of criminals being arrested.

The work of the agencies is also crucial in frustrating the ambitions of those regimes that are trying to acquire the technology for nuclear, chemical or biological weapons. Without the intelligence from their monitoring, we would never have the accurate information needed to apply diplomatic pressure or to secure effective international agreement to discourage proliferation; nor would we be able to disrupt covert attempts to acquire such technology. They are also vital to the fight against terrorism. By keeping us alert to the preparations of the terrorists and by helping us to frustrate those preparations, they have saved lives from the hands of the terrorists.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): I thank the Foreign Secretary for giving way. Although none of us would wish to decry the work of any of the three agencies, does he accept that because the Intelligence and Security Committee was set up by the Government and reports to the Prime Minister, it is different from the Select Committees? Does he further accept that Select Committees retain the right to call on any of the agencies that may be concerned specifically with the work of the Intelligence and Security Committee—for example, in respect of drugs, which would concern the Home Affairs Committee? Matters of foreign affairs which are the responsibility of the Foreign Affairs Committee would be another case in point.

Mr. Cook: I would anticipate that the Chairman of the Intelligence and Security Committee might wish to make an observation on that later. However, I would correct the right hon. Member on one point: the Intelligence and Security Committee was set up by Act of Parliament. It is accountable to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and we are laying before Parliament the report that it submitted to him. That is right, and it gives Parliament the proper opportunity to exercise scrutiny.

The involvement of other Select Committees will be a matter for review on an ad hoc, case-by-case basis where it may be appropriate for those Committees to intervene on intelligence matters. However, it does not seem to me that there is much merit in maintaining an Intelligence and Security Committee—with the specific task of building a relationship of trust with the intelligence agencies in order to carry out the job of scrutiny—if the same job is then done by Select Committees. A Select Committee that wished to intervene in those matters must be carrying out a clear and distinct job.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cook: I happily give way to my hon. Friend, who I believe is a member of the Committee.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have listened with great care to my right hon. Friend. Is it not the truth that if the Committee were to be a fully fledged Select Committee, many of the arguments that have taken place would not be necessary in future?

Mr. Cook: Possibly the one that we have just had would not need to take place in future, but I can assure my hon. Friend that there would be many others. I believe that he has not yet commanded a majority on the Committee for his proposal that it should transform itself into a Select Committee. Of course it must be a matter of judgment—ultimately the judgment of Parliament as to whether it wishes to amend the legislation—but I am sure that Parliament would be wise to reflect on whether, in the move to greater openness that would be made with becoming a Select Committee, some of the candour and openness with which the agencies can co-operate with the present Committee would be lost.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose—

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) rose—

Mr. Cook: I shall give way, but at some stage I need to proceed with my speech on the report.

Mr. Winnick: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, in opposition, we made proposals for more openness and voted accordingly? Does he further accept that as long as there is a lack of proper parliamentary accountability, as is the current position, regardless of the existence of the Committee, the controversy will continue in one way or another? The way to resolve it is by allowing the type of scrutiny that we proposed in opposition.

Mr. Cook: We did commit ourselves to more openness, and today's debate is an example of our being more open than any previous Administration. Moreover, our work on accountability for the Secret Intelligence Service shows that we are willing to be more open. As the House will be aware, I have ordered a report to be prepared by historians in response to a parliamentary question on the Zinoviev letter which will put more into the public domain than has yet been revealed.

The current Administration have no need whatever to be apologetic about our record on openness in regard to the intelligence and security services. On the contrary, we have taken steps that no previous Administration have taken, but at the same time we have to be careful that we create mechanisms of scrutiny that will actually work and will not result in the process being so open that the agencies cannot co-operate with them in the same way as they co-operate with the present mechanisms.

So far, I have discussed the work of the three agencies as one single effort. That makes sense because they co-operate fully together, and the intelligence assessments which we see as Ministers can draw on the work of all three agencies. I also wish to give a few examples of their separate work.

The Security Service leads the intelligence war against terrorism related to Northern Ireland. Its work with the police has led directly to the disruption of major terrorist attacks and the arrest and conviction of many terrorists.

Last year, six Provisional IRA members were convicted of planning to blow up six of the main electricity substations feeding London. Had the terrorists succeeded, there would have been immense disruption to the lives and prosperity of the people of London.

Since 1996, the service has supported the law enforcement agencies in the fight against organised crime. That co-operation has already resulted in success. One example is the conviction last year of a major criminal on a firearms offence. The Security Service played a key role in bringing him to justice.

Similarly, GCHQ has given vital support to our military in every crisis since the second world war. That is as true today as it was at the time of the cracking of the Enigma code. We have well over 50,000 troops deployed in more than 20 different operations around the world. Some of them operate in conditions that are anything but safe. The intelligence provided by GCHQ helps them cope with volatile and dangerous circumstances. Our troops in Bosnia, for example, get intelligence from GCHQ that enables them to work more effectively and safely.

GCHQ also has a key defensive role. It is one of the world leaders in developing information technology that is safe from attack. The Government secure intranet launched in April was a good example. So was the GCHQ-designed Brent secure telephone, which is both highly effective and the cheapest totally secure telephone system ever produced. In a world in which information is increasingly the single most important commodity, the ability to protect computers from attack is a fundamental requirement for our national security. The work of GCHQ will help ensure that Britain can go into the information age with confidence and, as a result of current investment, GCHQ will be able to face that future in a modern building on a single site in place of the present two sites.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Cook: I had rather anticipated that the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) would wish to intervene, but I am happy to give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Beith: My hon. Friend hopes to catch your eye, later Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that the Foreign Secretary recognises the force of what the Committee said about how undesirable it is that such an enormous project of tremendous importance to Cheltenham and the surrounding area should have been overseen by no fewer than four different director-generals.

Mr. Cook: I felt that on one arithmetical problem, the Committee slightly overegged it. To be fair, the fourth director was in post for five years, which is a reasonable period. However, I acknowledge that there have been three directors over the past two years. Of course, there is a balance to be struck. It would indeed be desirable that directors should remain at GCHQ for longer. On the other hand, over the past two years the present Government and the previous Administration, who were responsible for the first of those three appointments, have sought to make sure that those appointed as directors were people of the highest calibre and potential. It is a matter of record that people of high potential and high achievement tend to get poached for promoted posts, and the fact that two of those three have departed for posts of permanent secretary is a tribute to their calibre.

I assure the right hon. Gentleman that we will continue to make sure that GCHQ continues to receive top management of the highest calibre; and I hope that we can now have a period of stability to see the project through. The project is not just the work of one man or woman as director. It is the work of a team. Expertise has remained available throughout that period.

GCHQ and the Security Service have been opening up. Both have publicly advertised for recruits and both now have websites. The Security Service has produced a booklet describing its work. However, the third agency—the Secret Intelligence Service—must remain secret. I cannot be as frank with the House about its successes as I have been about those of the other two agencies.

Those who work with SIS overseas often risk their lives so that our lives may be safe. Their effectiveness and their lives depend on their identities and work remaining out of the public eye. Their ability to gather intelligence depends on the confidence that their sources have in the absolute trustworthiness and discretion of the service. Their international links depend on their sister services in other countries knowing that when they hand information to SIS it will remain secure.

For all three agencies to perform their work adequately, they must be adequately financed. The function and structure of the agencies were separately examined in the recent comprehensive spending review. We concluded that there was a real and continuing need for the work of the agencies. If they are to do their job, they must have confidence that they will be resourced to fulfil the tasks that we place on them. I am pleased that the comprehensive spending review has halted the decline in the resources available to the agencies and enabled them to face the future with confidence. That is in contrast to the past five years, during which the budget of the agencies declined by nearly one third.

I particularly welcome the care and attention that the Intelligence and Security Committee has paid to issues of personnel management. All three agencies depend wholly on their staff. For each, their staff are their key asset. When they join they sacrifice some personal freedom. The agencies depend on the loyalty and discretion of their staff. In return, we need to make sure that there are proper arrangements in place to deal with their problems and grievances.

I am glad that the Committee recognised the valuable work done by the staff counsellor. We share the Committee's view that Sir Christopher France has an important role. The Government also share the Committee's anxiety that staff should, as much as possible, enjoy the same rights as other employees, including access to industrial tribunals. As we have already said, we are reviewing whether and how it might be possible to give access to a tribunal for those sensitive cases that are currently excluded from such arrangements.

The Government have already demonstrated their commitment to the rights of the staff who do important national security work. One of our earliest acts was to restore to staff at GCHQ the right to belong to an independent trade union. Three of those who lost their jobs because they refused to lose their union membership are now back at work at GCHQ.

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): Will the Foreign Secretary accept the thanks of all the people of Cheltenham—particularly the 14 who were fired for keeping their trade union membership—for the fact that the Government kept their promise to remove the ban on GCHQ trade unions soon after taking office?

Mr. Winnick: Are the Tories embarrassed?

Mr. Cook: I do not think that my hon. Friend addressed that question to me.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cheltenham for that comment. I know from what the 14 people concerned have said that they appreciate what we have done. As one of them has said, we have righted a wrong that lasted for too long.

The Committee is right to pay attention to personnel management, because this is not just an issue of ensuring that we treat fairly those who are dedicated to the national interest. It is also vital for the security of the agencies that they detect—and when possible resolve—staff dissatisfaction before it leads to disaffection.

At the height of the cold war, a major threat to the security of the agencies was the possibility of the corruption of a member of staff by bribery or blackmail. Although that threat may have receded, a new one has arisen. Today, the extravagant rewards that can be gained from an exclusive deal with a newspaper or book publisher can provide a bigger payout for disloyalty than the KGB ever offered. Moreover, it does not necessarily come with the same insistence on accuracy that the KGB might have required. It therefore remains vital that the agencies be vigilant in recruiting their staff and maintaining the motivation of their officers.

The members of the Committee are familiar with the difficulties caused to SIS and the Security Service by former members of staff who present a cocktail of fact and fiction as a portrait of the work of the services. Considerable investment has been made to reduce the possibility of such cases in future by improving the vetting and recruitment procedures and strengthening the monitoring of staff in post.

The secrecy that is essential to the work of the agencies means that most of our constituents are not aware of their real work. They are left to form their impressions of the three agencies from the word processors of novelists and the cameras of Hollywood. Those impressions are not always entirely accurate. It may be challenging for the Intelligence and Security Committee to correct all those false impressions satisfactorily. Nevertheless, by providing a candid and sober account of the work of the three agencies, the report restores some balance. Our constituents pay for the three agencies. They must have access to an honest explanation of why it is important that their money should be invested in them.

That is why it was right to commit a day of parliamentary time to debating the report of the Intelligence and Security Committee. I commend the work of the Committee to the House and I look forward to working with it to ensure that we get the right balance between operational secrecy and parliamentary scrutiny for these three pillars of our national security.

4.56 pm

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I pay tribute to the men and women who carry out, on behalf of us all, some of the most difficult, delicate and dangerous duties that any servants of the Crown are asked to discharge. I speak as shadow Foreign Secretary, but for four years, as Home Secretary, I had responsibility for the Security Service. In that capacity, I acquired detailed knowledge of the activities in which the personnel of that service engaged, through general briefings and through the ability to follow the course of particular investigations that comes with the duty to authorise warrants. I was left in no doubt about the enormous risks run by those whom we charge with such responsibilities on our behalf. I welcome this opportunity to pay tribute to them and to members of the other agencies for their work.

There can be no doubt about the continuing need for that work. In the introduction to its latest report, the Intelligence and Security Committee refers to the threats to this country and to the peace of the world that have arisen in the aftermath of the cold war. The report asks starkly:

"Was not the Cold War, in its awful way, a form of rigid security system that has now collapsed, and have not new developments and technology and 'globalisation' produced their own dangers?"

Without any trace of nostalgia for the cold war, few, if any, hon. Members would decline to answer that question in the affirmative.

The next paragraph of the report identifies some of the threats, including the enormous increase in the instability of the world and the breakdown of what had previously appeared to be stable sovereign entities into separate states, often riven by ethnic enmities. The consequent need for peacekeeping or humanitarian missions places a premium on the product of intelligence services. The new world order, which was hailed with such optimism just a few short years ago, has since degenerated into a discord of disorder.

Despite welcome developments in Northern Ireland, the threat of terrorist attack remains. Growth in the activities of serious criminal organisations, centred on the drugs menace and associated with large-scale money laundering, has continued apace. Many such organisations have access to resources that dwarf the entire national incomes of many sovereign states. Their sophistication is formidable. The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction poses a danger that we ignore at our peril. The need for this country to have efficient, effective intelligence services at its disposal is as great as ever.

Efficiency and effectiveness can be helped by proper scrutiny arrangements. The increased accountability that such arrangements bring can promote the better working of the agencies as well as, of course, providing all the advantages of greater openness and democratic control. That is why the previous Government introduced arrangements in the Intelligence Services Act 1994 which included the establishment of the Intelligence and Security Committee. Its latest report does much to inform today's debate. I am happy to join the Foreign Secretary in paying tribute to the Committee, and particularly to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), who has chaired it with such distinction since its inception.

The way in which the Committee has discharged its responsibilities in both the previous Parliament and this one has given the lie to the doubts that were expressed by some who now sit on the Government Benches. The present Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, for example, asked in respect of the Intelligence and Security Committee:

"Are not we . . . supporting what is, to all intents and purposes, becoming a charade?"

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) spoke against the presence on the proposed Committee of former Cabinet Ministers. He said:

"Those people will be seen to be against any type of oversight of the security services."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 29 March 1994; c. 267-72.]

I hope that, in winding up the debate, the Home Secretary will acknowledge that those objections were misconceived, and will distance himself from those comments.

That is the background against which we must consider some of the issues raised in the report that are relevant to today's debate. Yet another tragic murder over the weekend, and the acknowledgement of responsibility for it by what might be a new terrorist grouping, reinforce the need for continuing vigilance by the Government as a whole and the security services in particular in respect of events in Northern Ireland. The work that has been done on combating Irish terrorism in recent years has been, in the full and literal sense, absolutely heroic. It must continue; it will not be assisted by the continuing release of those who have been convicted of the most brutal crimes without any decommissioning of paramilitary arms.

The report contains a brief and necessarily curtailed reference to Iraq. Again, events over the weekend underline the importance of continued vigilance. The threat to world peace from Iraq is acute, and we must combat it by all legitimate means at our disposal. The contribution of the security services must continue.

The Committee's programme of work refers to its intention to pursue questions of intelligence policy in relation to recent events in Sierra Leone in the light of the findings of the Legg report. The House will recall the difficulty faced by the Foreign Affairs Committee in trying to question the Foreign Secretary on the subject. At every stage, information had to be squeezed out of Ministers and officials. The process was as prolonged and painful as drawing teeth without an anaesthetic.

The arms-to-Africa affair evolved into a constitutional confrontation between the Executive and Parliament. The Foreign Secretary attempted to put into practice a new constitutional doctrine that, if he orders an internal inquiry, which is held in private, it should take precedence over and, indeed, displace the role of Select Committees. In view of that, will my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater tell the House a little more about the Committee's plans in that regard and what progress, if any, has been made?

One of the most significant changes in recent years in the Security Service has been the additional responsibilities entrusted to it concerning serious organised crime—a change made when I was Home Secretary. I therefore read with particular interest the information in paragraph 17 of the report, and look forward to the results of the further work that the Committee intends to undertake in the area. I hope that the Home Secretary will tell us a little more about the Security Service's work in that area in his winding-up speech. Like the Committee, I very much welcome the new priority given by the Secret Intelligence Service and GCHQ to their work against drug trafficking.

The Committee highlights several other issues in its report. Its recommendations on finances seem very sensible. The new form in which information was presented to the Committee is helpful, and may be helpful to Ministers. I agree, too, that formal provision should be made for the disclosure of information and reporting by the Comptroller and Auditor General to the Committee, in consultation with the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. It would be desirable, where practicable, for the National Audit Office to carry out further value-for-money studies into the agencies' activities. Will the Home Secretary tell us to what extent that has been taken forward since the publication of the Committee's report?

The Committee's recommendations on personnel management issues are especially important. It is clearly crucial, as the Committee said, that every effort should be made "to address and resolve potential disaffection at an early stage."

The Committee makes other recommendations on the subject, of which the most interesting is that employees of the agencies should have access to industrial tribunals. The Government have said that they are examining the proposal. I suspect that it will prove to be necessary for the Secretary of State to retain the power to issue a certificate where necessary to prevent an individual from having access to a tribunal, although it may nevertheless be possible to adapt several of the Committee's recommendations and, indeed, adopt them. I would support such a move. Has any further progress been made in implementing the proposal?

Conservative Members will watch with interest the effect of the Government's decision to restore trade union rights at GCHQ, conscious of the fact that, before the decision to withdraw those rights, 10,000 man days had been lost to strike action. As a result of the previous Government's general trade union reforms, the entire climate of industrial relations in Britain is very different. That difference in climate may well be sufficient to prevent a return of the sad, strike-torn days that led to the ban. I certainly hope so.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I am sure that the shadow Foreign Secretary would not want to mislead the House, but by just giving the figure of 10,000 man days, he has created an entirely sad picture. Will he say how many people work at GCHQ and over what period the days were lost? For instance, we could be talking about 1,000 employees losing only 10 days each—but over what period? It is not good enough to make such a statement without justifying it.

Mr. Howard: I am afraid that I do not share the hon. Gentleman's premise. The 10,000 man days lost through strikes at GCHQ were 10,000 fewer man days devoted to protecting the defences of the country and reinforcing them with valuable intelligence activity. That is the point at issue.

Mr. Winnick: The ban was imposed on 26 January 1984. Is the shadow Foreign Secretary aware that, after the Falklands war, GCHQ employees were greatly praised by the director-general? Does that not show that, once again, GCHQ employees carried out their work properly? Some 18 months after that lavish and justified praise, the ban was imposed. Do the Conservatives plan to restore the ban, should they return to power?

Mr. Howard: There is no inconsistency whatever in the two points to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Of course employees of GCHQ did excellent and important work during the Falklands war. Of course it was right to pay tribute to that work. Of course it was wrong to have 10,000 man days lost through strike action. There is no inconsistency in those propositions.

The one area where the Government appear to differ from the Committee relates to the need for an independent element of scrutiny in reviewing files for destruction. The other recommendations of the Committee in respect of files and personal records have found greater favour with the Government. I have noted the reasoning behind the Government's reply, which is set out in paragraph 16 of their response to the Committee's report.

I have also read the report of the Adjournment debate secured by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) earlier this year, and the Home Secretary's reply to it. In that debate, the Home Secretary delivered a comprehensive snub to the then Minister without Portfolio—now Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—who was reliably reported to have called for the destruction of his own files. In view of that Secretary of State's admitted membership in his youth of the Young Communist League, the House may well consider his call for the destruction of his files a piece of gut-wrenching hypocrisy. I appreciate that a number of my hon. Friends will have views on that proposal, and I want to hear them before coming to a firm view.

The Government are rightly more sympathetic to the Committee's decision to have available some investigative capacity of its own. We look forward to seeing how that matter develops.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask whether the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was informed that an attack was to be made on him before it was done as I believe is usual in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): That is entirely a matter for right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Howard: I am happy to allay the anxieties of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge). I did cause a message to be passed to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make sure that he was fully apprised of the position.

Mr. Robin Cook: The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not tell me.

Mr. Howard: I did not do so because, to the great pleasure of the House, I know that when I oppose the Foreign Secretary across the Table he will be present in the Chamber in his usual place, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to give him notice.

The activities of the intelligence agencies in a democracy must be the subject of proper scrutiny. With the establishment of the Intelligence and Security Committee—and the holding of this debate—that scrutiny has seen significant advances in recent years. Her Majesty's Opposition will play our full part in that scrutiny process in an appropriately responsible way.

5.12 pm

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Whatever our views may be on the operation of the intelligence agencies and of our need to scrutinise them, it is right—I speak on behalf of the Intelligence and Security Committee—to pay tribute to those who work for the Secret Intelligence Service, the Security Service and GCHQ. As a former President of the

[Mr. Tom King]

United States would put it, those people often put themselves in harm's way for our security. I certainly join in the tributes that have been paid to the staff of those agencies by the Foreign Secretary and the shadow Foreign Secretary, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard).

As Chairman of the Intelligence and Security Committee, I welcome this first such debate, which is part of the parliamentary system and part of our parliamentary accountability. The Committee has a different structure. It is not a Select Committee, but a Committee of parliamentarians with responsibility for oversight of the intelligence and security agencies.

I appreciate the presence in the Chamber of the Foreign Secretary and the Home Secretary because, with the exception of the Prime Minister, they are the only people who can answer the debate by virtue of the nature of their responsibilities and the direct responsibility of the intelligence and security agencies to them. Much of their work cannot be delegated to more junior Ministers. Therefore, it is right for the Foreign Secretary and the Home Secretary to be here for the debate.

This is the first such debate, but it is the Committee's third report. However, it is the first report of the new Committee in the new Parliament. I have had the privilege of chairing the Committee throughout its years of existence, and I am grateful that a number of the Committee members were in the previous Parliament, so we have had a continuity of membership. I could not, for political reasons, say that we have had a welcome infusion of new members. However—granted that there would be a change of membership—I am very grateful to the old and new members for the role that they have played in what I am conceited enough to believe has been a successful and effective Committee. I am grateful to the Foreign Secretary and to my right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary for the kind words that they have expressed to me personally and to the Committee.

This is the fullest report that we have produced as a Committee. I should like to express my thanks to our staff—led by Jonathan Allden—for the role that they have played throughout the past year. They have a lonely and independent role, because they are on secondment from the Cabinet Office and owe their allegiance to the Committee, a separate body. It is not the easiest of roles, and I am extremely grateful to them—as are the other Committee members—for the way in which they discharge it.

I owe an apology to the House, and to the wider public, for the content of our report, in the sense that—by nature of the reports that we publish—certain parts become totally unreadable because it is impossible to publish certain matters. The presence of asterisks in the most interesting places is perhaps best exemplified by the financial charts at the end of the report, which I insisted should appear. Someone suggested that we should just publish a summary but, with the support of the Committee, I insisted that the full charts appear.

Although not a single figure appears, the charts illustrate clearly that we had all the figures and the details. That was not the case in the first years of the Committee. It is a further illustration of the extension and evolution of the Committee's role that all those figures are now available. By looking at the headings, hon. Members at least know the subjects that we considered, including details, in terms of the SIS and the Security Service for example, of the payments to agents for information, and the different categories of information that we investigated and examined.

We are grateful in that respect for our relationship with the Comptroller and Auditor General and the National Audit Office. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee—who is in his place—for his Committee's co-operation, and for his support in ensuring that the Intelligence and Security Committee had access to information. We are grateful to him also for encouraging the full co-operation of the Comptroller and Auditor General and the NAO.

In our unanimous report, the Committee referred to a fundamental question, which was addressed by both the Foreign Secretary and the shadow Foreign Secretary: do we need the agencies any more? Is it not true that, for the past 45 years or so, the structure of the agencies has been concentrated on tackling the biggest threat that we faced—the threat of a major world power, in the shape of the Soviet Union, intent on the subversion of the western democracies and posing a threat to our democratic institutions, our existence as a country and the continuity of our alliances?

After the collapse almost overnight, of the Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact, the problems that faced Russia as an independent country caused people to ask whether the threat had ceased to exist and whether we needed the agencies to continue in the same form. Many suggested that the agencies had invented new threats to justify their existence.

The Committee examined those assertions as fully as we could and, as the Foreign Secretary said, the Government considered the matter in the comprehensive spending review, in which we took a close interest and played a part. The Government concluded that expenditure on the agencies should continue to be much the same as before, recognising the fact that new threats had taken the place of old threats.

Probably the biggest threat is the risk of proliferation—a major preoccupation of the SIS—in nuclear, chemical and biological capabilities, especially because missile systems have increasing ranges and may be within the reach of some undesirable and unstable regimes.

The threat posed by the collapse of old structures is most clearly seen in the former Yugoslavia. If we are to play a part in peacekeeping—in Bosnia or in Kosovo—asking British people to go unarmed to monitor difficult situations, the very least we owe them is the best possible intelligence of the dangers that they may face.

I have read only the brief headlines of Sir Michael Rose's account of his time in Sarajevo but, when I was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, he was a brigadier commanding one of the brigades, and I should expect him to confirm that the dangers that he faced in Northern Ireland—during what was, in many respects, a hairy time—were as nothing compared to some of the risks, uncertainties and hazards that arose as a result of the violent and unstable elements in the former Yugoslavia.

The Foreign Secretary rightly paid tribute to the Security Service for its outstanding work in preventing what would have been two significant and hugely damaging IRA attacks in this country. However, the current extent of international terror is a sobering thought. Hon. Members may have read in our report the surprising fact that, on average, every month, there are 60 international terrorist incidents of one sort or another in the world. Those attacks may not impinge on us directly, but British citizens may be affected through hostage taking or other threats to our interests.

The increase in the drug trade and in international crime has been given a nasty new dimension by gangs from Russia, some of which include former KGB members. Their viciousness and their involvement in that nastiest of cocktails—drug trafficking—pose problems of a scale that we have not previously experienced.

Another new development, to which we referred only briefly in our report, is information warfare. Growing public concern about the millennium bug—a self-inflicted injury—has drawn attention to the wider problem. It may seem a harmless accident when a 17-year-old in Ealing hacks into the US Department of Defence computers on nuclear structures, or when innocent people amuse themselves by hacking as a hobby, but such techniques can be used as an instrument of aggressive activity by one nation state against another. That emphasises the importance of GCHQ's advisory role in securing our organisations and information structures against such attacks.

The Committee examined how the agencies allocate effort and decide on their priorities—in general, we supported their decisions. We also consider new issues—for example, what happened in Sierra Leone—as they arise. In that case, we examined the criticisms that were made about the lack of intelligence and the amount of support that was given to our high commissioner in an extremely difficult situation, involving not only the evacuation and safety of British citizens but relationships with outside companies and mercenaries.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe asked me to report on the interest that the Committee has taken in the matter. We have heard from Sir David Spedding, the head of SIS, and we have taken evidence from the chief of defence intelligence. We hope shortly to take evidence from Mr. Penfold, the high commissioner in Sierra Leone, and we shall consider the intelligence aspects of that affair.

Sir Peter Emery: Before my right hon. Friend leaves that subject, will he consider a matter that I do not think has arisen in the work of the Intelligence and Security Committee? Security matters are of considerable importance to the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee, which is responsible for looking at the conduct of the Foreign Office. The Committee, of which I am a member, will hear from the head of MI6 later this month but our invitation to security services involved with the Foreign Office has been declined.

Should not Select Committees be able to co-operate with the intelligence and Security Committee, so that, when a Select Committee is unable to obtain information, the matter could be passed to that Committee with its special relationship with Government? The Intelligence and Security Committee could then report to the Select Committee, so that the Select Committee would not be debarred from information that might be vital to its inquiry.

Mr. King: I shall speak about our role in oversight at the end of my speech; it may be relevant to my right hon. Friend's point.

A matter of particular interest—it has been the focus of the Committee's work this year and previously—is internal security in the agencies. The story has not been entirely happy on either side of the Atlantic. The most spectacular betrayals have been in the US—they led to the betrayal of British agents, too—but, as the Foreign Secretary said, and as the Committee identified, failures in security are no longer a result of ideological commitments. A deep commitment to the communist cause was the background to the famous British traitors and spies of earlier generations. Now, people are more likely to be seeking funds because they have financial or personal problems. The United States has also suffered as a result.

Secrets must be protected within an agency. People who give information to intelligence agencies are risking their lives. They will not do so if they believe that the agencies cannot be trusted not to disclose their name, address or background. One does not have to live in Northern Ireland to know what happens to people who inform. People will not take risks unless they are confident that the information and their identity will be protected. That is why that matter must be taken so seriously.

In some cases, we have lost information and secrets have been divulged—there has been a straight betrayal with the passing of information. People have breached their contracts, and the Official Secrets Act, in return for money. Staff have become disaffected because of grievances of one sort or another. The Foreign Secretary referred to two recent cases. People may, or may not, have been seeking payments from national newspapers for information or hearsay. Some cases have been the result of lax internal discipline and a failure properly to safeguard and classify information. Whatever the reason, all the cases matter.

The Committee has been trying not to chase after individual hares but to consider the fundamental issues that must be tackled. We have been, and will continue to be, critical of the agencies' attention to matters as elementary as personal security, such as random searches of people leaving buildings and ensuring that documents are secure. We have mentioned that problem in three successive reports. The most spectacular and awful CIA traitor carried shopping bags full of documents away, but no one checked or searched him. The result was the destruction—and execution—of the CIA network in the Soviet Union at the time, which endangered the life of Mr. Gordievsky, who was bravely passing on information.

We must not forget personal security and the boring business of continual vigilance, random searches, checking on people's concerns and taking an interest in people's personal circumstances. If an agency employee is divorced or has marital or financial problems, that may be a matter of national security concern. It is a difficult balance to strike. Agency employees are entitled to reasonable personal privacy. We cannot make their lives totally intolerable. With the benefit of hindsight, we can see that incidents in this country and in the United States have shown that someone should have realised that there were problems and identified them. That is why the report deals also with recruitment, as care must be taken to ensure that people are suitable for employment in the agencies in the first place. Employees should be monitored so that stress and personal difficulties can be identified before they pose serious problems. There should be proper counselling.

If all else fails, people should be entitled, as far as possible, to the sort of employment rights that others expect to enjoy. I am glad that the Government have responded positively on that. That is why we recommended the setting up of some form of tribunal to replicate as closely as possible an ordinary industrial tribunal. It might have a lawyer as chairman, with the membership including an employer and a trade union representative. Surely and certainly in this country we can find people patriotic and trustworthy enough to hear any secret that the Committee can hear and deal with it in such a tribunal without prejudicing the information.

The Foreign Secretary and shadow Foreign Secretary mentioned files, but I shall leave that subject to my colleagues, as many have taken an interest in it.

GCHQ has considerable capabilities and it is no secret that they have increased substantially. New challenges exist, since new technology is also available to some pretty nasty and dangerous people, not least drug traffickers and some of the big new organised criminal gangs. GCHQ must have accountability structures that ensure that systems authorising the proper interception of communications match up to the new challenges. We must also ensure that the privacy of the individual, to which all law-abiding citizens are entitled, is properly protected.

GCHQ is a massive organisation with extremely sophisticated equipment. It has to operate 24 hours a day, seven days a week without a second of interruption. That is the nature of its undertaking. However, it is planning to move, and not all transfers of public or even Government activities have been a seamless robe. The organisational challenge of the GCHQ move is massive, as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has pointed out, and the Committee makes no apology for drawing the Government's attention to that fact.

Oversight has been a process of evolution. The Committee is a strange animal—like no other Committee in the House. It is a Committee of parliamentarians, but we report not to Parliament but to the Prime Minister, who tables our annual report for debate here. We are not a Select Committee and we have our origins in the Intelligence Services Act 1994. The Committee was established at the same time as it was first admitted we had the Secret Intelligence Service, and the SIS and GCHQ were given a statutory basis, barely four years ago, which seems incredible when one looks back through the history of the CIA's activities.

The two agencies came in from the cold. They were perhaps fearful that parliamentarians might not be entirely reliable: that they would become caught up in party political warfare or point scoring between Members of Parliament and that secrets would leak out. Committee members realised that, whenever a Bill is enacted, the legal arrangements set out therein are only the bare bones on which one has to build. We have taken the trouble to study other oversight bodies. The American system is massive. The Inspector General of the CIA has a staff of 140. Its former director, Jim Woolsey, told me that, during his three years in office, there was not one day when he did not have to give evidence on Capitol hill to one committee or another. We did not want to follow the model of oversight on that scale.

One or two countries are still managing to proceed heroically with no oversight whatever: one of them is not far from the channel tunnel; but I understand that it is considering the matter at present. Others set up oversight committees to which they appointed all the difficult squad who had made speeches about intelligence agencies and did not believe in them in the first place. The intelligence agencies made jolly sure that they told those people nothing, so there was inadequate oversight and open warfare.

We have recognised that we work within the ring of secrecy. We inevitably, have, a close relationship with the agencies, and I hope that we have established a measure of mutual respect, but not a cosy relationship, as that would prevent us from doing our job. We expect to be told everything and to have every question answered unless there are clear and obvious reasons—of national security or secrecy, as narrowly defined as they can possibly be—why such information should not be made available.

We do not expect the agencies to hide behind a narrow interpretation of the law, because to do our job we need the clearest possible picture. We try to ask only what is relevant to our purposes, and I believe that we have succeeded in ensuring that the information is kept secret. We have sought not to destroy or undermine the agencies but to ensure, in their own best interests, that their performance at all times matches the standards that the public expect of them.

The public often see the agencies as sinister bodies that are out of sight and out of ministerial control, operating in a world of their own. Public support can be fragile: on the occasions that the Foreign Secretary mentioned, there were banner headlines thanking God for our security services, and people were full of praise, but when something goes wrong and there is an allegation of a mistake, misunderstanding or compromise involving the agencies, people are quick to believe the worst.

Our job is to try to bring some balance and ensure that we can investigate when there are serious grounds for public concern. That is why we have proposed an investigative arm: in certain circumstances, we need the ability to verify. When a situation arises that gives serious cause for public concern, the public often react to a statement by the head of an agency by saying, "He would say that, wouldn't he?", and if Ministers merely repeat an assertion from an agency head whom the public suspect of putting his agency's interests first and defending its position, the necessary public reassurance is lacking.

We shall not be able to help matters unless we can say that we have investigated the allegations, with full access to all the relevant information, and that we are satisfied either that a charge needs to be answered or that the charge is merely malicious and unfounded. Then we can speak with the unanimous, all-party voice of our Committee, which will carry the authority that the agencies are entitled to expect.

I am grateful for the Government's positive response. We shall see how we go, because I well understand the nervousness and uncertainties, but I believe that an investigative arm is the correct next step in the development of oversight. It will be good for the agencies and attract public support and give our reports the authority that they need to meet any circumstances that may arise.

Oversight is the heart of our work. We need to have appropriate openness and oversight of a world of activity that is necessarily secret and essential to our country's ultimate security. We have made a start down that road; I do not pretend that we have reached the end of it. That is the sensible way of proceeding, and I believe that the existence of the Committee and its successive reports will create some public confidence and awareness that there is accountability in the agencies, that they serve our country well and that the systems under which they operate are appropriate to their activity.

5.45 pm

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On behalf of all the Committee members, I pay tribute to the Chairman for his extremely hard work. His knowledge of the ins and outs of Whitehall has been invaluable in achieving what we all regard as an evolutionary process. I know that he would confess that, on occasion, he has been a little irritated with me when I have wanted to proceed a bit more quickly with that evolutionary process than was possible under the previous Government;, but now we are moving apace. Members of the Committee are unanimous in their desire to make progress on oversight.

Some of us—although not the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or the Minister for Defence Procurement—who served on the Intelligence Services Bill when it was outed are present today; the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, who is here, was then one of the Foreign Office Ministers responsible for the legislation. The Government of that time were very brave in outing the security service with the Security Service Act 1989 and then the Intelligence Services Act 1994, but they were a little hostile to some of our suggestions.

Some of my hon. Friends may be anxious to reproduce some of the words that I uttered in 1994 promoting the idea of a Select Committee; perhaps I can pre-empt them by drawing attention to the fact that the Government accepted only one of dozens of amendments, if not more than 100, that I tabled on behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition of the day. That amendment increased the Committee from six to nine, which was a very wise step. The easiest way to describe the rest of my experience is that it was like running up against a brick wall.

The Government of the day were determined to move. I remember speaking to a senior member of MI6. I said, "I suppose you wrote this Bill, Sir Colin." He replied, "No, I didn't write it, but I did give a job description." That was the extent to which the agencies co-operated. It is important to remember that the agencies wanted a system of oversight, and co-operated in developing it. That was as far as we could go in those days. Since then, a critical development has been not only that the agencies trust the Committee, but that we are beginning, in some ways, to trust them.

We must also have the trust of our parliamentary colleagues, because without it we cannot properly oversee the agencies. At the press conference last week, a gentleman from the press asked whether we regarded ourselves as poodles of the agencies. I jumped in, with my big mouth, and said, "Yes." Everybody clapped and reported my comments, but they did not say that I added that we could be regarded as poodles if the present system continued.

One of my colleagues answered the question by saying that he was nobody's poodle, but he could have added that, under the present system, nobody would know whether we were poodles, because we get only the information that the agencies want to give us. We have a question and answer system, and we can investigate, but if the agencies hide behind reasons of national security or the risk of endangering the lives of agents in operations, we have to accept that and go no further. In that sense, we cannot perform our task of oversight properly, but the system is evolving and slowly moving forward.

As the Chairman of the Committee has said, one of the most important aspects of the report is the Committee's realisation that it is necessary to extend our powers, within the parameters of the present Act and the ring of secrecy, to include an investigative arm. We must develop that aspect of our work, but it is not intended that every member of the Committee should charge into MI5, MI6 and GCHQ and demand to see the books and lists of agents.

One suggestion is that the Committee should use someone who operates, or has operated, within the ring of secrecy to act on the Committee's behalf. That would protect the secrecy that the agencies require to carry out their work, but the Committee could be confident in its conclusions if, for example, any allegations were made about an agency's conduct.

Fellow parliamentarians should not think that we do not have heated debates on these contentious issues. We have long and difficult discussions on how the Committee's role should develop. We have had strong debates on the possible adoption of a Select Committee style for our proceedings.

The right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery), who intervened at some length, is not in his seat now, but I can tell him that we have examined whether the Committee impinged on the functions of the Foreign Affairs Committee over the issue of Sierra Leone. All we are interested in is whether the intelligence systems worked. The Committee is not concerned about the politics of the incident, but we want to discover whether the Foreign Secretary, the High Commissioner and the other politicians involved were in receipt of fresh intelligence at the critical times.

There is obviously an interface between our role and the role of the Home Affairs Committee, which has a general responsibility in the area of crime. The previous Home Secretary asked the Home Affairs Committee to consider whether MI5 should be involved in the investigation of serious and organised crime, and it concluded that the police should be the body that investigated crime. However, MI5, with its peculiar talents and abilities which are not available in the police force, should be available to help.

If we cannot harness every aspect of the state against drug traffickers and other evildoers, what hope is there for our communities? Some have suggested that there is jealousy between different Committees, but I say that we must work together. The virtue of using MI5 in the investigation of serious and organised crime is that it has abilities and qualities that allow it to take a long-term view. It does not have to bring the criminals to account and follow them through the judicial process, because that is the responsibility of the police and others, such as Customs and Excise. For the Committee to do its job properly, it must evolve slowly along those lines.

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): The hon. Gentleman kindly referred to my involvement in the original creation of the Committee. Now that I am not fettered by ministerial shackles, I can say that it was always my understanding that the Committee would develop and grow into the job. I strongly support the Committee's proposals for an investigative power, but does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the example he just gave of the overlap between the Committee's responsibilities and those of the Home Affairs Committee clearly demonstrates the specific powers that his Committee already has? That shows the experiment's worth.

Mr. Rogers: I wish that the right hon. Gentleman had been a little more positive back in 1994 and given us the benefit of his wisdom during the passage of the Act, because we have lost four or five years; but I accept his conversion with good grace.

The right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Sir A. Hamilton) is not in his seat—although I think he poked his head in a little earlier—but I recall his arguments early in the Committee's life about whether intelligence should be a free good. [Interruption.] I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman, who is present after all.

I was impressed when I first joined the Committee by the range of the work that the intelligence agencies undertook, which is used by other Government Departments in pursuit of their functions. The right hon. Gentleman rightly asked whether such work could be done by other people more efficiently, and we had lengthy debates about the issue. I pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues, some of whom have lost their seats, for the work they did.

The Committee started from scratch, and even now is still involved in a learning process. Our work load is so heavy that we have had to divide the responsibilities. I know that other colleagues will speak about specific issues, but I wish to make the point about the Committee's evolution because I have been involved from the beginning. I have been especially concerned about changes in priorities, given recent geopolitical changes.

The development of new priorities, and a change of emphasis in the work of the Committee since the end of the cold war, has made it content that the agencies should operate within the general parameters of the law with proper accountability and warranting. During our discussions in the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, in which we had considerable help from John Wadham and Liberty, we covered the peculiar area of warranting. We considered actions that might be illegal and for which, in certain circumstances, a warrant might be required. The Committee was satisfied by its dealing with the heads of the services that the agencies act circumspectly in those circumstances.

My final point concerns defectors and dissatisfied people, a matter of long discussion in the Committee, to which I am sure some of my colleagues will wish to refer. The Foreign Secretary and the Chairman of the Committee were quite right to emphasise that chequebook treason—there are no other words for it—is prevalent today.

One person wrote to a newspaper to say that we had not sought to protect whistleblowers, like himself, who spoke out in the public interest. I am wary of those who claim to be whistleblowers in the public interest, but who accept £80,000 or £100,000 or a contract to write a book. If they are speaking in the public interest, let them not go into the marketplace to sell their souls and their country's secrets for money.

If the individual to whom I have referred had wanted to speak purely for the love of country, there are mechanisms by which he could have done so. I accept that the mechanisms are not perfect, and the Committee has considered that point. We have suggested industrial tribunals. Perhaps the Home Secretary would consider the whole structure of the security commissioner and the bodies that exist in this area. Perhaps they need modernisation to meet changing aspects of chequebook treason. We must bring the mechanisms up to date. If people want to act in the public interest, they need not accept money for it.

It will not always be possible to prevent treachery or betrayal of national security. It will not always be possible to prevent jeopardising the lives of colleagues, agents who are operating in dangerous situations. The Committee's responsibility is to set up systems to allow people to have, for whatever reason—a defect in their personalities, perhaps, or simply the fact that they cannot cope with the job into which they have been recruited—a sympathetic hearing outside the agency. That would allow them to feel that they could do something. If we can set up such systems, we shall have a better overall system of oversight and accountability.

6.2 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I join other speakers in paying tribute to the work of the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), the Chairman of the Committee, and to the staff of the agencies for their work. Some of that work is courageous, and some shows outstanding skill and dedication. Much is extremely valuable, done with commitment to the welfare of the whole community, and often with a full awareness of values that matter to me, such as civil rights and liberty. Many employees of the agencies are fully aware of those values, which form a part of their own thinking.

There is no doubt about the need for and the value of intelligence, if it is well used. I say, "well used", because an awful lot of money and intelligence has been wasted over the years. One need think only of the years running up to the Falklands war to realise that effort can be wasted and intelligence not properly used. If used properly, intelligence saves lives, prevents acts of war or terrorism and arms us against the dangers of those acts. It helps us to catch highly dangerous terrorists and criminals. It can prevent costly errors.

Threats continue, even though the cold war is over. Espionage continues among those who have traditionally practised it—including Russia. Instability in parts of the former Soviet Union is worrying. A proliferation of nuclear and biological capacity has resulted partly from the break-up of the Soviet Union, and partly for other reasons. British troops find themselves in extremely dangerous situations, in which they deserve intelligence support. Drugs and crime on an international scale are issues on which the agencies can make a valuable contribution, although they are not the bodies primarily responsible for dealing with those problems. The threats of information warfare are serious. There is always a continuing threat of betrayal of our defensive capacity.

To Liberal Democrats, the world of intelligence is by nature both important and challenging. Intelligence protects civil rights about which we care. It also impinges seriously on those rights, using methods that deny some element of civil rights such as invasion of privacy. It permits Governments to undertake actions and policies without public knowledge. It may allow actions to be taken which, if widely known and discussed, would not have public approval.

Secrecy can allow agencies to pursue their own agendas independently of Government, perhaps because of excess of zeal or because of partisanship within an organisation—the charge levelled against MI5 during the Peter Wright controversy. MI5 has a legal position different from that of other agencies, because it is not merely tasked, but makes its own judgments about what the threats to the state are.

Most of the charges were based on a much more heavy-handed approach to matters of domestic subversion than is contemplated nowadays. They are part of history more than of the present, as the law specifically precludes the agency from acting in the furtherance of the interests of any political party. The situation has changed significantly since those allegations were made, although the possibility exists nevertheless.

In secret, inefficiency can flourish and resources can be wasted. We must find a way to scrutinise the service without destroying secrecy. That is difficult. In some areas of operation, to disclose the existence of an activity is to make that activity's continuance impossible. I do not see why an individual whistleblower or a member of a committee should take it upon himself or herself to decide that an activity is unacceptable and should be ended, and to make an announcement or put a story in a newspaper. Such a decision must be taken by more than one person, and we need a means at every level by which actions may be tested by a range of people with possibly differing opinions. Our current mechanism is a genuine and valuable attempt at that.

While on the subject of secrecy, I want to ask one question. Is there an unnecessary culture of secrecy, and does the secrecy go too far? Certainly, that has been so in the past. The existence of the agencies was once denied, as other hon. Members have said. While we pretended that we did not have an intelligence service, the Russians knew perfectly well that we did, and they knew all its principal managers, too. People wrote books about the agencies. There were factual books and fiction: often there was more fact in the fiction, mainly because some of it was written by ex-employees of the agencies. It was absurd that we pretended that these organisations did not exist.

The culture has changed, partly under the impetus of cases and anticipated cases under the European convention on human rights. It is welcome that we now recognise the existence of the agencies, and that they must be scrutinised, but the Committee had to show that it can be taken into the agencies' confidence. The Committee has shown that it does not leak. Former members of agency staff, and even ex-Ministers, have done more to leak the work of the agencies than anything done by the Committee.

The culture of secrecy owes more to a desire to protect sources in dangerous circumstances than it does to an instinctive wish not to have people knowing about the agencies' work. The idea that, "Your identity is safe with the British," is a valuable byword in the difficult world of intelligence gathering. The Ames case, in which many American agents were compromised and met an awful fate—thankfully, no British agents did—explains the obsession with secrecy that sometimes goes beyond what most would think sensible. It is a way of communicating to those who might help this country, in dangerous situations, that their secret is safe with us. One can understand that, but it cannot be an absolute bar to mechanisms of effective scrutiny, or to the public knowing things that it is reasonable they should know.

Is the present formula right, of a Committee of parliamentarians within the ring of secrecy reporting to Parliament through the Prime Minister? We have always advocated a specially chosen parliamentary Select Committee, possibly a Joint Committee of both Houses. The present Committee is a Joint Committee with only one representative from the upper House.

It remains our objective to obtain a body that is a Select Committee of this House, but it can never be the same as other Select Committees. I have advocated that for many years, first in a lecture in 1968. I took part in debates, and introduced motions, in favour of some such committee structure in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s. The Liberal-Social Democratic party alliance tabled an Opposition day motion in favour of such a committee in 1986. It took an awful long time to get to where we are. In 1986, I said that existing Select Committees

"clearly cannot be the exact model for a body that must operate in a much more restricted way."—[Official Report, 3 December 1986; Vol. 106, c. 985.]

If we moved immediately to a Select Committee, what advantage would we gain? The main issues are direct reporting to Parliament and the ability to call for persons and papers. If it was a Select Committee that reported directly to Parliament, I do not think that there would be a significant difference from what happens now.

The Committee's reports come before Parliament formally with deletions. Such deletions would have to be made by some mechanism, even if they did not go through the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is forced to pay attention to the parts of the report that are not published as well as to those that are. It is open to the Committee to report to the Prime Minister on an issue on which it cannot report to Parliament at all, because every aspect of it requires the protection of secrecy.

I am not sure that any great gain would be made in respect of reporting to Parliament, but what about the power over persons and papers? If a Select Committee was carrying out the role, the same arguments that confront many such Committees would be encountered, but more often. The authorities would have recourse to the argument that something was "advice to Ministers" or that there were "operational reasons". One or other would be used frequently.

The mechanism suggested in the report, adding an investigative capacity to the existing Committee, is likely to take us further forward, at least in the short term, than an immediate move to a Select Committee. Indeed, I think that we would take a step backwards in the short term if we were to move to one now.

I say that without prejudice to the possibilities of getting to that destination in future. The confidence that has been built; the fact that we do not need a legislative change—or even a change to the House's Standing Orders—to take the steps advocated in the report; and the Government's favourable response lead me to believe that, if the objective is immediately to get more effective scrutiny, we will serve it better if we get on with that task now and leave the Select Committee issue for a later date.

The investigative capacity is important, because it is not possible to deny some of the assertions put to the Committee, or give firm reassurance that all is well on some matters, without being able to check the papers fully. Such a capacity is not foreign to our system. The commissioners who review the carrying out and issuing of warrants for interception have such a capacity. It has caused no problems. They make judgments based on careful review of the detailed papers. There are no barriers to their examining papers, and one has greater confidence in their judgment because of it.

I shall briefly consider Government communications headquarters at Cheltenham, though my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) will understandably seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, not least because many of his constituents are employed there.

GCHQ is an important place for Cheltenham. I hope that it can stay there, where it has such strong community support and is closer to the homes of the thousands who work there than any other site would be. I share my hon. Friend's welcome for the Government's reversal of the ban on trade unions. The ban put GCHQ on the front pages of newspapers all over the world—not a sensible thing to do with a sensitive institution that likes to get on with its work with the minimum of publicity. The decision backfired dreadfully on the Government who took it, and on the country's interests.

I intervened on the Foreign Secretary to point out that it is ludicrous that, at the time of the biggest ever GCHQ investment decision, there were four directors. None was removed for incompetence—they retired or were promoted. What business, confronted with such a major investment, would do that at such a stage? That suggests to me that the Government's promotion policy, of grabbing whoever it can for whatever job, without regard to the institutions they are managing, is not sensible.

On warrants, I remain of the view that giving authority for interception of communications and intrusion into people's property and private lives should be a task for a judicial or independent body, not a Minister. The sanction for such intrusion is more appropriately given by someone who is not part of the Executive and does not have Executive responsibility. We have accepted that principle, and fought for it, in respect of the use of such powers by the police. In the closing days of the previous Parliament, a fierce battle took place. My right hon. and hon. Friends in both Houses can claim credit for insisting on a judicial form of examination of authority for warrants for such intrusions.

The long-established system for the Security Service and the intelligence service is that Secretaries of State give the permission. I know what care they attach to that, how they examine cases individually and do not delegate. The Committee examined them very thoroughly on the matter. However, the final process of approval should have an independent judicial element: a review not merely of the process as a whole, as happens now, but of the decisions when they are made. That is the practice in many other countries.

I have two concerns on files. First, there should be more protection for individuals on whom files may be held. The Committee says in its report that it wishes to do more work on that. It is a serious matter, but I hope that concern will be less fevered, because there is no longer a practice or policy in the Security Service of investigating broadly political subversion as it was viewed in earlier decades, when persons present became the subject of files. Nevertheless, it is a matter of such importance that we should seek ways of getting more protection.

Secondly, the Government are plain wrong in their response to the proposal for independent review of files that are to be destroyed. They are records of how the service operated, and may have individual liberty implications. In their otherwise constructive response to the Committee's report, the Government state:

"the Government does not believe that the process of reviewing files for destruction would be assisted by independent scrutiny."

Their argument is that it would not be appropriate because

"it would involve second guessing decisions that the Service is required to make".

That is not true. It is not second-guessing the service's operational decisions but deciding whether a file on a decision that the service made years ago should continue to exist, the service having decided that it has no further need of it. That is not second guessing, but a decision about an historical record which should be independently taken. The danger is that the service could, knowingly or unknowingly, destroy evidence that would demonstrate both the good and the bad things about its previous work, which would be wrong.

I draw my final comment from the report of a royal commission set up in Canada, which published a report in 1981 on "Freedom and Security under the Law", setting out the principles that should govern the Canadian security service. Four of the five principles that it set out were that the rule of law must be paramount; that the means of investigation must be proportionate to the gravity of the threat; that the need for investigative techniques must be weighed against the damage that they might do to personal freedom and privacy; and that, the more intrusive the technique, the higher should be the authority to authorise its use. Those are good principles. By and large, they are practised in our three agencies, but they could be written in larger and brighter letters, or incorporated into the agencies' mission statements.

The use of intrusive methods should be limited to special or overriding circumstances. The carrying out of operations of which only a few people are aware can be justified only in exceptional circumstances. The mechanisms by which those matters are examined should be equal to the difficult task, in terms of both oversight and how the Executive handles them. Such principles could usefully be added to the vocabulary of statements that govern our services. The rule of law should be paramount; the means should be proportional to the gravity of the threat; we should weigh the techniques that we use against the damage that they might do to freedom and privacy; and, the more intrusive the technique, the more carefully it should be scrutinised.

6.21 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I welcome this debate, which is another small step towards rendering our intelligence and security services democratically accountable, and I look forward to its becoming an annual event. I also welcome the gradual removal of some of the unnecessary mystery that has surrounded those organisations in the past, particularly the detailed statement on 29 July by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on the number and status of the files held by the Security Service. One must pinch oneself to recall that my right hon. Friend was once identified as a potential subversive and was once, as the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) said, the subject of such a file. It must be satisfying now to find himself in charge of the Security Service—a responsibility that he takes very seriously.

I welcome the latest report from the Intelligence and Security Committee. It is a serious piece of work. May I make it clear that, although I am critical of the mechanism by which the security and intelligence services are accountable, nothing that I say should be read as a criticism of the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and hon. Members on the committee, who were obviously working conscientiously within the powers available to them. People who serve on such committees sometimes have the distressing tendency to go native after a while. Parliament should be constantly on the alert for symptoms. I have been listening carefully to this afternoon's debate, in which one or two speeches occasionally strayed a little close to going native, but nobody could actually be accused of it thus far.

Today I shall address only one issue: whether the existing arrangements are the appropriate mechanism for rendering the security and intelligence services accountable in a mature democracy. For the avoidance of doubt, let me say at the outset that, provided that they are properly managed and accountable, the intelligence and security services have an important and legitimate function in a democracy. The difficulty has been that, until the advent of the ISC, no one outside the services had a clue as to whether they were properly managed. To put it mildly, such snippets of evidence as emerged from time to time did not inspire confidence. Political oversight was always a fiction in the past. It was always ludicrous to imagine that, with the best will in the world, the Home Secretary or Foreign Secretary, let alone the Prime Minister, had time to take a close interest in what the agencies got up to.

For the purposes of today's argument, however, I am prepared to accept that MI5, at least, has cleaned up its act in recent years. Some time ago, a former Conservative Home Secretary remarked to me that a great deal of dead wood had been cleared out since the scandals of the 1970s and early 1980s. I was glad to hear that because there was certainly no shortage of dead wood. I am less sure about MI6. I may be wrong and I make no allegations, but it is hard to believe that MI6 had no hand in reinstating the regime in Sierra Leone, which is now busily murdering its enemies. If I am right, one cannot help wondering who authorised it, as it does not seem to have been the Foreign Secretary.

If the public are to have confidence in the security services, it is important first to be certain that they are protecting democracy rather than attempting to subvert it, as they have done in the past. Secondly, we must be confident that we are getting value for the considerable sum—currently some £700 million; I hope that no more is hidden away in other budgets—that taxpayers contribute to the upkeep of the Security Service. We want reassurance that that expenditure is all strictly necessary, especially given that the cold war has ended and, with it, a considerable part of the services' reasons for existence.

It was an unlucky coincidence that, just as the Berlin wall fell, both the Secret Intelligence Service and the Security Service moved into lavish new headquarters on either side of the River Thames. Furthermore, if the war in Ireland is over—I appreciate that it is much too early to say yet—another large part of their work load will disappear. In such circumstances, there should be scope for a little downsizing, to use a phrase that is popular in the City of London.

I am glad to see from figures published in the report that some savings have already been made. There is always the danger that the agencies will invent new tasks, or expand into areas into which they should not expand, in order to make work for otherwise idle hands.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend has made some fairly sweeping statements without giving illustrations. Would he care to give us some to support his generalisations?

Mr. Mullin: I am not sure what my hon. Friend is referring to, but if it is expansion into other areas, I suppose that one possibility is expansion into serious crime. It only requires vigilance; I am not making a big deal of it. In 1996, I served on the Committee that considered that authorised that expansion, and the authorisation was very general. The crime that the service was, in theory, allowed to become involved in investigating was not all that serious, but I am sure that what it actually investigates is, and that the number of officials involved is relatively small.

Mr. Rogers rose—

Mr. Mullin: I am sorry, but other hon. Members want to speak this afternoon. My hon. Friend asked me to offer an illustration. My response is simply to say that the authorisation in the Bill was a little general.

Public confidence requires rigorous scrutiny, and it is Parliament's job to provide it. The question is: do we have it? As I have made clear, I do not wish to cast aspersions on the right hon. Member for Bridgwater and his colleagues, who are doing as good a job as we could hope for with the powers that they have been given. However, are those powers adequate, and is the relationship with the agencies correct? Reading between the lines of the ISC's report, and having listened to what the right hon. Member for Bridgwater said, I see that the Committee itself appears to have doubts. For example, at paragraph 58, it says that it cannot express a view on the effectiveness of the commissioners and tribunals

"since we have not had access to the material to enable any judgment to be made."

At paragraph 65, the Committee says that it has not yet formed a view on whether its existing status is adequate. I was glad to note that, in a section headed "Further evolution of the UK oversight structure", the possibility of changing the Committee's remit in due course was left open.

I welcome all that. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), said, it is an evolutionary process, and we are all learning as we go along. For what it is worth, it is my firm view that the Committee's existing powers are inadequate. It is a fundamental principle in a democracy that those who spend public money and exercise power should account to an elected Parliament. The Select Committee system ensures that the work of every Department is scrutinised by Members of Parliament, who are, in theory at least, appointed by Parliament, and can be removed only by Parliament. Each Committee employs its own staff, and each has the power to summon people and papers as it sees fit. Although that power rarely needs to be used, it defines the relationship between a Committee and the Department whose activities it is responsible for scrutinising.

The relationship between the Intelligence and Security Committee and those whom it is supposed to scrutinise is entirely different. First, this Committee's members are appointed not by Parliament but by the Prime Minister, who can remove or fail to reappoint them as he sees fit. Secondly, it does not employ staff of its own, but it is serviced entirely by officials in the employ of the Government. Thirdly, it has no power to summon people or papers; it must take what it is given. How can there be effective scrutiny when the body that it supposed to be the subject of such scrutiny can ultimately decide what will and what will not be disclosed?

I realise that some will protest—indeed, I have heard several people say this during the debate—that everything is working smoothly so far. That may well be so, but the new arrangements have never really been tested. We have not yet experienced a crisis: we have not had a Zinoviev letter, an operation Clockwork Orange, a "Spycatcher" or a miners' strike. In any event, we may have to wait for years before some disaffected ex-employee of one of the agencies reveals that things were not going quite as smoothly as we all thought at the time.

It is essential to get the mechanism right at the outset. After that, everything else will fall into place. I firmly believe that the ISC should be a Committee of Parliament, appointed by Parliament, with the same powers and facilities as a Select Committee. That is the only way to create public confidence in the integrity of the security services. When the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed asked what the Committee needed, one thing that he did not mention was public confidence. I am referring not just to what is actually happening, but to its perception in the world outside. I do not think that the importance of that should be overlooked. There would, of course, have to be special arrangements recognising the need for secrecy and security, but that is not an insuperable problem, and should not be used as an excuse for doing nothing.

I might add—others have mentioned this—that, until not so long ago, my view was the official Labour party view. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), I was a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill that became the Intelligence Services Act 1994, which set up the ISC. I vividly recall that, at that time, the position of our Front Benchers was that oversight of the security services should be the responsibility of a parliamentary Committee. I have a list of quotations from Labour spokesmen, some of whom are now senior members of the Government, espousing exactly the view that I am now advancing. I shall not embarrass anyone by reading out those quotations, although I am tempted to do so; but let it not be said that my view is held only by a small minority of extremists.

My point—and it is a matter of record—is that the security services have run rings around all previous Labour Governments. Past Labour—and, for all I know, Conservative—Home Secretaries, Foreign Secretaries and Prime Ministers have been systematically misled, and even spied on, by the very agencies of which they were supposed to be in charge. I do not allege that that is happening now, but the only way to be sure that it never happens again is to set up an effective system of parliamentary accountability—and that we do not yet have. Such a system is also in the interests of the security services, which will never entirely enjoy public confidence until they are properly accountable. If they are wise, they will not stand in the way of proper accountability.

As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is aware, the Home Affairs Committee has long taken an interest in the matter. Our first report on the accountability of the security services was published four years ago, under a previous management. In this Parliament, we have raised the matter with my right hon. Friend several times, and I am grateful to him for not ruling out the possibility of change. I urge him to keep the door open, for the issue will not go away for as long as the present inadequate arrangements obtain. I realise that the Government have other priorities for the time being; I only hope that we will not wait until some future scandal makes change inevitable.

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): I, too, praise the agencies that the ISC oversees. They have done a great deal in the past to defend the country's freedoms and civil rights, and, no doubt, will have to do the same job equally effectively in the future.

I did not intend to comment specifically on the committee's work, but I want to respond to what was said by the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee. I have considerable respect for him, but in this instance I think that he is wrong. I was one of the Ministers who brought the committee into being when the Bill that became the 1994 Act was going through its stages, I have been a customer of the agencies in the past, as a Minister, and—somewhat unusually—I have even appeared before the Committee. I can testify that it was not a comfortable or an easy process, but a process that demonstrated that the Committee was after the truth, and, in the widest sense, concerned with the country's interests.

I am very much in favour of what has happened so far. I compliment the Committee on its operations and, in particular, the effectiveness of its Chairman, my right hon.

Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), during its first four years. I support the arguments put by my right hon. Friend and the Committee's members, including the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), recommending the committee's development through its investigative capability. I feel that such progress would have no down side and a considerable up side, and would add to a public confidence that is already well established.

What I want to say is narrow in scope. It relates principally to points raised about the National Audit Office and its actions in support of the Committee. As such, it will be dull in comparison with the Hollywood, not to say James Bond, references of the Foreign Secretary—although, by the standards of the auditing profession, it will be unbearably exciting.

On page 10 of its report, in paragraph 21, the Committee says:

"We were told . . . that no value for money project work in respect of the Agencies had been carried out over the past few years".

That, although accurate, gives a slightly unfair impression. The financial audit of what are, effectively, the public accounts of the agencies dates back only to 1995, and it is the financial audit that often provides the understanding, insight and, indeed, intelligence to make a good value-for-money exercise possible. It takes a little while for that to develop. There is also a problem of limitations on capacity to which I shall return shortly.

On page 11, in paragraph 23, the Committee says—and I wholeheartedly agree—that "there should be a specific obligation on the Agencies to inform the NAO"—

the National Audit Office—

"of material items of expenditure";

and that

"the arrangements for the disclosure of information by SIS, approved by the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, should be brought as far as possible into line with those of the Security Service, specifically in providing for the C&AG to be given the reasons for any refusal to provide him with information".

I consider that a wise proposal. Although it is pretty technical at this stage, because there has been no such occurrence, it will be useful in the future.

In the same paragraph, the committee states that "in view of our own statutory responsibility to examine the Agencies' expenditure, formal provision should also be made for the disclosure of information and reports by the C&AG to this Committee, in consultation with the Chairman of the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee."

The Government accepted that, and I agree entirely with their proposal. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater has said, we have had informal discussions on the matter.

We should not, however, have too high expectations of value-for-money studies. In intelligence and security matters, value for money is no magic wand. Normally, it depends on a determination of whether the maximum value has been obtained for the minimum cost. That means that we have to assess the value of what is produced. The "value" half of the equation is difficult to assess with intelligence and security. It is rather like research and development. Once, when I worked in that sector, I was told that some hits justify a lot of misses. The same rule applies here.

What is more, the value of the information, even with a hit, is difficult to assess—even more difficult than in commerce. Take the example even of the apparently hard technical data that the agencies sometimes bring up. We know—certainly my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater will know from previous experience—that, on occasion, we can demonstrate the saving of hundreds, even thousands, of lives in wars in living memory; so clearly value has been obtained there, value beyond price, but with narrow exceptions, even that sort of technical data depends on information about intentions or deployment.

I pose a hypothetical example to demonstrate my case. Let us imagine that the agencies find that a foreign power has a nuclear, biological or chemical missile system that is capable of attacking a British city. If we determine that there is an intention to use or to deploy it as a threat, that information is invaluable—again, valuable beyond price because it will save thousands or millions of lives—but if there is no intention to deploy or no clash of interest, it is interesting to us, but of little national value.

In these days of military stretch, decisions on soft data are necessary. We cannot make decisions that take into account every possible risk; we know that already. Also, in these days of international uncertainty, those decisions are, by definition, difficult and it may be impossible to demonstrate whether they are right for several decades afterwards.

Today, we could probably make a decent assessment of the intelligence gathered in the 1970s through to the early 1980s. I am not sure that we could make a proper assessment now of intelligence that was gathered between, let us say, 1985 and 1995, so it is difficult to assess the value of the information that we get. It is even more problematic in those areas—this happens quite commonly with the agencies—where soft data are used in judgments in conjunction with much other public data, or much other data obtained by normal means. That means that, for the National Audit Office's actions to help the Committee, value-for-money studies will tend to focus on cost control, on coming to the conclusion that we have obtained whatever it was that we wanted at the minimum possible cost, with no wastage; the very point that the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee has made.

I have discussed this with the Comptroller and Auditor General. There are appropriate value-for-money studies that might deliver some useful information for the Committee—the House will understand if I do not elaborate on them—but I say as an aside that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater pointed out some of the problems that some agencies in other countries have had with excessive bureaucracy: a sort of sclerosis of the agencies involved. I would be wary of trying to second-guess absolutely everything that is done because we might then destroy the flair of the agencies.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The right hon. Gentleman has an important role in these matters. It may be that a productive intelligence can be secured at a fraction of the cost simply by looking at open sources. The question that we have to ask ourselves is: how can we be absolutely sure that, in securing that intelligence, the cheapest means of securing it has been used? That is very much a matter for the National Audit Office.

Mr. Davis: I absolutely agree; that was my point about obtaining the intelligence at minimum cost. It is what I refer as to as the Mossad rule. The previous head of Mossad once commented that he was not going to spend Israeli taxpayers' money or risk the lives of his agents on obtaining things that were on the front page of Al-Ahram, the Arab newspaper. It is a well-taken point, but my point is that that is not strictly a value-for money exercise; it is a cost-effectiveness exercise.

There is one other area of value for money that might deliver significantly more than what I have discussed already: comparison with other allied services abroad. That would require international agreement, but I could think of three or four other services that might be interested. However, such an idea, if it were possible—and I do not know whether it is—would require a separately financed exercise.

I say that because it is not the entire National Audit Office that is engaged in this process. By definition, this is a process that uses a small cadre of the NAO—those who are cleared to the level necessary. To extend that cadre would be expensive and would need funding.

In this assessment process, the tasking of the agencies is important. Crisp, clear tasking leads to sharp and effective operational management and facilitates after-the-event evaluation. Soft or tardy tasking makes it harder, and occasionally impossible, for the agencies to act.

The Liberal Democrat spokesman referred to the Falkland Islands war. I refer the House to paragraph 311 of the Franks report, which points out only too clearly that late tasking created problems for the intelligence assessment there—as it turned out, the tasking change was too late because it was only six months before the operation.

Effective and clear tasking allows good management. It also makes it possible to devise and measure cost-effective delivery—the very point that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours) raised—in which process the NAO will play its part in helping the agencies and the Committee to do their job: to protect this nation and defeat the enemies of the realm.

6.46 pm

Yvette Cooper (Pontefract and Castleford): The Intelligence and Security Committee report is broad in scope. I want to concentrate on only two issues—oversight and personal files—while joining in the tributes by other hon. Members to members of the agencies, who work hard on our behalf and are frequently unrecognised.

In the 1994 Richard Dimbleby lecture, Stella Rimington, former Director-General of the Security Service, said:

"Accountability lies at the heart of the tension between liberty and security".

She could just as easily have said "between democracy and secrecy", because democracy holds that we must hold public organisations openly to account, while good intelligence saves lives; secrecy saves lives.

Inevitably, we cannot hold our secret agencies to account by the public, press and Parliament in the ordinary way, but that is all the more reason why those who are charged with oversight and who have responsibility to look into what the secret agencies are doing really have the power to do the job properly on behalf of everyone else. There are gaps in our system of oversight—in particular, in the ISC's access to information about what the secret agencies do.

At the moment, information is provided by agency chiefs and by Ministers at their discretion, which raises a difficult point: how can we have proper oversight if the very people whom we are supposed to be overseeing are determining what information we get? That severely jeopardises the Committee's ability to pronounce with authority on important intelligence issues. Credibility demands knowledge and knowledge demands the power to verify—the power to check what is going on. Until now, the ISC has not had that power, and that reduces its credibility in the public mind, as well as in Parliament's mind.

None of that means that I suspect the agencies of any wrongdoing; it means simply that we on the Committee lack the ability to pronounce with confidence that all is well. We cannot come to the House, put our hands on our hearts and say that all is well, because we do not have the power to know.

A good oversight committee will never be able to answer all the questions that are raised by hon. Members about the secret agencies or their work. It may never be able to answer questions about all the issues that it is investigating. That is inevitable. However, colleagues in the House should be able to feel confident that someone is investigating issues on their behalf and has the power to do the job properly, even if ordinary Members of Parliament are not able to get the answers themselves. At the moment, colleagues cannot do that, but they should be able to do so. It is possible, without jeopardising national security or secrets that we need to keep, to move to a better system of accountability. That is why the ISC's investigative arm is so crucial. It is worth thinking through the objections and the likely objections, because we must make the investigative arm work in practice. Although there has been a great deal of positive discussion today about that investigative arm, we have not yet made it work in practice.

The first objection that people raise is that a security risk is involved—that information that the Committee demands may jeopardise the lives of agents or threaten the security of sensitive operations. That does not fit with the facts. We should consider the experience of other countries. The German oversight committee has the power to call for papers and for people to testify before it. In the United States, the congressional intelligence committees have a right of access to all the information that they require. So, too, does the Canadian oversight committee, the Security Intelligence Review Committee. Those committees do not leak. When we visited them, the agencies and the committees told us that, with just one exception, there had been no security breaches from their oversight committees.

There is also a precedent in the United Kingdom as the commissioners have full access to information. They have full access to all the files that they want to see and anything else that they want to look at to do their job. If commissioners for the agencies can be trusted not to abuse their power, surely a group of politicians should be trusted to do exactly the same.

The second objection, and I have heard this raised, is that the existing system of accountability is already adequate—that the ISC may have limited powers, but there are also commissioners and tribunals. It is argued that agency chiefs answer to Ministers and Ministers answer to Parliament and that a complicated system of accountability is in place. The problem with that argument is that it does not stack up to an adequate system of accountability. It simply is not acceptable in a modern democracy for the agencies to be answerable only to the Executive, especially given their growing technical power to invade people's privacy and look into their lives. Where they have so much power, they must, for the sake of public confidence, also be answerable to Parliament.

Ministers must also answer to Parliament for their security decisions. The ordinary process of ministerial accountability to Parliament will never work for security issues. We cannot have Ministers at the Dispatch Box answering parliamentary questions on security issues, and we would be horrified if such a system were ever to start. However, in the absence of that, we must have a credible and powerful system of parliamentary oversight, even if that cannot be done by the whole House. Without some sort of Committee, neither Ministers nor agencies will be properly accountable for their decisions.

Colleagues have argued that we should go further and set up a Select Committee. I think that that would be a good idea, but we must remember that such a change would not of itself magically solve the problem of access to information, which is the issue at the heart of the debate. Existing Select Committees are routinely denied information on the ground of national security. The Canadian oversight committee is not a parliamentary committee, but it is more credible than Britain's ISC because it has greater access to information and can act as an independent check on what the agencies are doing.

There is an issue surrounding the lack of independent checks in Britain that goes far wider than the ISC and accountability to Parliament. It is about the principle of external independent checks on organisations that have had a long tradition of self-regulation. At the moment, agency chiefs report directly to Ministers, but the secret agencies' tradition of autonomy and self-regulation means that that is often the sole point of Executive accountability, as Ministers and their civil servants rarely go beyond the agencies' doors. Commissioners check whether it was legal for Ministers to sign a particular warrant, but who outside the agencies checks whether operations are actually carried out in accordance with those warrants? Who checks whether operations are well managed? Who outside the agencies checks the wider issue of compliance with the law?

Obviously, we cannot have a system under which absolutely everything that the agencies do is checked in that way, but who outside the agencies checks any of it? In principle, the commissioners could do that, but as Lord Justice Stuart-Smith made clear in his annual report this year:

"It is not my function to review operations."

I hope that Ministers will consider the tradition of self-regulation of secret agencies, because I believe that it is out of date. That applies not only to secret agencies, but to any organisation operating in the modern world. It is not a criticism of the secret agencies; it is simply an argument for proper independent checks that can improve efficiency and act as a spur to improvements. After all, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment does not rely on self-regulation for schools; he sends in the Office for Standards in Education. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health today argued for an independent external audit for doctors. The US, Canada and Australia have inspectors-general to fulfil that function in their secret agencies. It is something that the Committee has said it will consider further, but Ministers should pursue in more detail the issue of Executive oversight.

Of course, it is vital that such checks do not become over-bureaucratic, but it is possible to have effective independent checks that work for the benefit of the secret agencies and make them better able to perform their functions for the sake of all of us. Such a system is not just in the interests of democracy; it is in the interests of the agencies themselves. A credible oversight system would give them more cover. It would give the ISC the ability to defend them, to take some of the flak and to object to some of the more ludicrous allegations that will inevitably arise and will not go away, no matter what sort of oversight system we have.

I want briefly to raise the question of personal files—in particular, the destruction of the old subversive files, where the same principle of independent checks applies. The ISC has argued that there should be an independent check on those files that the Security Service has decided it does not want any more and should be destroyed. It appears that the Government have rejected that recommendation and I strongly urge Ministers to reconsider. If the only objection to independent checks is that they are too bureaucratic, we should keep all the files. They should be put in a vault or microfiched; we must not destroy those old subversive files for good simply on the say-so of the Security Service.

The Government's response states:

"the decision to retain or destroy a file must be an operational one."

However, that is only part of the story. I accept that only the Security Service can make the operational decision whether it still needs to retain a file and continue to use it, but, once the service has decided that it does not need it, there is an historical—not operational—decision to be made. History is not an operational decision. There is absolutely no reason why only the Security Service should be capable of deciding whether something has historical significance for the future. In fact, for the sake of the credibility of history, someone other than the Security Service should make that decision.

It is controversial stuff. We have all heard the allegations about the monitoring of so-called subversives in the 1970s and 1980s. For all I know, none of it may have happened. On the other hand, all sorts of outrageous things may have happened. The point is that future generations have a right to know what happened and how the organs of the state behaved. They have a right to be able to learn from that and to know that what they are looking at is the entire record. They need to be confident about that. For the sake of credibility, it should not be the Security Service that decides that. Future historians should never be able to say that the service was given a licence to write its own history.

[Yvette Cooper]

There are all sorts of other issues about individuals' rights to see their files if the Security Service has decided that they are now redundant and should be closed. It is too difficult an argument to go into in detail tonight; it is a matter to which the Committee has said it will return. Important issues are involved—files that the Security Service has decided are redundant should not be destroyed without there being at least some consideration of whether it is possible to consult the individual involved on what should happen to his or her files.

I welcome today's debate. We have certainly come a long way since the mere existence of MI5 and MI6 was denied. I believe that, sooner or later, we will travel much further. We will have to improve our system of accountability, for the sake not only of democracy but of the very secret agencies that the United Kingdom needs to function and to protect our modern democracy. If we do not improve our system of accountability, those agencies' capacity to operate in the national interest will be threatened.

7.9 pm

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): I am delighted to be called to speak in this important debate. As hon. Members have already said, the headquarters of GCHQ is in my Cheltenham constituency. Moreover, it is the town's largest and most important employer.

Since implementation of the Intelligence Services Act 1994—I served on the Standing Committee that scrutinised that Bill—the Intelligence and Security Committee has made regular visits to Cheltenham to visit GCHQ. I pay tribute to the work being done by the Committee, and echo Committee members' tributes to the dedicated personnel working in our intelligence and security services, especially at GCHQ.

I wish to speak primarily to paragraph 8 of the Committee's report. However, I should like first to mention the now-ended ban on trade unions, which has been mentioned already in the debate by the Foreign Secretary and other hon. Members. Once again, I thank the Foreign Secretary and the Government for ending the trade union ban at GCHQ, thereby ending a disgraceful episode in which the loyalty of dedicated employees was questioned.

Each January while the ban was still in operation, on the anniversary of its imposition, trade unionists, Members of both Houses of Parliament and ordinary, decent citizens used to meet in Cheltenham to march through the town to protest against the ban. Since I was first elected to the House, in 1992, I have marched shoulder to shoulder with campaigners to end the ban. For five years, I had the privilege of addressing great rallies, at one of which I shared the platform with the late John Smith. Four great party leaders have shown solidarity in redressing the great wrong of the ban—John Smith, Neil Kinnock, Lord Steel of Aikwood and my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown).

We met to support especially each and every one of the 14 loyal trade unionists who were sacked from GCHQ for sticking to their principles and wishing to belong to a trade union. Many of those 14 are my constituents, and they are very special constituents. They are Mike Grindley, Graham Hughes, Brian Johnson, Alan Rowland, Gerry O'Hagan, Dee Goddard, Bill Bickham, Alan Chambers, John Cook, Clive Lloyd—a distinguished local councillor—Roy Taylor, Barry Underwood, Gareth Morris and Robin Smith.

Of the 14, 13 were involved in supporting our armed forces during the Falklands conflict, and every one of them was positively vetted. The previous Government claimed that they were a threat to Britain's security, although they did not make that claim when those people were working their socks off helping our troops in a war and providing crucial, round-the-clock support in hugely difficult conditions. The previous Government also did not make that claim at the end of the conflict, when they honoured those people.

The ban on trade unions was a shabby act, and the new Government have put it right. Mike Grindley, Clive Lloyd and their friends—all 14 of the trade unionists—are about as subversive as a bunch of bananas. I thank the Government for keeping their promise to remove the ban on trade unionists at GCHQ.

Hon. Members will know that the previous Government decided to proceed, under the private finance initiative, with new accommodation for GCHQ. The remit was to consolidate GCHQ on a single site, and there were three options—to consolidate on one or other of the existing two sites, at Oakley or Benhall, in Cheltenham, or to build on a new site within the Cheltenham, Gloucester and Tewkesbury triangle. Soon after taking office, the new Government confirmed their intention of proceeding with that PFI, to the surprise of many people, including me. I must admit that I am still not convinced that using a PFI is a good idea in a service that is as vital to national and international security as GCHQ. However, the argument is over, and the PFI will proceed.

The local community has felt left out of the decision-making process because of the confidential nature of the bidding process. Some of the consortiums bidding for the contract were better than others and tried to keep local people informed, whereas others were downright cowboys—although some of my constituents have used the expression "sharks". Rumours were rife, causing considerable alarm and anxiety to local residents, especially those living near GCHQ, Oakley. Local councillors and I did what we could to alleviate the concerns.

Sadly, however, some mischief makers seemed determined to undermine the chances of GCHQ remaining in Cheltenham. At one stage, I found it necessary to tell a journalist that the wild stories that were circulating were "pie in the sky" and would never happen. Fortunately, he used the expression in the headline of his article. Even more fortunately, my comments have proved to be correct. The director of GCHQ found it necessary to take the unprecedented action of writing to the local newspaper to try to calm the rising hysteria. It was a sorry chapter, which, fortunately, has now come to an end.

Last month, the Government announced that they had decided against building GCHQ's new accommodation at Oakley. I support that decision. The Oakley site was far too cramped, and the roads were not suitable to cope with a doubling of office traffic. Currently, during rush hours, queues build up, particularly along the A40 London road, at Sixways, in Charlton Kings, and on other roads leading to GCHQ, Oakley.

The Government have announced also their decision on the successful consortium. GSL—which includes Tarmac, BT and Group 4—submitted an attractive circular design, with a central open courtyard, for the Benhall site in Cheltenham. On the land to be released—all of Oakley and part of Benhall—there are outline plans for a science park, perhaps a hospital, housing, retail facilities and a public centre. Needless to say, the circular design for the new accommodation has been christened "the GCHQ doughnut".

Unfortunately, when announcing the preferred developer, the Government did not announce the site. Instead, they have rather confused the issue by saying that the doughnut would be built either on the Benhall site or over at Brockworth, in the Gloucester business park, in the Tewkesbury parliamentary constituency. I should explain briefly why the Benhall option should be chosen. I should also like to urge the Government to make a decision quickly—today, if possible—to end speculation on the matter.

On the GCHQ PFI project, in paragraph 8 of its report, the Intelligence and Security Committee states:

"The challenge of ensuring no interruption to operating capabilities during this reorganisation is a daunting one, which will require the highest levels of management skill."

The Committee Chairman, the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), eloquently expressed the importance of that point.

The Government currently own land at Benhall that is within the GCHQ's boundaries, which will allow new accommodation to be built alongside existing offices. Therefore, there need be no interruption of or conflict with the vital work done there. Many talented employees working at GCHQ tell me that they wish to remain in Cheltenham. The vast majority live in or near the town. Visiting American security officers who occasionally visit Cheltenham have said that they think it is "unthinkable" that GCHQ should leave Cheltenham. Frankly, it would be disastrous if GCHQ left.

I have been told that GCHQ's work force is the equivalent of one quarter of Cheltenham's entire work force. Estimates show that, with the multiplier effect, GCHQ and its staff annually contribute more than £200 million to the town's economy. The people who work there contribute not only through their high street spending but in various other ways. They contribute to sports clubs and to voluntary and arts groups; some are school governors and a few are even local councillors. I was told last night that Cheltenham's Bach choir is made up mainly of GCHQ employees. If GCHQ moved out, property prices would fall, shops would close and many jobs would be lost.

There is also an important environmental reason for building the GCHQ doughnut at Benhall. A large majority of GCHQ personnel live in Cheltenham. If the new accommodation were built at Brockworth, the staff would need to travel to and from the new site every working day, many of them along busy and narrow roads. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of extra vehicles would use the A46 through the delightful village of Shurdington. According to one estimate, an extra 5 million miles would need to be travelled each year.

I understand that, under the terms of their contracts, GCHQ employees would be reimbursed for up to three years for the additional costs of travel. I shall let hon. Members work out for themselves how much that would cost the taxpayer.

The Government claim to be environmentally aware. Indeed, each Government Department has appointed a green Minister, and I support the thrust of that policy. I therefore find it impossible to believe that the Government are considering using taxpayers' money, which is always in short supply, to force GCHQ staff to waste their time travelling millions of extra miles to and from work, using non-renewable resources and adding to air pollution. How would that policy fit in with the Government's obligations under the Kyoto agreement? One of my constituents is the country's leading environmental campaigner, Jonathon Porritt. I discussed the issue with him last week, and he was horrified to hear what was being considered.

Another key point to bear in mind is that the people of Cheltenham, whom I have the honour and privilege to represent, want to continue the long and successful partnership between the town and this vital Government installation. I pay tribute to the councillors and officers of Cheltenham borough council who have bent over backwards to help GCHQ during the PFI process. On 12 October, the chairman of the council's policy and resources committee, Councillor David Lawrence, asked the council to approve a resolution welcoming "the selection of GSL as the preferred developer" and urging the Government to "accept the Benhall option".

That motion was carried unanimously.

In order to gauge local opinion, I sent a letter and survey to thousands of people living near the Benhall site. I pointed out the importance of GCHQ and the fact that development would take place at the site whatever the decision over GCHQ. My office has received bucketfuls of responses, and 97 per cent. of the people responding want GCHQ at Benhall.

By contrast, the people of Brockworth say that they do not want GCHQ. Brockworth parish council chairman Jim Hunt is reported in the Gloucester Citizen as saying:

"I'm dead against it. It would be a horrible blot on the landscape".

Other councillors have also said that they do not want it. Councillor Mike Matthews said that traffic was a concern:

"We all know what the traffic is like now. It would be worse. There wouldn't be any jobs created for people in Brockworth".

Councillor Colin Gomersall said:

"There would be chaos on the roads. We said 'yes' to Gloucester Business Park because it would bring jobs to the locality but this is a dead duck."

Councillor Barry Morris said the council had been kept in the dark about the proposal. He added:

"I think we should write to Tewkesbury Borough Council to express our dismay that we knew nothing about the prospect of GCHQ moving to Brockworth."

I understand from a constituent that the water table on the Brockworth site, formerly used by the Gloucester Aviation Company, is no more than a metre below the surface. He writes:

"The geology of the site reveals alluvial lias clays. These sub-soils have the ability to absorb large quantities of water, expanding to double or triple their size. The downside is that when they dry out they contract in similar proportions, from where they get the name 'shrinkable clays'.

Modern construction methods can overcome the worst effects of these clays on normal rectangular buildings, but it must be a major concern for the potential distortion of an annular form of the proposed doughnut."

[Mr. Nigel Jones]

What my constituent is saying is that the Brockworth site is not suitable for a circular design like the GCHQ doughnut.

The decision for the Government should now be easy. The people of Cheltenham want GCHQ; Brockworth does not. The Benhall option in Cheltenham ties in with the Government's green agenda; Brockworth does not. The employees of GCHQ want to stay in Cheltenham; they do not want to waste time travelling to Brockworth. The Benhall site in Cheltenham is structurally sound for the circular design of the new GCHQ; Brockworth is not.

I urge the Government to announce, sooner rather than later, that Benhall is to be the home for a successful future for GCHQ.

7.15 pm

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): I warmly welcome this debate. I have been a member of the Intelligence and Security Committee for only 15 months. Before that appointment, I must confess to an underlying unease—a healthy scepticism—about the security services. Indeed, in the 1980s, I hunted with the hounds over the Wright affair and played my part in embarrassing the Government of the time.

Following my experience of the past 15 months, I feel greatly reassured. I have "been in", "seen much" and "pondered at length", and I am much reassured by what I found and by the conversations that I have had with people in the services. Some people might say that I was "going native"—a phrase used by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin)—but I assure him that I am not. All members of the Committee observe the performance of others, and I do not think that my fellow Committee members could accuse me of going native. I would suggest to my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the former Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, that the nature of my questioning was little different from when I was on the PAC. My colleagues can be reassured that, along with others, I play my part.

I hope that the agencies are reassured by today's debate. In my view, they should welcome the report, as I do. It is an excellent report, especially in its reference to the investigative arm which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) said, is critical to the workings of the Committee. The Committee needs teeth, and that is the route that we must take.

I must pay one or two tributes at the outset. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) for his very important work on industrial relations, work that is of some historical significance. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford for the excellent work that she did on files, and to the Chairman of our Committee, who I believe has been an excellent Chairman and who adds credibility to the work that we do. I mean that most sincerely.

I pay tribute to the service heads who have painstakingly set out to reassure the Committee within the terms of the legislation. I pay a special tribute to the work of agency personnel, whoever they are and wherever they are in the world. Their names I know not, but I would like them to know that their work and dedication have been an inspiration to members of the Committee as they carried out their duties. However, there is a hole in the way we work, and a big hole in the report, and that is the status of the Committee. I shall comment almost uniquely on that aspect of the debate.

I do not believe that oversight is fully credible while the Committee remains a creature of the Executive—and that is what it is. The problem at the moment is that the Committee considers its relationship with the Prime Minister more important to its operation than its relationship with Parliament. I strongly dissent from that view and find the arguments in favour of Select Committee status utterly overwhelming. So what are they?

First, we live on the threshold of an era in which our civil liberties and freedoms will be the subject of increasing pressure as the state strives to maintain collective responsibility. It is an exercise in which states throughout the world are involved. Curiously, closed circuit television adequately illustrates my point. Civil libertarians were hostile to its introduction. Now they simply talk of safeguards and regulation. The demands of society for protection against the excesses of criminal activity have crowded out arguments over the intrusion of camera surveillance on our lives. In such conditions, one has to be beef up systems of regulation, safeguard and oversight. Those systems need to command public support, confidence and trust. I do not believe that the ISC, despite the good intentions of its membership and the witnesses that come before it, as a creature of the Executive, can possibly meet those tests.

Secondly, the Committee needs new and increased powers to call persons and papers and to communicate with other Committees. There are times when the information that comes our way should, in certain circumstances, be referred to other Select Committees. It would enable them to carry out their inquiries. That does not mean that security will be in any way breached because mechanisms can be introduced to ensure that that does not happen for the release of material.

It is already acknowledged that the Committee needs the power to report directly to Parliament and the argument has been well rehearsed this evening. I believe that we need the power to take evidence under oath. Select Committees have that power, yet we do not. Without going into any details, it is fair to say that there are times when the Committee might receive assurances on issues where, if those assurances were given under oath, we might have the confidence—under present circumstances, with the approval of the Prime Minister—to make statements that would be extremely helpful during the course of public debate and in the exercise of reassuring the general public.

We need the power to take evidence under privilege. Technically, if a person appeared before the Committee today, he could libel another person because he would not be protected by privilege. The Committee has none of the powers that are accorded to witnesses giving evidence to parliamentary Committees.

Above all, the Committee should have the power to hold witnesses in contempt if they deliberately mislead the Committee—[Interruption.] Does the Chairman of the Committee wish to intervene? I see not. If Parliament knew that the Committee had the ability to take evidence under oath and to hold witnesses in contempt in the event that they were deliberately to mislead, it would substantially increase the credibility of any reassuring statement that the Committee makes.

The arguments are not new; they have been rehearsed at length on a number of occasions in the past, most notably during the passage of the 1989 and 1994 legislation. Those supporting Select Committee status included the noble Lord Hattersley, speaking from the Front Bench. If he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), intends to go into greater detail about what was said at the time. Other supporters included the noble Lord Randall, who also spoke from the Front Bench, and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), as well as my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), who in 1993 made a number of fascinating speeches that make most interesting reading. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North will read them. The noble Lord Richard, speaking from the Front Bench in another place, and the Minister for the Cabinet Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) also made positive speeches in favour of Select Committee status. Indeed, in 1989, the entire shadow Cabinet, including my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Foreign Secretary, voted for Select Committee status. I have a copy of the Division list. The entire Labour membership of the Committee today that was in the House at the time all voted for Select Committee status, so we are not arguing new principles this evening.

Some say that legislation is required to accord Select Committee status, but that is not my understanding—a resolution of the House will suffice. We could establish a Select Committee to carry out fully the functions of the ISC by using existing arrangements within the House, simply carrying a resolution. Of course there would be a residual ISC in place by way of the legislation, but that would need to meet only once a year for five minutes to fulfil its function.

I recognise that there is strong opposition, which is to be found everywhere. Some argue that the fact that the Committee reports directly to the Prime Minister gives individual members of it additional clout, kudos, weight or importance in the political world. I strongly reject that view. Others argue that no way can be found to restructure the practices and procedures of the Select Committee so as to ensure Executive influence for reasons of national security over material that it may seek to publish. That is simply untrue. A resolution of the House could require that the Committee sought the approval of the appropriate agency before reporting to the House. The resolution could further provide that, in the event that a dispute arose between the agency and the Committee over the publication of information or evidence in a report to the House, the matter of the dispute could be referred to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for his decision and the Committee could be required to comply with the decision of the Prime Minister. If, in unforeseen circumstances, the Committee or any member of it were to threaten to breach the Committee's rules of procedure as approved by the House, it would always be open to the Leader of the House, on the instruction of the Prime Minister, to dissolve the entire Committee or remove any member of it on a resolution tabled on one day which took effect on the next. There are adequate provisions.

Mr. Rogers: I accept what my hon. Friend says and there is a great deal of substance to his argument. However, the issues involved are a little more complicated than those of a general Department of State. For instance, the relationship between our allies in matters of national security and defence has to be considered, as does the interrelation between GCHQ and the National Security Agency in America. In so many ways, there is a nexus of relationships. If that were disentangled, perhaps the argument for Select Committee status would be more valid, but at present it is not as simple as dealing with an ordinary Department of State.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend is arguing that, by implication, accountability to the legislature means a wider form of accountability to Members of Parliament.

Mr. Rogers: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is how I understood his intervention. That is invalid if resolutions of the House suitably circumscribe the powers of the Committee, which is what the argument is about. We can carry resolutions that make the Committee as hermetically sealed as any structure that currently exists. We are told that such a Committee could not be prevented from taking evidence in public session if that were the wish of the Committee. A resolution of the House could introduce a general prohibition on the Select Committee taking evidence in public session. It could further place a requirement on the Committee to seek the permission of the appropriate agencies and the Prime Minister in conditions of dispute if it wished to take evidence in public.

It is argued that, while a Select Committee is neither more nor less likely than the ISC to leak, it would have the right to publish reports in a way that would prove prejudicial to the interests of national security. A resolution of the House could introduce a general prohibition on the Select Committee publishing reports. It could further place a requirement on the Committee to seek the permission of the appropriate agency, and the Prime Minister in conditions of dispute, if it wished to publish a report. Safeguards would be available for every eventuality.

As prime ministerial appointees, members are currently responsible for reporting collectively to the Prime Minister. It is argued that such limited powers to report would not be possible if the Committee were appointed by the legislature. There is no reason why the resolution of the House should not stipulate the procedure to be used in the publication of reports. It could require the Committee to publish its reports subject to sidelining by the Prime Minister for reasons of national security, as currently happens.

It is also argued that a move to a parliamentary arrangement would lead to greater pressure on Ministers to be accountable as witnesses to a parliamentary Committee structure, with less emphasis on agency heads giving evidence. That argument is not supported by an examination of practices in some of the House's other

[Mr. Campbell–Savours]

Committees. In my 11 years on the Public Accounts Committee, Ministers never attended as witnesses. I am not advocating a prohibition on Ministers attending. Ministers would be no more likely to attend a House Committee than the ISC. With hearings being held in private, there would be no additional pressure on Ministers to attend.

The most remarkable argument is that a lack of secure accommodation in the House would make it impossible to conduct inquiries, take evidence and deliberate in secure conditions. We have been to all parts of the world recently and seen parliamentary Committees working perfectly. The relevant House authorities manage to find secure arrangements.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda may have been alluding to the fact that dealing with foreign powers and the agency involves trust. The problem in this particular instance is not the structure, but the people. With the right membership, a parliamentary Committee is no more likely to leak than the ISC. If the right people are selected, there will not be a problem. I remind those on the Committee—this is the first open debate that we have had; I welcome that—that we have to grasp the nettle, because there is an expectation among our colleagues that the system should work. We may be satisfied that it works, but they are not. They do not believe that it is credible. Journalists ring us all the time and we all give them the same answer: "We are not in a position to talk about those matters publicly." For us, that is all right, but they have no confidence in the structure set up in the 1994 legislation. Let us change it and build a system that commands public confidence.

7.35 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): When I look at the extensive gaps on the Benches on both sides of the House, I feel like the last man monitoring subversion in MI5. I believe that even he is now out of a job.

It is always a privilege to listen to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours). I do not always agree with what he says, but his comments are always thoughtful and well considered, and deserve to be taken seriously. I endorse the remarks of the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) about the importance of retaining MI5 files when the Security Service might be minded to destroy them. She outlined the main reasons. I shall not repeat them, but I am pleased to endorse them.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary said, I initiated an Adjournment debate on that issue on 25 February. I am pleased to see that paragraph 40 of the report says that there should be safeguards against MI5 using file destruction to rewrite the historical record. There should also be safeguards to prevent politicians from doing the same.

The foreword to the report is a two-and-a-half page summary of the rationale for the continued existence of the SIS, the Security Service, and GCHQ. It is the finest distillation of all the reasons why those services are essential to the nation in the future, just as they have been in years gone by. Emphasis is laid on regional wars, aid and peacekeeping, nuclear proliferation, terrorism, computer security and chemical and biological weapons.

I pay tribute to those in the SIS and the CIA who were responsible for bringing to the attention of the world community in 1993 the way in which the Russians, who had signed the 1972 biological weapons convention, had systematically flouted it for 20 years, redoubling their efforts to produce deadly bacterial weapons when other nations were honouring the agreement.

However, I find the foreword a mite over-generous in one respect. It says at the start:

"For more than 40 years, the United Kingdom and its NATO allies endured the threatening environment of the Cold War. The genuine menace of an aggressive world power, seeking to subvert and dominate Europe and the wider world, gave abundant justification for substantial defence, intelligence and security structures. In this climate, the case for foreign intelligence and internal security was generally accepted."

I am put in mind of an occasion as recent as April 1989, right at the very end of the cold war, when no fewer than 29 hon. Members saw fit to sign an early-day motion calling for the abolition not only of MI5 but of special branch. I am pleased to note that none of them has been appointed to the Intelligence and Security Committee.

I have sometimes been accused—not least by the honourable and ever-genial Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase)—of re-fighting the cold war in some of my speeches and interventions. We would be very foolish when considering the security and intelligence services' future role not to look at the cold war and the lessons it has for us.

Several points in the Committee's report give me grounds for concern. One is that, when the report concentrates on vetting, it says in paragraph 47:

"there may be files on individuals under the age of 55 because they joined an organisation which was categorised as subversive possibly 20 years ago, and these files may still be used for vetting and other purposes. However, no such files would be opened on somebody who joined the same organisation today."

That is a little naive. Many of the organisations that were subversive 20 years ago will no longer be around for people to join; they collapsed with the demise of the Soviet threat. There is no comparison between people who joined an organisation 20, 10 or 15 years ago, when that organisation may have been organically linked to the Soviet Union, such as many of the Soviet front organisations, and people who join a similar organisation today even though the Soviet threat has disappeared.

I am concerned that paragraph 17 of the Government's response to the report says:

"the Government's policy is that the Service"—

the Security Service—

"will no longer surface records in the vetting context purely on account of membership of organisations hitherto considered subversive."

Does that really mean that, if, for example, someone were being considered for appointment to a senior position in NATO, no attention whatever would be paid to whether he had previously been active in organisations classed as subversive at the height of the cold war? The fact that such checking apparently does not happen at least clears up a mystery for me about one person—an academic—who I know was appointed to a senior position in NATO despite being actively and prominently involved in seeking to undermine NATO's position at the height of the sensitive argument over European missiles.

Mr. Rogers rose—

Dr. Lewis: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to intervene?

Mr. Rogers: No, I am walking out on the hon. Gentleman's speech.

Dr. Lewis: The problem with MI5 dealing with subversion was that its task was much easier in war than in peace. In war, as we now know, the Security Service succeeded in the incredible task of taking control of the German spy network in Britain by means of the double-cross system and the XX committee. The German spy network was so fully controlled that not only was no effective espionage carried out in this country, but when the time came for London Controlling Section planners to work out the strategic deception that would fool the Germans on D-day, German agents in this country were used as the conduit for disinformation, which was fed to the Nazis and undoubtedly saved many lives.

It is more difficult to trumpet the achievements of the security services in peacetime. One tends to wish that they would be a little more forthcoming. For example, in 1961, when Colin Cross was writing his account—definitive at the time—of the fascist movement in Britain, he was still unable to say for certain that the fascists had been funded during the 1930s by Mussolini. It should not have taken the security services until November and December of 1983 to reveal special branch and Security Service reports that show that Mosley had indeed been the paid stooge of Mussolini for part of that period.

Similarly, I do not know, even to this day, whether the Security Service realised that, at least from 1958, right through until at least 1979, the KGB was financing the Communist party of Great Britain. Certainly, throughout all those years, leaders of the Communist party of Great Britain angrily denied that anything of the sort was going on. The fact came out not as a result of a revelation from the Security Service's archives, but when researchers who were looking through the archives in Moscow found reports of payments—in one year as much as £100,000—to Reuben Falber, the bag man for the Communists at the time.

I understand the security services' need for reticence when they are touching on matters that could relate to party politics. Much of the debate until now has inevitably been a mixture of generalities and structural recommendations. I should like to describe a few examples that might illustrate the difficulties that arise when people who belong to the security and intelligence services must make decisions about action and intervention.

During the second world war, in 1944, MI5 tendered a report to Cabinet Minister Herbert Morrison on the Trotskyist movement in Britain. It was remarkable for its comprehensiveness. It especially identified a man called Edward Grant—Ted Grant, as he later became better known—the editor of Socialist Appeal, as the leading organiser of Trotskyist subversion during the war. Strangely enough, that man was still active when, in the 1970s, the Revolutionary Socialist League—the direct successor to the organisation with which he had been involved during the war—began infiltrating the Labour party as the Militant Tendency.

The question that one must ask is whether it is right for a security service to intervene when a democratic political party is being infiltrated by people who are subversive. I am delighted to say that, 10 years after I tried to help the Labour party to kick out activists of the Revolutionary Socialist League in the 1970s, the Labour party finally got round to doing it itself.

It is very strange that one can still look back at events in the 1980s and try to criticise the Security Service for taking an interest, but forget the interest that the security services took in the 1970s in the undermining of the Labour party by people who were trying to get revolutionary communists into Parliament on the back of the Labour ticket, which was finally confirmed by the all too belated expulsions from Labour's ranks.

Perhaps a more immediate example is that of the Soviet propaganda front organisations, such as the World Peace Council, the World Federation of Scientific Workers, the World Federation of Trade Unions and all the others that were set up in the late 1940s and 1950s to carry the Soviet propaganda message into battle against NATO and western countries. Those front organisations were banned by the Labour party for many years, because they were communist fronts. In 1972, the proscriptions were lifted, and suddenly, once again, the security services had a dilemma. What would they do if an activist in a political party were also an activist in an organisation that is an acknowledged instrument of a potential adversary?

To give the House the flavour of my point, I shall cite what the Foreign Office said at the United Nations about the World Peace Council. In a report in 1981, the Foreign Office said that the spokesman for the World Peace Council had said that his organisation represented hundreds of millions of people. The World Parliament of Peoples was presented in the literature of the World Peace Council as a kind of rival to the United Nations itself. However, the Foreign Office said, the grand facade of the World Peace Council was no more substantial than a Hollywood film set. The report said that the World Peace Council was a disguised instrument of one country's foreign policy. It was a wolf in sheep's clothing, and its clothing had begun to look very threadbare.

During the confrontation of the nuclear debate in the 1980s, an organisation came into existence which was a sub-front of the World Peace Council. It was called Generals for Peace. Generals for Peace consisted of eight former NATO senior military officers, half of whom were in their own right members of the World Peace Council. They were identified at the time as people who were engaging in an operation that was directly aimed at western strategic interests, and they were being orchestrated by a man called Dr. Gerhard Kade, who was well known to be active in the Soviet front network.

When the cold war came to an end, those of us who had been denounced for trying to point out what Generals for Peace and the World Peace Council had been up to in this respect were somewhat heartened to see a report from a felicitously named former Stasi agent called Gunther Bohnsack, who had spent 26 years in the active measures department of East German intelligence. He confessed that Generals for Peace had been "conceived, organised and financed by the Stasi."

This had created

"a real power that was in line with Moscow's ideas", and was

"controlled through intelligence services in Moscow and east Berlin."

Last year, the former head of the Stasi, General Markus Wolf, confirmed the truth of that.

There are those who say that there is no role for the security services in monitoring subversion and the past affiliations of people who may yet be appointed to sensitive posts. I should like to know what they expect of somebody who has been involved with an organisation that turns out to have been actively in the pay and control of a foreign hostile intelligence service. [Interruption.]

Some hon. Members want to know the direct relevance of all this; it relates to the aspect of the report which says that, in future, the Committee should have a further investigative capacity. Paragraph 69 says that the Committee lacks the ability to investigate directly different aspects of the agencies' activities:

"Without such a capability, the Committee cannot make authoritative statements on certain issues . . . We . . . intend to introduce this capability in the coming year."

If the role of the Committee and its investigator[illegible] guard against abuses by the security and secret ser[illegible] quis custodiet ipsos custodes—who will guard the guardians?

Paragraph 26 of the report states that there will be more vetting of agency staff, more random searches and close checks, so that nobody employed by the agencies will be likely to do anything to undermine their security. I suggest that what's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If the Committee, with its extra powers, wishes to take to itself the right to look absolutely, totally and deeply into individuals and cases being conducted by the security services, the Committee itself will have to do something to ensure that its own security is beyond reproach.

I have given examples of the dilemmas faced by the security and intelligence services when they find their inquiries into potentially hostile organisations leading them back towards a political party. Let us imagine what the security services' dilemma might be if they were faced with the prospect of looking at a Member of Parliament who had, for example, sponsored a defence fund for the Trotskyist paper Militant when it was threatened with a libel action by a fellow Labour Member of Parliament; who had described the US air raid against Gaddafi as American state terrorism against Libya; who had welcomed a campaign to have Porton Down closed, thus depriving Britain of its chemical and biological defence research centre; who had supported Cuba and congratulated it on the 30th anniversary of Castro's communist revolution; who had praised the World Peace Council's own bogus Kremlin-organised peace congress in Copenhagen in October 1986; or who had backed a front for North Korean propaganda organisations.

The problem that would face the security services if they were looking into something of that sort is that they would find themselves investigating at least two members of the Intelligence and Security Committee itself. The security services will face a paradox—they must try to preserve their complete impartiality towards political parties, while doing their duty to follow the trail of hostile organisations, wherever it might lead.

I thank the House for its indulgence in hearing my speech. I look forward to hearing in particular the speech of the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), whose own organisation, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, had a number of very close links with the front organisations which I have mentioned—and on that point I conclude my remarks—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman concludes his remarks, let me make it clear that he will not impugn the activities of any hon. Member, and he will not make any remark against any serving Member of this House. The organisation to which the hon. Lady belonged is a legal organisation, and it is her own business.

Dr. Lewis: If I may conclude—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has concluded his remarks. I am telling him what he will not do.

7.56 pm

Ms Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I congratulate the Committee on the report, and associate myself with the comprehensive opening remarks of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. Because of time, I intend to concentrate my comments strictly on the subject of personal files. I intend to speak of the past—not, I hasten to add, because I want to dwell in it, but because I think that it has direct relevance to this debate and to any future investigations that the Committee may undertake.

In 1979, I was Labour's parliamentary candidate for Newbury, where I lived at the time. At the end of that year, NATO announced that American missiles would be sited in Europe. Some months later, the Ministry of Defence organised a ticket-only public meeting on Newbury racecourse to explain why the cruise missiles should be sited at Greenham common. I spoke for the local opposition. For me, it was a mere accident of history and geography, but the consequences of that time have cast a long shadow over my life.

It was a very different time—a time of cold war, when, as the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) said in the introduction to the report:

"the case for foreign intelligence and internal security was generally accepted."

But then, as now, ordinary citizens thought that they had the right to free speech and peaceful protest. In 1984, the then Home Secretary, Leon Brittan—speaking of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament—appeared to agree. He said:

"There is no doubt that peaceful political campaigning to change the mind of government and of the people generally about nuclear disarmament is an entirely legitimate activity."

So how did I lose my right to legitimate dissent? How did I end up—as I believe I have been—the subject of MI5 surveillance? I do not know if there are files on me or not, but I have been frequently named in that context.

In March 1985, Cathy Massiter, an MI5 agent of 12 years' standing who had left the service two years earlier, made statements in a television programme that she reiterated in a lengthy sworn affidavit. She has never been prosecuted. What I have to say derives from that affidavit.

At that time, the Security Service operated under the 1952 Maxwell-Fyfe directive, which I believe defined subversive activities as those that threaten the safety or well-being of the state or that are intended to undermine or overthrow parliamentary democracy through political, industrial or violent means.

Despite the history lesson that we have just heard from the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), I understand that, when I joined CND, MI5 did not believe that it was a subversive organisation—indeed, CND could not possibly have met the criteria that I have described. I was a long-standing member of the Labour party, and I worked for a well-known and respected voluntary organisation. Speaking about me, Cathy Massiter said:

"it was fully recognised by the Service that she had no subversive affiliations and therefore she could not be recorded under any of the usual subversive categories."

However, as she said, the service was not deterred. It took advantage of the fact that CND was an open and democratic organisation, with the highest ethical standards. We had no personal scandals, despite repeated attempts to smear individuals. There was no Russian gold, and we famously sent back the donations from a numbered Swiss account.

We gave interviews freely to anyone who asked. When I gave one to a Soviet journalist, I unwittingly provided MI5 with—according to Cathy Massiter—the opportunity to record me as a contact of a hostile intelligence service.

Dr. Julian Lewis: In May 1982, was not the hon. Lady a member of the delegation that travelled to Moscow to meet the Soviet arm of the World Peace Council? Sally Davison, one of her colleagues in that delegation, said that the difference between CND and the Soviet peace committee was that the Soviet Union was in favour of peace.

Ms Ruddock: I speak only for myself. Because CND was open and democratic, it was willing to engage in discussions with other organisations. At no time in the Soviet Union did we fail to put our case for disarmament equally, east and west. The debate is not about the virtues of nuclear disarmament—all hon. Members will have their own views on that. I want carefully to deal with the report.

Mr. Winnick: Will my hon. Friend confirm that CND, of which I was not a member, produced a pamphlet that condemned totalitarian rule in the Soviet Union, making it clear that the activities in which she and her colleagues were engaged could not take place there? How, therefore, can CND be described as a Soviet front organisation?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks. Indeed, members of the democratic movement in the Soviet Union told us how much they had learnt from the way in which we conducted ourselves.

As I said, Cathy Massiter alleged that I was recorded as a contact of a hostile intelligence service. I will never know whether the journalist was a KGB agent, but, frankly, it hardly matters. Central to the debate is the claim that someone who did not fit the rules for scrutiny was put under security surveillance on a pretext. I had no redress then—and I have none today—for the slur on my character and integrity.

Secret surveillance was not the end of the matter. In March 1983, the then Secretary of State for Defence established a special unit—DS19—inside the Ministry of Defence, with the solely political purpose of combating CND's campaign. Miss Massiter testified that she was required to compile a report based on her MI5 files for DS19. That was a clear breach of the Security Service's duty to remain free of party political bias and influence.

Between 1981 and 1986, I was frequently subjected, as a direct consequence of my involvement in CND, to frightening and intimidating behaviour. I shall never know whether those events related to MI5, but I feel certain that my privacy—and that of my family—was systematically invaded, and my character, impugned, with absolutely no justification.

Did that happen to me? Does it still happen today? Could it happen tomorrow? The Committee must ask those questions for us, and it is clear that it is willing to do so. I share the concerns expressed in paragraph 40 of the report, which my case illustrates.

According to Cathy Massiter, my file grew and grew. It contained, she said, special branch references to my movements, products of mail and telephone intercepts, and police reports recording my appearances at demonstrations and public meetings. I believe that I should have the right to see that file. Indeed, before I heard the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), I was going to say that I believed that I had the right to have it destroyed.

The Committee's report makes no such recommendations about access, but, in paragraphs 50 and 51, it acknowledges the need to consider such matters. It says that more than 250,000 personal files still exist. I am not suggesting that my case is typical, but I suspect that it is not unique.

Changes in the law and the creation of the Intelligence and Security Committee should ensure that there is no repetition of the events of the 1970s and 1980s. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford asked, how can we have effective oversight if the people we are supposed to oversee decide how much information we receive? I wholeheartedly endorse the sentiments behind that question, and I welcome the Committee's proposals for a new, independent investigative arm.

The events that I have described belong to another time, but, even if my file had been closed a decade ago, I would still be angry that it had been compiled in the first place—solely because I was at the centre of an open and democratic organisation, which had massive public support and which was engaged in peaceful protest.

The charge that I was an enemy of the state was so patently absurd that I had thought that it had long been dismissed. However, The Mail on Sunday now says that I was one of the nine people singled out as "security risks" before the previous two general elections.

[Ms Ruddock]

I have never been a security risk. I was and am a loyal citizen of this country, who has done nothing more than campaign for causes in which I believe. If there is any file on me that suggests otherwise, that file contains a falsehood, and I should have the opportunity to correct it.

The rights to free speech and protest are fundamental democratic rights. Take them away, and we lose our ability to defend all the other rights and freedoms that are dear to the House. I very much welcome the Committee's report. I regard its work as one of the important checks and balances that protect those freedoms.

8.8 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) will forgive me if I do not cover the areas that she mentioned. Clearly, she listened to what was said earlier about the proceedings of the Intelligence and Security Committee as regards personal files.

I want to cover two areas that the Committee has considered since I joined it in July last year: personnel management and oversight. The Committee has been studying personnel management since it was set up, investigating recruitment, the adequacy of vetting procedures and the handling of disaffected staff. As a relatively new member, I am pleased—as are most members, I think—that changes in personnel management in the agencies are in line with policies and practices in the rest of the public sector and that they are evolving year by year through the use of best practice. For example, the agencies are developing measures to increase personal responsibility for career development. Career progression is no longer likely to be made solely because it is one turn's to move up the ladder, which is not the best way to promote people's careers in any institution. I am sure that it causes resentment if people believe that they are ready for and have earned that next step, but are not promoted. Some people in the agencies had become disaffected as a result.

Recently, we looked into that matter in detail, primarily because of the disaffection that has been reported in the newspapers in the past 12 months. The Committee looked into individuals and bodies inside and outside the agencies that have responsibility for handling the problems of disaffected staff: the individual's line manager, the grade manager in the personnel branch, training or security staff, occupational psychologists, and personal and financial counsellors, in addition to a range of managers. Also, we met welfare staff who are employed by each of the agencies, who are very approachable.

I, and other Committee members, were impressed at the experience and commitment of the professionally trained groups whose role inside the agencies has been to give advice and counselling on employees' problems. Of course, their personal problems vary. The agencies give me great confidence in the way in which they work with staff members who feel that they have not been looked after properly for one reason or another.

In addition, we studied the role of external staff counsellors. We took evidence from Sir Christopher France, and the report states how many disaffected staff cases he has handled. However, in many of the cases that we have read about in the media, the individuals involved have not sought to have what they believed to be a wrong put right from within the agency, which is a great problem. The staff counsellor outside the agencies has a reactive role when dealing with disaffected employees. He cannot seek people with problems. His door is open if people choose to walk through it, but many of the people who end up in the media after they have left the service do not choose to walk through his or any other door. The agencies see that as a great problem, as many hon. Members would agree it is. The Committee thought that the staff counsellor could perhaps have a more proactive role with people who have left the service and are dissatisfied with their situation.

The Committee also considered access to employment tribunals for people who felt that they had been wronged in the workplace. Indeed, that was one of our recommendations and we all agreed that it ought to be possible to constitute a tribunal of members and staff qualified to serve as an industrial tribunal and to deal with secret material. I am pleased at the Government's positive response to that recommendation. They are considering it. However, not many of the cases that come into the public domain would be served by such a tribunal. If someone chooses not to go to a tribunal and goes instead to the media—whether by writing books or selling articles to the newspapers—there is little that we or the agencies can do about it.

The status of oversight and of the Committee have been mentioned. Members will have read that there is a difference of opinion about the latter and about whether the ISC should be a Select Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Cam[illegible]ell-Savours) argued that case, saying that the evidence for it to have such status was overwhelming. I feel quite underwhelmed by the debate on the matter. I do not do so because I am worried about status—I am not a status politician or a status person, and I do not feel that our appointment by the Prime Minister gives us some great and grand role and that all wisdom is ours. Having spent 15 months on the Committee, I can say that on occasion it is not ours at all, so I do not buy that argument.

On the question of how we operate as a Committee within the "ring of secrecy", which is a broad brush, but under the Official Secrets Act, I have worked on two Select Committees and have now spent 15 months as a member of the Intelligence and Security Committee, and I realise that it would be difficult for our Committee to be a Select Committee. For example, where would we meet? The public can be removed from Select Committees, but that is done only rarely. Our Committee has no public gallery and most of our questioning and information gathering would preclude that. I suspect that it would be difficult to find a Committee Room in the House in which evidence could be heard in confidence without spilling over into the Corridor. So, there are logistical problems. Some hon. Members think that it would be an easy operation, but because of the very nature of the evidence that we take and the people we interview, we would inevitably end up in the room in the Cabinet Office where we take evidence now, doing so under the same conditions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington ended his remarks by saying that what matters is the nature of the people on the Committee and I agree, but that is true of the Committee now. It does as good a job as any Select Committee could do. So, we should not spend too much time arguing that it should be a Select Committee without considering what it does.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's reasons for rejecting my argument. He gave two reasons, which were logistical—where the Committee could meet and whether conditions would be secure—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he should be addressing the Chair.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is my hon. Friend saying that, if we could find a secure location in the House, he would change his position? I listened carefully to what he said.

Mr. Barron: Let me finish. The direct answer to that question is no.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What is the other answer?

Mr. Barron: It is a great pity that my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, is no longer sitting next to my hon. Friend. In his speech, which I thoroughly enjoyed, he said that the Committee has to take what it is given—that is not my experience; we ask for and receive some materials that are not offered to us—and that it has no powers to call for papers and witnesses. I might disagree with that, but I would not want the Committee to have the power to call for papers. There are some papers that no one should be able to see, because of the dangers of certain information ever getting out.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South also said that Select Committees, in theory—he smiled when he said that—are appointed by Parliament. I know why he smiled, because I suspect that, like me, he got a phone call last May about what Select Committee he wanted to be on and, perhaps, whether he wanted to chair one. I had such a phone call from the Executive, but I am pleased to say that I turned down the request and have been able to sit on the Intelligence and Security Committee for the past 15 months, where I have learnt a lot more about intelligence and security than, with all respect, I would have learnt by questioning my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary or other Ministers. We see many things in the ring of secrecy that we would not see if we were a Select Committee.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I put it to my hon. Friend that, irrespective of the smile of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), the power rests with Parliament, because we can object. When we were in opposition, I blocked the membership of a Select Committee of a Conservative Member, and in the end his nomination was withdrawn; so we are in a position to exercise that power when Parliament itself decides who should be on the Committees.

Mr. Barron: I will not rehearse what happened with the two Select Committees that I served on, but I do not think that the decisions were taken in the Chamber; they were more likely taken in the Whips Office.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is very interesting, but it is straying outside the terms of our debate.

Mr. Barron: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It has been suggested that the Committee should have an investigative arm so that we can consider certain matters in detail. I hope that people in the security and intelligence agencies realise that we do not want a roving brief to allow us anywhere in those agencies. We want to be able to send someone into an agency to investigate a specific matter when we feel that to be warranted.

Many events might trigger such an investigation—I do not want to speculate how many times a year that would happen; it might not even happen at all—but we, like many other parliamentary Committees, work on a parliamentary timetable, and events that should be investigated quickly often happen when we are not here in London. We could not easily reconvene the Committee for such an investigation, which is why we should strengthen our powers to enable us to send someone who is independent of the agency to look at papers and reassure us, we hope, that whatever allegation has been made is not true.

At present, all or most of the allegations made against the agencies go unanswered. I can understand that, because once they started responding to one question, that would beget the next and the next, and the process would run out of control. It would be difficult for the agencies to be more open with the general public in that way, so it would help if we had the right to send in an individual to consider a specific issue, after which the Committee could make a public statement.

In the past 15 months, I have had an insight into areas that would have been completely closed to me before. I was as sceptical as the next person about the security agencies and what they do for the country, but I have been greatly impressed by the way in which they operate both inside and outside the country and by the advice that they give. The people in the agencies are the most professional people I have ever met.

If the Committee strengthened its oversight, we would be able to tell people that the security and intelligence agencies are doing positive things on our behalf, for the good of the country; then more of the general public would recognise that.

8.26 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): I apologise for missing about an hour and a half of this debate. I was attending a meeting with the Speaker on modernising the House of Commons to make it more effective in examining the Executive, which is not a million miles from the subject in hand.

I congratulate the Government on holding this debate, because it is not long ago that we were told that it was not possible to debate these issues. As the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) said, only four or five years ago MI5 and MI6 did not exist in any statute. It always struck me as odd, as I remember saying 10 or 15 years ago, that two of the most famous security services in the world—admittedly, that fame is largely owing to Ian Fleming's James Bond character—had no statutory existence.

Those intelligence agencies were created at a time when the House had begun to lose some of its effectiveness in holding the Executive to account. I support the call by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) for the Committee to be a normal Select Committee, subject to the constraints that he rightly set out, because when we refuse to do that we send out the message that we do not have confidence in our Parliament. That is why other countries have a conventional scrutiny system.

The members of the present Committee are good people and they are doing a good job but, because they were appointed under the relevant statute to answer to the Prime Minister, they are a group of parliamentarians who have been asked by the Executive to keep the Executive under observation. The Select Committee system is there to hold the Executive to account more effectively, and that is why it should always be used to represent the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) rightly drew attention to the fact that the Whips have an enormous say—ultimately, the real say—in deciding the membership of Committees. Things could go off the rails, as they occasionally do—[Interruption.] Quite right; it is very rare. Increasingly, however, people are questioning that position and they have reason to do so.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I request my hon. Friend not to be modest and to state who he is, for the record and so students outside who may read our debates are aware of it? He is the chairman of the Parliamentary Labour party, representing two-thirds of the House of Commons. I am sure that his comments tonight reflect the views of many of the members of the parliamentary Labour party.

Mr. Soley: This matter is open to discussion in the parliamentary Labour party and in the Conservative party. Many Labour Members would not agree with what I am saying, although many would. The important point is that over the past four or five years we have moved so dramatically. We were told that we could not discuss the issue and, indeed, if we went to the Table Office, we were told that we could not table a question on it. No one, least of all me as chair of the parliamentary Labour party, is going to pretend that the party system does not play a crucial role in ensuring the governance of the country. It always has and it always will, but a delicate balance must be struck between the rights of the party and the rights of parliamentarians. As the chair of the parliamentary Labour party, I have to be aware of that balance and take it into account in my judgments.

Mr. Rogers: Does my hon. Friend accept that this issue has never been the subject of debate in the parliamentary Labour party and that we have never voted on it? He speaks in a personal capacity tonight, not on behalf of the parliamentary Labour party.

Mr. Soley: Of course that is so and I did not introduce the subject of the post I hold.

Mr. Rogers: He is going on about it.

Mr. Soley: I ask my hon. Friend to listen to what I am saying, especially as he intervened. The position is not as stark as he maintains and there are arguments on both sides. All I ask him to do is to listen to the argument and bear in mind that all the things we were told could not take place four years ago—the tabling of questions, debates such as this and reports by parliamentarians on security services—are now all happening. Change does happen and the House is an agent of change.

The confidence of Parliament is critical. In the last century, when Parliament was at its greatest, it would not have accepted a situation in which the Executive could set up bodies that then answered to them. Parliament would have resisted that, but we lost that attitude at about the time of the first world war. I have already mentioned the difficult balance between the rights of parties—the need for parties to maintain unity to be able to govern—and the rights of parliamentarians to hold the Executive to account, which is, after all, this place's final purpose.

My next subject is slightly tangential, but crucial to the work of the Committee. Several hon. Members have referred to the actions of disaffected members of the security services and others in the civil service in passing secret information into the public domain. They have done so for two reasons, either because they have a resentment against the security services or want money—Peter Wright and "Spycatcher" is the classic example—or because they felt it was right to reveal information in the public interest. The two cases that I have in mind have nothing to do with the security services directly—one is Clive Ponting and the other is the rather sad case of Sarah Tisdall, the 23-year-old who was sent to prison, having given information to The Guardian.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): Blame The Guardian.

Mr. Soley: If I remember rightly, The Guardian lost an action on the matter, but the point is that the Official Secrets Act—and Labour party members have long argued this—needs a public interest defence so that we can differentiate between those who reveal information for money or fame and those who do it because they see it as a public duty. Clive Ponting and, probably, Sarah Tisdall, fall into the latter category, but Peter Wright does not. I urge my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to consider whether we should, in the future, change the Official Secrets Act so that the courts have a much clearer guide to differentiating between those who reveal information because they are disaffected or want money and those who believe that they have a right to do so because of legitimate public interest in democracy and the rule of law. We must never forget, when discussing the security services, that we are discussing a vital arm of the defence of the state. I have always, and without reservation, held that the security services are necessary in any modern state. They are there to protect the very democracy and rule of law that brings us here and if we ever allow that fact to get out of focus, we will go wrong.

I turn now to the issue of personnel management. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Bridgwater and his colleagues on picking up that issue. It came to my attention some years ago and it highlights the wider problem of how the agencies are set up and operate. In Shepherd's Bush where I held my walk-in advice surgeries at the time I used to get a wide variety of local people, but I was surprised one evening when a person came to see me and, after a short discussion, it became apparent that he was an MI6 officer, as they were then called. His problem had to do with the classic situation of being grossly discontented with the way in which the service operated. Having spent some time with him, ther and on another occasion, I took the matter up with the then Home Secretary, now Lord Hurd. I was told some time later that the matter had been investigated by management and it was felt that it had been properly handled. The person involved did not know that and neither did I. Indeed, I am now satisfied that it had not been properly handled, because another incident took place a year or two later—which also came about partly through my advice surgery—that suggested to me that management in the security services was failing badly.

The various efforts that have been made to deal with staff problems are very important, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley mentioned. We must take into account staff who have personality or social problems, such as drinking or family problems, as well as those who feel seriously aggrieved about their treatment as employees by the agency. Such people feel they have no voice and can end up, bizarrely, tootling down the Uxbridge road to see their local Member of Parliament. I am all for people seeing their local Member of Parliament, but there has to be a better way to deal with the issue. At the time, the man who came to see me had no alternative and he dealt with the problem responsibly. At the end of the day, he and I felt that it had not been adequately addressed.

My final point is on the question of files. The former Under-Secretary of State for Women, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) spoke powerfully about the issue and made the case as well as it could be made. Her speech should be sent round to schools as a good introduction to civics.

I have a question for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary relating to—I think—paragraphs 46 and 51, which deal with summaries on candidates for election. I have no reason to believe that those matters are inappropriately dealt with as a rule, but I am concerned that hon. Members on both sides of the house have, to my certain knowledge, had regular dealings over many years with political representatives of paramilitary organisations in Northern Ireland. The previous Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was courteous enough to tell me that he could assure me that my phone was not bugged. I had not asked about it, and was not troubled by it, but he offered the information. I was aware, therefore, that that thought existed, and it was clear that bugging happens in limited circumstances.

I am anxious to know, therefore, that any information held on a Member of Parliament, or on anyone who stands for election, is judged properly. If one believes—as, to be fair, many Conservatives did—that it is necessary to talk with political representatives of paramilitaries in Northern Ireland, even at the height of violence, it is important to be able to do so with confidence that one's phone is not being tapped. That matter is retrospective now, but it is profoundly important.

Members of Parliament must be able to talk to people who are not wanted by the police for any criminal offence freely and without fear that they are being recorded and might be considered, as my hon. Friend the Member for Deptford has said, a threat to national security. There is a delicate balance to be struck. I know of cases, in the recent history of Parliament, of individuals who would have had real concern about that. I raise the point because several of us, myself included, were involved in talks supported by the then Government involving representatives of paramilitary groups. I always drew the line at talking to anyone whom I knew to be wanted for a criminal offence of any kind. I would, however, talk to anyone who was elected, or who represented a legal organisation.

The Committee deals with crucial areas concerning the importance of Parliament, management structure and how we deal with elected representatives. We should never lose sight of them.

8.42 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I want to raise only two matters that arise from my long experience as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. That experience was long only because we were not successful in winning elections, which meant that the Opposition were able to elect the Chairman of the PAC. The two matters are fraud, and the ability to investigate areas of security and sensitivity.

There is a clear danger of fraud wherever there are security matters. Obviously, not many people can be involved in making decisions, even financial decisions. An extreme example of that occurred in the Metropolitan police. There was a fellow named Williams who had authority to place orders and to make payments. He was buying helicopters. The police did not want the criminals to know that they had that kind of surveillance, so Williams was given that power. He pocketed £5 million, went off to Scotland and bought most of a village and a hotel. He lived the life of a lord, and everyone assumed that a wealthy relative in Norway had provided the money. Every Sunday, he returned to London to cover his tracks.

That is the sort of case that can happen. It is very difficult to uncover such cases when there are matters of great secrecy, so there must be proper procedures, no matter how important security is. It is obvious that one person must never be made responsible both for placing orders and for receiving the money. Less obviously, there must be some investigation from outside. In that case, the investigation was made by the Comptroller and Auditor General, a marvellous institution that both does the audit and understands what is going on. In the Ministry of Defence, people from the National Audit Office are placed permanently to see what is going on. Some information filters through to the PAC, rather more filters through to its Chairman, and that is enormously important in giving an understanding of how the system works, and allowing rules to be laid down for procedure.

Another case was that of Al Yamamah, a £20 billion contract with Saudi Arabia, which was investigated by the Comptroller and Auditor General. How should we handle matters of such sensitivity? I informed the Committee of the matter, and it allowed me and the senior Conservative Member of the day, Michael Shaw—now Lord Shaw—to act as the full Committee. We pursued the matter together. If there had been any fraud or bribery in the Ministry of Defence, there would have been no question of secrecy. We would have let that be known in order to preserve the standing of the public service in general. In fact, there were matters concerning certain overseas individuals that we thought might be disadvantageous to our continuing with that important contract. We were able to assure ourselves that there was nothing more than that.

[Mr. Robert Sheldon]

The PAC has long been in favour of the ability to pursue public money wherever it may go. We do not have that power now and we did not have it then. I hope that the Committee may get that power at some future stage. It was discussed in 1983. Following public money wherever it goes happens in the United States of America and other countries.

My other point relates to the security services—MI5 and MI6 in short. We considered their two buildings, about which I shall not comment much except to say that I wish they were not quite as obtrusive as they are. There should be a certain amount of discretion not only in the services, but in their buildings. The one on the other side of the Thames is almost a disgrace, although that is a personal observation that has nothing to do with my former position as Chairman of the PAC, which ended last year.

I was concerned when we investigated the buildings. I read a secret report from the Comptroller and Auditor General, and I could see that there had been an overspend that had not been reported to the House. There were certain reasons for the overspend, and certain security implications into which I cannot go. However, the fact that there were overspends on both buildings should have been known. Until I ceased to be Chairman of the PAC, I was pursuing the matter to make sure that it was known. Unfortunately, the general election intervened, and my role on the Committee ended.

The crucial point is that there is a need for an investigating arm. There is the Comptroller and Auditor General, but the Intelligence and Security Committee needs someone to perform that role. It needs a highly respected and responsible person who has the approval of Government and Parliament and who is able to undertake investigations. Knowing our civil servants and public-spirited individuals, it would be astonishing if we could not come up with one or two names of people who could undertake such activity.

No one can deny that are several things going wrong in our security services. There have been too many reports of one sort or another. While the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) can undertake certain investigations—I pay tribute to his valuable work—that facility is limited. We need someone inside the bodies concerned to help us find out what is going on. The person with that responsibility must have the respect of people generally. I hope that the Committee will return to this matter in due course.

8.49 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh): It is clear from the debate that the House values the third annual report of the Intelligence and Security Committee. We are all grateful for its work. The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) brings much experience to it and he and its other members have served the House well.

There can be no argument about the importance of the work of the security services. The report recognises the huge value of their work when it is successful. As many, including the Foreign Secretary, have noted, in the main it is by definition not sensible or practical to focus attention on their successes. The report is valuable and contains much useful material on personnel management and on the compilation, retention and destruction of personal files. I, however, wish to discuss the security services' priorities.

There are clearly many valuable things that the security services can do, but resources are limited. The end of the cold war provides a great opportunity. Understandably, most of the focus of the media has been on the new work that they are doing on drugs and crime. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary values that work, where they are able to contribute.

I want to concentrate on other areas. The report's preface states:

"Moving British forces on humanitarian or peace-keeping missions into dangerous and untested territory requires the best possible intelligence on the local situation, and a close watch on what may be rapid and threatening changes in very volatile circumstances. Britain's involvement in such activities has also resulted in new terrorist threats to British interests."

We are proud of the contribution of our forces to peacekeeping—the Foreign Secretary mentioned Bosnia—but the work of the intelligence services in that respect is crucial and should be strongly supported.

My second point concerns the growth of international terrorism. There is huge growth in world aviation, and that will continue. That means more threats to aircraft, to mention but one aspect of international terrorism. If the intelligence services can contribute to reducing the number of hijackings, that would be an important service.

Thirdly, the preface mentions the important matter of the proliferation of nuclear weapons and other horrific modern weapons capable of huge destruction. If the intelligence services can increase our knowledge, especially of those countries that are developing such capabilities, it must be of immense potential value to our people.

Supporting our forces, international terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction are by definition areas of great international interest. It follows that our intelligence agencies work with other agencies. That is how it should be. There are established democracies like ours with viable services, and by working together, they can achieve more. However, hard decisions must be taken on the priority and resources allocated to those activities.

On page 9, the report gives a figure for total expenditure of around £700 million. Paragraph 19 states:

"Figures for the individual Agency budgets are not at present published. The Committee believes that the fullest information should be published wherever possible, and will be discussing further whether there could be greater openness in this area."

All power to its elbow.

We know that, by definition, the intelligence services must be treated differently. No one wants transparency that compromises their work, but although decisions on the priority attached to different activities are for the agencies and the Government, Parliament and the broader community should also be able to participate. I hope that the committee will be able to provide more information and more of a breakdown of the resources allocated to different activities so that we can all contribute to the development of a set of priorities that commands the broad support of Parliament and the country.

We all hope that the significant sum of money still allocated to combating terrorism associated with Northern Ireland will come down; it is too early to say. If it does, we can have a constructive debate on how that money can be effectively used to help further the benefits that the security services have the potential to bring to our people.

8.56 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): This has been a good debate marred only by the characteristic contribution of the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). He went to great lengths to tell us that the World Peace Council was a Soviet front organisation, but as everyone in politics and, I assume, in this House, knew that from day one, it was not startling news.

Whenever there is a call for greater accountability of the security services, the fear is always expressed, as it has been to a limited extent today, that that would undermine the work being undertaken. That was the excuse for retaining the ban on unions at GCHQ from the beginning of 1984. Labour opposed that ban and promised that once we were elected, it would go, as it did within days of our victory last May. Would anyone suggest that in the months that have elapsed since, its work has been in any way undermined by the fact that people have the right, which they should have in a democracy, of belonging to a trade union and having the union recognised by management?

In the not-so-distant past, any form of parliamentary Committee was opposed. It was long argued that it would be wrong for parliamentarians to be involved in examining the work of the security services.

In the 1983 Parliament, when I was a member of the Home Affairs Committee—I am again a member of that Committee—it was decided to look into the work of the special branches of the police. As far as I know, it was the first time that that had ever been done by a parliamentary Select Committee. Critics outside argued that we should not do that, as the special branches worked closely with the security forces. However, we did. Our report was not unanimous; it was a majority-and-minority report, but no one suggested afterwards that the work undertaken by special branches was undermined as a result of our inquiry.

There has been a tendency to question whether such work should be undertaken. As I have said in the past, I have never doubted that even if there were no terrorism in Northern Ireland, from Republican or Loyalist sources, or even if international terrorism did not exist, the work of the security services in a democracy such as ours would be essential. Moreover, I know of no democracy, let alone dictatorship, where such work is not undertaken in some form or other.

Those involved in extremist organisations that want to undermine and, if possible, destroy parliamentary democracy should be targeted. Who would suggest that the National Front, the British National party or other such organisations should not be targeted? No Labour Member would suggest that extremists on the ultra left who carry out activities that are not meant to advance the cause of parliamentary democracy should not be targeted. How far they should be targeted is a matter of judgment for the security services, but I have never disputed the fact that such work is necessary.

It is important, however, that the security services should carry out such work with the clear understanding of what they are about. The former Under-Secretary of State for Women, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), explained what happened to her as a result of being involved in the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. She quoted Cathy Massiter, a former MI5 employee, whom even Conservatives, I believe, respect for the manner in which she spoke out. She concluded that much of the work that she was doing was simply wrong, and said:

"Anyone who was on the Executive of the National Council for Civil Liberties"—

now known simply as Liberty—

"who worked for the organisation, was an active member to the degree of being, say, a branch secretary of the organisation, would be placed on permanent record and routine inquiries were instituted to identify such people and police inquiries were sought."

These people were not extremists. Indeed, it can be argued that they did a useful job in defending our civil liberties. How can what happened possibly be justified?

In an Adjournment debate on 21 December 1983, I raised the case of a constituent of the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler). Mrs. Madeline Haigh made no secret of the fact that she was a CND activist. She wrote to the press and was, as far as anyone could tell, a perfectly law-abiding person. However, police investigations took place and she was lied to. The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield, I see, nods his head. The reply that he received was not the truth. Being a determined person, Mrs. Haigh wrote again to her Member of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman—he was a Minister at the time—carried out his constituency duties in a proper manner. He wrote again to the chief constable and received a different reply, which showed that the police had lied to his constituent.

Incidentally, I do not wish to pre-empt Thursday's debate, but the point can be established that once a Member of Parliament is elected, he serves all his constituents, not necessarily according to policy. I doubt whether Mrs. Haigh voted for the right hon. Gentleman. As we all would in such circumstances, he carried out his duties and no one can criticise him. The case caused much concern, which is why I raised it at the time.

As we know, since the early 1980s commissioners and tribunals have been established. One argument that is constantly advanced is that those commissioners and tribunals should be able to avoid some of the abuses that have occurred in the past, but paragraph 58 of the ISC report points out that none of the tribunals has found in favour of a complainant. The decisions of those tribunals may well have been justified, but I wonder whether such commissioners and tribunals could be relied on to be the custodians, or guardians, in circumstances in which abuses could occur in the security services.

Mr. Rogers: As my hon. Friend will remember, when we served on the Standing Committee considering the Bill that became the 1994 Act, we were given statistics showing that, during a period just before 1994, some 51 cases had been referred to tribunals, and none of those tribunals had found in favour of a complainant.

Mr. Winnick: Indeed. Paragraph 58 also states that, as the Committee had had no access to the material involved, it had been unable to make a judgment. That is entirely understandable.

I welcome the Committee's conclusion in paragraph 69 that it wants "an additional investigative capacity". I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be able to tell us whether the Committee will be given the necessary powers.

[Mr. Winnick]

Perhaps engaging in a bit of mischief making, my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) predicted that I would quote what had been said by Front Benchers and other Labour Members in opposition. I shall not do so, because it would serve no purpose; but I will say that, in opposition—certainly around 1994, when we were discussing these matters—we took the view that there should be some sort of parliamentary Select Committee rather than what was being proposed, namely the ISC.

I do not challenge the contention that, in government, it is possible to change or at least modify one's opinion, but I must tell my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary ..... I should be happier if the Government did not close their mind to the possibility of a Select Committee. No one is suggesting that my right hon. Friend will tell us tonight that such a Committee will be formed, but I hope that the Government will give it serious consideration.

Let me make two final points. First, I do not believe that this issue will go away. The fact that debates such as this take place—like other hon. Members, I have initiated them in the past—demonstrates that it is an on-going issue. Secondly, although some have opposed the establishment of any parliamentary Committee, no one—not even the hon. Member for New Forest, East—has today challenged the existence of the Committee chaired by the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), despite all that has been said in the past.

I very much doubt that, if and when a parliamentary Select Committee comes into being, anyone will stand up in the Chamber and say that it should no longer exist. In other democracies, the security services are subject to much more parliamentary accountability, and I personally will not be satisfied until ours are too. We have taken the initial steps, and we have had a useful debate today. As I have said, I hope to hear from my right hon. Friend words that will encourage me to believe that, in the not-too-distant future, we will have the parliamentary accountability that we said we wanted when we were in opposition.

9.8 pm

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): This has been a valuable and exclusive debate, although perhaps not quite as exclusive as it looks at the moment. I congratulate the members of the Intelligence and Security Committee, many of whom have spoken, on the way in which the Committee has been accepted and is trusted by the security services. In particular, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) on the way in which he has led the Committee. We are fortunate to have a man of his experience and integrity as its Chairman.

In the debate, there were two features of particular significance. First, there was general agreement that, even though the old iron curtain may have been brought crashing down, there was still a need for the security services; that point was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater and by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). It has not been a matter of the security services inventing new threats or new roles for themselves. Those threats were already there to be tackled. In particular, there was the threat of organised crime and of drugs.

Secondly, there was a recognition generally throughout the debate that special circumstances applied to the security services in respect of secrecy. Throughout the world, people will not take risks unless they are confident that every effort will be made to preserve their secrecy. Every reasonable effort must be made to do that, including personal management of the services themselves.

There was less agreement on how those principles should be put into practice, particularly on the nature of the committee that should oversee the security services. Several Labour Members—the hon. Members for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), for Walsall, North and for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley)—argued for the Committee to be a Select Committee of the House. Indeed, the hon. Member for Sunderland, South pointed out that at one stage the Labour party said that that was its policy.

I am glad to say that I am entirely unencumbered by such a pledge, which is just as well. In any case, I would not accept the argument, because I am persuaded more by the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the hon. Members for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), as well as my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis): the way forward is to seek to develop the present structure—to add, as the report proposes, an investigative capacity to the Intelligence and Security Committee.

That is a sensible step forward. That is the way in which to proceed. The Committee has the confidence of the security services. That is important because, without it, it would be easy for the shutters to come down. We all know that that is true. We all know how these things work, but an investigative capacity would enable the Committee to dig deeper.

A strong case has been made with regard to the destruction of personal files and the introduction of some form of independent check. The point was made by the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) and supported by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). There are two issues. There is the issue of operational use, and the security services are the only people who can decide that. However, there is also, if I may put it this way, the requirement of history. It would be a great mistake if files were destroyed that could throw light on policies and, sometimes perhaps, on personalities at the time. The Government should look at that matter again.

Another point that was raised—[Interruption.] May I have the attention of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for a moment because it was raised by him in the debate, but not taken on? He referred to the three security agencies and asserted:

"It makes sense because they work so closely together."

If that does work as perfectly as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, it is fairly unusual in Whitehall.

Mr. Straw: Not now.

Sir Norman Fowler: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman said that. However, I would find that defence more convincing were it not for the Pinochet case, where it is clear that the Home Secretary had not the first idea of what the Foreign Secretary knew. The Home Secretary makes my point in a wonderful way, and I rest my case. I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater that this area should again be examined very deeply, as that obviously would have the thorough endorsement of the Home Secretary.

In looking at the recent history of the security services, especially in regard to subversion, we need to recognise that many of those whom the services had to investigate in the past were members of parties and organisations that made no secret of their wish to undermine parliamentary democracy. I in no way refer to the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament or the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock). However, there was no doubt about the objectives of some of the organisations, for example, the Communist party of Great Britain, which set great store by seeking to infiltrate and manipulate organisations such as trades unions. It achieved only negligible support at the ballot box, but sought to gain an influence that was far out of proportion to that. Such activity was a legitimate subject for attention by the Security Service. It was of concern not only to the last Conservative Government, but to successive Governments.

All that is history. Now, the major effort of the Security Service is aimed at terrorism, both in Northern Ireland and internationally. That point was made well by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang), with whom I am glad to be debating again. Terrorism plotted to cause terrorist outrages overseas. We all hope that the new position in Northern Ireland will lead to a reduction in the work of the Security Service. However, at the moment, there is no reason radically to reduce the resources going to that area. It would be a vast mistake to lift our guard too early. There is still a range of breakaway groups that presents a huge challenge.

Intelligence gathering against terrorists is difficult and often dangerous work. Many of those who work in this area risk their lives. As the former head of the Security Service, Stella Rimington, said in her Dimbleby lecture, they do it from a sense of public service and a firm belief in the rule of law and the democratic system. There have been major losses as a result of that work, such as the helicopter crash in 1994. I was with the then Prime Minister in Downing street when news of that crash came through. We have much cause to be grateful to those who work for the Security Service, often in very difficult and dangerous circumstances.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way, especially as I have not been here during the debate, having fulfilled a long-standing commitment in my constituency.

As I am a former Northern Ireland Minister and a member of the Defence Committee, hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that I have occasionally come into contact with the security services. I want to pay tribute to their professionalism and dedication. Individuals carry heavy personal responsibility, often at an early age. It is a worthy commitment and long may first-class people come forward to fulfil it.

Sir Norman Fowler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I pay tribute to his work in the Northern Ireland Office.

Important points on accountability have been very much rehearsed in this debate. However—this is my main concern—we must also address other vital issues, such as the agencies' effectiveness, and whether the agencies realise their full potential to do good. The one point on which everyone seems to be united is that the security services have a vastly important role in tackling organised crime, especially the drug trade. Effective operations undoubtedly make full use of intelligence in combating professional crime. Indeed, in the past 10 or 15 years, use of intelligence by police has been one of the most significant developments in fighting crime.

In his introduction to the Committee's report, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater states:

"In recent years there has been a growth in serious organised crime, funded significantly by the world-wide trade in drugs. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the removal of barriers to travel from those countries let loose dangerous new criminal groups, often including ex-members of the KGB and other intelligence and security services. They have a substantial involvement in drugs and money laundering and, increasingly, in the traffic in illegal immigrants".

At paragraph 4 of the Government's response, the Prime Minister states:

"The Government welcomes the Committees's strong support for the increased priority the Agencies are giving to counter-drugs work. We shall continue to harness the invaluable contribution which they make to this important task."

We all agree on the challenge. However, I tell the Home Secretary that it would be a tragedy if the Prime Minister's words were simply the usual generalisations that Ministers tend to make about organised crime and especially about drugs. I heard the Foreign Secretary's statement about £200 million-worth of drugs being recovered in the past three years. Although that is good, personally, I remain to be convinced that our efforts are adequate to meet the increased challenge posed by organised crime.

I returned recently from the United States, where I saw the work of the Drug Enforcement Administration. The DEA was created in 1973 as a response to increased cocaine processing in south America and heroin refining in south-east Asia. It not only is the lead agency for domestic enforcement of federal drug laws but has sole responsibility for co-ordinating and conducting crucial drug investigations abroad. The DEA is determined to tackle the source of the drugs trade, and the very powerful criminal organisations that are behind the exploitation. Essentially, the DEA performs the very task that everyone has in mind for the security services, particularly the SIS.

The United States is much better resourced than the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, some indication of the emphasis that it is placing on the fight against drugs is provided by the fact that the DEA has a staff of 7,500, with 340 special agents in foreign countries, laboratories and 100 aircraft performing surveillance work. That gives some idea also of the challenge that the United States faces.

The United States operations against the drugs trade are relevant to our operations. Although it may not always be the same criminal organisations from the same parts of the world attempting to bring drugs into the United Kingdom—and too often succeeding—the type of threat is very much the same: exploitation of the public by entirely ruthless and professional criminals.

International developments sometimes have consequences for us. South America, for example, is displacing south-east Asia as the major source of heroin in the United States. What happens to the heroin from south-east Asia? It goes to a developing market in Asia; it has also meant a new concentration on Europe.

Increasingly, organised criminals are trafficking not only one drug but any number of drugs for which there is a demand, or for which they think a demand can be created. By any standard, it is a serious and professionally organised operation. It is a brutally organised trade. We have now recognised, by statute at least, that we face very much the same kind of threat.

The SIS and GCHQ can now, by statute, be involved in combating serious crime. I do not share the view of Liberty that those organisations' powers are too wide. Liberty says that they can cover "relatively minor crimes" such as robberies. It depends on one's view of minor crime, but it had not hitherto occurred to me that robbery fell into that category.

The Security Service Act 1996 gave the Security Service the function

"of acting in support of the prevention and detection of serious crime".

I support the legislation's aim, but I am still sceptical about the resources that we are devoting to tackling organised crime. My understanding is that the Security Service is able to devote only a very small percentage of its resources to that. It is difficult to make a complete and accurate assessment of the figure, given the asterisks that appear in the report in place of the relevant sum. I think that I know the figure, but I shall not reveal it. In any event, the service spends only a small proportion of its resources on tackling crime. If one accepts the nature of the challenge, as I do, that proportion needs to be increased. We shall need to return to the issue of whether the effort that we are making is adequately resourced, or even whether it is given sufficient priority within the Budget.

This has been a welcome and valuable debate. The activities of the intelligence agencies must be subject to proper scrutiny—no one seeks to deny that—and the Committee deserves to be congratulated on its work. We must now develop that work but, above all, the aim must be to make the agencies as effective as possible because they have a continuing and invaluable role to play.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): When the Intelligence and Security Committee was established, there were twin anxieties. There was an anxiety in the House that it would be a weak substitute, or patsy, for a proper, full-blooded Select Committee. The opposite anxiety, among the intelligence agencies, was that the prospect of a Committee of parliamentarians, if not a parliamentary Committee, would mean that the ring of secrecy, which was patently so important for the operation of those agencies, would be compromised and that their work would thereby be undermined. As experience has shown, both anxieties proved misplaced.

We have had a good debate not only on the ISC's work over the past year but, effectively, on its work in the four years since it was established. I shall deal in a moment with the proposals that have been around for a long time for changes in parliamentary scrutiny, but we know that, under the excellent chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), members of the Committee, who come from all parties, have done their job properly, as Parliament intended. The Committee has effectively scrutinised the work of the intelligence and security agencies. I have appeared before the Committee twice. The experience of giving evidence to the ISC is no more comfortable than giving evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs, which is as it should be.

Given the anxieties that I mentioned, the paradox is just how much the agencies have benefited from the establishment of the ISC. As a result of the establishment of the ISC, there is now a group of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who have knowledge and expertise about the operation of the agencies, but who approach the issue with independence of judgment. That is hugely to the advantage of the agencies, given that there is such widespread support and admiration for the important work that they do.
